"When the American government purchased the old, worthless Panama bonds from the French company, the holders, dispersed as they were throughout the length and breadth of France, were glad to let them go for a song. Magniff & Co. acted as brokers, on the French side, and they made an enormous fortune. But, by the terms of their contract, they bound themselves to deliver all the bonds to America, in return for so many millions of dollars.

"They actually did deliver all except the small parcel which you hold. They searched for these and could not find them. They advertised—in vain. Nobody responded to their offer to purchase them. They concluded, not unnaturally, that they had been lost or destroyed and would never turn up.

"All this while the bonds were lying in their own safety deposit vault in your own father's name. He knew nothing of the demand for them, and I, of course, did not imagine otherwise than that he had already disposed of them to Magniff. Now, my dear Anne, do you understand why your bonds are so valuable?"

"Not quite," I responded, still puzzled.

"Because Magniff & Co., in taking this chance, 'sold short,' as the stock exchange would say. They sold all the bonds. But they did not hold all—they did not hold yours. In consequence, they are legally compelled to deliver those bonds to the American government the very instant when they come to light. They must deliver them, at any price. If you had chosen, you could have appraised them at a billion francs apiece, and still Magniff must have purchased them. You held him in the hollow of your hand, as he and his scoundrelly son knew well. And, Anne, you have been badly outwitted by the old banker. Well, he was fighting for his existence; I have no blame for him."

"And with that fortune I could have recovered Clichy for you," I sobbed.

"But Clichy has recovered you," answered my grandfather, placing one hand caressingly upon my shoulder. "Henceforward, Anne, your home will be with us—at least, so long as we have a home," he ended. "And now, Charles," he continued, "I have monopolized our relative enough. I shall go for a walk and leave you two young people together."

"Oh, please," I begged, blushing foolishly again.

But the old gentleman made his exit with a final bow and left us both looking at each other in an uncommonly sheepish way.

"I—I want to ask you something," Charles murmured presently. Then, since I did not discourage him, he continued:

"Is it, then, true that you are unmarried in spite of the ring you wore?"

My face was so crimson now that I could only cover it with my hands. But somehow he read assent in my act, for in a moment he was at my side.

"Why did you wear it, sun-goddess?" he asked, and I felt him raise my fingers to his lips. "Was it to cast me into the depths of hopelessness and despair?"

"Why should you despair for me, monsieur?" I asked.

"Because I love you, sun-goddess," he answered rapturously. "I loved you that first moment when you stepped so bravely into my monoplane at the aviation meet and soared with me into the empyrean. And, when I lost you, I knew that I must find you again, though I had to search all London. Then, when you were so miraculously restored to me at the abbey doors, you brought back the zest of living to me again. And then—that fatal ring! Why did you wear it, Anne?"

"Because I knew that it would be better should you never turn your thoughts on me," I managed to whisper. "We were enemies, mortal enemies, then."

"But never more," he cried. "Anne, sun-goddess, do you love me a little—enough to become my wife?"

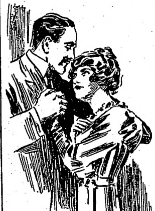
I did. I knew I did. I knew, too, that it had been love, not hatred, which I had always felt for him, love which, released at last from its bonds, welled up spontaneously within my heart into a broad river of joy.

"Say that you love me, Anne," he pleaded, his arms about me.

"I—I love you," I murmured, and I felt his lips on mine.

"When will you marry me, Anne?" he asked, presently.

Slowly I disengaged myself. In those rapturous moments I had forgotten the mesh of circumstances that had been woven round us. Now the memory of them recurred to me.



"I—I Love You," I Murmured, and I Felt His Lips to Mine.

"Some day," I answered, "when our troubles are over, Charles. When we have conquered our enemies."

With that he had to rest content. I did not feel that it would be decorous to yield too much within a single hour.

Later that afternoon the mother of Charles called in her victoria and took me to their town residence. She would be satisfied with nothing but that I should become their guest. I pleaded, however, that I must wait at the pension until the three weeks had elapsed, that the banker might readily find me should he desire to, since he could hardly communicate with me at the home of his enemies. However, I compromised by consenting to pay a few days' visit to Clichy at the end of the week.

CHAPTER VI.

Mascot of Castle Clichy.

I was at Castle Clichy, in my grandfather's home, and the home of my ancestors through innumerable generations.

Never, in my most extravagant dreams had I imagined that such a consummation of my journey would occur. I had set out from Winnipeg filled with hatred toward those kinsfolk who had disowned my father and left him to die in need in a far country. And here I was, the guest of my grandfather and his widowed daughter, and engaged to my half-cousin, Charles.

But for the present the engagement was to be kept secret. That I insisted upon. I determined that I would win the hearts of his relatives also before allowing him to present me to them as his future bride. I could not but fear that the old comte might treat him as he had treated my father.

On the third morning after my arrival I wrote to Mary Jenner, my room-mate in Winnipeg, for the first time since my departure.

"When I tell you that I am actually in my grandfather's chateau," I wrote, "you will open your eyes wide, in that taking way you have, and be glad that I am not there to say, 'I told you so.' For were you not the ringleader in the conspiracy to keep me at home till the close of the school year, when we were to make up a party to see Europe? And, Mary dear, I do hope that scheme has not fallen through. Come to France, and a royal welcome awaits you.

"Have you pursued your acquaintance with little Mr. Spratt? Poor little man! I have not yet glanced inside the covers of the monumental work of his upon the Code Napoleon, which he presented to me so proudly at the moment of my departure. Be good to him, Mary, and make a man of him. He's timid with ladies, so don't be afraid to give him encouragement.

"And now you'll want to know about Castle Clichy, Mary. It is the very quaintest place—all early Norman, with bastions and moats and battlements, set in the midst of an enormous park, and most delightfully feudal. But by the time you receive this it won't be in the possession of our family any longer. Fancy being turned out of your home after you have inhabited it for eight hundred years! But we're wretchedly poor and in the hands of an unscrupulous banker, one Magniff by name, who owns a mortgage on us, and unless we can obtain twelve thousand francs—$2,400—within a few days, to meet the interest, Clichy passes out of our hands forever.

"This Magniff is the most avaricious scoundrel imaginable, except his son, who's worse. Mary, he's agreed to pay me $10,000 for those bonds of mine you always laughed about, when the safe is opened next week. And so I thought I might just as well pay off the interest on the mortgage out of it. I wrote to him, asking him to advance me $2,400, and he curtly refused. He has a grudge against my grandfather and means to turn him out of his home. I went to Paris to plead with him, and he sent out word he would not see me. Think of it; my grandfather must lose his property when, less than a week afterward, I shall receive enough money to have saved it many times over! Well, I've done my best and there's no use crying over it now.

"Come to France, Mary, and all of you, right soon. I embrace you and salute you, as we French say.

"P. S. I'm quite French now!"

I did not convey in this letter the sense of impotence, the burning anger with which the banker's conduct had inspired me. When I had proposed to my grandfather that he let me meet the interest due out of the proceeds from the bonds, he seemed to realize the futility of the attempt.

"It's no use, my little Anne," he said. "I thank you from the depths of my heart. But you will be beating against a granite wall. Magniff means to have Clichy, and he won't advance you a penny until the vault is opened. Then, nothing can be done."

And, as I have described in my letter to Mary, I beat in vain against the granite wall of Magniff's vindictive hatred. Now we were already setting our affairs in order, packing our few cherished mementoes, ready to leave.

There was pitifully little that we could take with us. The castle was indeed, as Magniff had so graphically portrayed it, "as bare as a hound's tooth." All the furnishings of its seven and forty rooms had long since disappeared, save those of the half dozen in the right wing where we lived, attended only by old servants who would not be dismissed. Costly pictures, tapestries, armor, whole sets of Sevres, had gone into the maw of Magniff, being sacrificed to meet the ever-recurring indebtedness. For twenty years—ever since the failure of the original Panama company had ruined the comte—this process of depletion had been continued. Now our sparse furniture would barely have accommodated a family in a six-room flat.

"But they shall never take our monoplane," said the chevalier, as we stood within the hangar and looked at the gigantic, graceful bird, which seemed to float airily upon the planking that supported it. "I would rather burn it, give it the baptism of death in that fiery element toward which we ascended together on that first day of our meeting, sun-goddess."

The memory brought tears to my eyes.

"Charles," I said, "they shall never take Clichy from you!"

"Not if your wishes were dollars, sun-goddess," he answered, gaily.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

His Economical Mind.

Mr. Summerman—"Is it true that since coming up here you've engaged yourself to Billy, Harry, Ed and George, as well as to myself?" Miss Sweetly—"What if it is?" Mr. Summerman—"Then I'd like to know if you have any objection to all of us chipping in to buy the engagement ring?"

State News of General Interest

INDIAN MEMORIAL FITTINGLY RAISED

UPWARDS OF TWO THOUSAND PERSONS PARTICIPATE IN SHAFT UNVEILING.

BITTER CONTROVERSY RAISED

New Ulm.—Upwards of 2,000 persons gathered at old Fort Ridgely on the fifty-second anniversary of the battle with the Sioux Indians, to dedicate the monument erected to commemorate the services of Chief Mou-zoo-maun-nee of the Chippewa tribe.

Controversy Is Aroused.

A bitter controversy was aroused by the dedication. When the date for it was announced, survivors of the Sioux massacre of 1862 and persons familiar with the early history of Minnesota sought to discredit its historical accuracy. They asserted that the white settlers along the frontier received no assistance from the Chippewas, and added that Mou-zoo-maun-nee was a Sioux Indian rather than a Chippewa chief. Several of the speakers at the exercises sought to justify the action of the legislature in voting the monument appropriation by showing that Mou-zoo-maun-nee was instrumental in influencing the Chippewas to reject offers which had been made them by the Sioux to join in the massacre.

Accepts for State.

Nearly all of the state officials had accepted invitations to attend the unveiling, but the only ones to put in an appearance were George F. Authier, private secretary to Governor Eberhart; State Auditor S. G. Iverson and Attorney General Lyndon A. Smith. The first named accepted the monument on behalf of the state, and the shaft was unveiled by little Patricia Bella Dailey, great-granddaughter of Chief Mou-zoo-maun-nee.

Representative Frank Hopkins of Fairfax acted as master of ceremonies, and the first speaker was State Senator H. N. Benson of St. Peter, who was one of the authors of the monument bill. W. F. Lee of Long Prairie, Republican gubernatorial nominee, told of an intimate acquaintance with the Mille Lacs bank of the Chippewas. He upheld the action of the legislature, and said: "I want to go on record as vouching for the fidelity, the honesty and the peaceable intentions of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota."

Defends Action of Legislature.

Dar S. Hall of Olivia, former commissioner to the Chippewas, defended the action of the legislature. The Sioux endeavored to induce the Chippewas to join in the revolt, he said. Chief Mou-zoo-maun-nee of the Mille Lacs band was one of the principal advocates of peace, and it was due in a large measure to him that the Chippewas did not go on the warpath. Theo. H. Beaulieu of White Earth, speaking as a representative of the Chippewas, confirmed Mr. Hall's statements, and produced evidence to show that Mou-zoo-maun-nee was a Chippewa.

Attired in their savage finery, four Chippewa chiefs, Andrew Dailey, Aindus-o-ge-shig, son of Mou-zoo-maun-nee; Chief Little Wolf, Mah-eeng-gaunce; Chief Peter Parker, Pau-pe-waub, and Chief Joseph Charrett, Wain-ge-ma-dub, took part in the program. They spoke in the Chippewa tongue, and their addresses were translated by William Dailey of White Earth, grandson of Mou-zoo-maun-nee.

Chief Andrew Dailey said: "I was 13 years old when the outbreak took place, and remember that tobacco was sent to our tribe by Little Crow to induce us to take up arms against the whites. Mou-zoo-maun-nee, my father, and others stood firm and did not accept, because they were friendly to the whites, as they had been before and were ever after. I am trying to follow in my father's footsteps."

Chief Joseph Charrett, who is 78 years of age, served three years in the civil war as a member of Company G, Ninth Minnesota Volunteer infantry.

Autoless Town no Longer.

Bemidji.—Remer has lost a distinction. A merchant of that village has just bought a touring car and the town is no longer autoless.

Brothers Call Arbitration Board.

Fergus Falls.—Victor Bean and Jesse Bean, brothers, two farmers of the town of Compton, have done much business together, but have kept no accounts of it. When it came to a settlement they could not agree, and finally called in as a board of arbitration J. W. Miller, F. E. Gores and Peter Johnson, three neighbors. Two days were occupied by the board in listening to testimony, after which Victor Bean was awarded $1,111, to be paid by his brother.

TOO LENIENT WITH PHTHISIS

Winona.—Dr. Carrol Fox of Washington, D. C., Federal health expert, who has been working in Minnesota during the past few months, told members of the Southern Minnesota Medical association, in session here, that health authorities have been too lenient with cases of tuberculosis.

"Every case of open tuberculosis should be isolated," he said. "If the patient is left in the same house with other members of the family it is impossible to control the disease. A case of leprosy would cause a panic, yet leprosy is not so communicable as tuberculosis, nor does it kill so many people.

"Co-operation of the legislators, the physicians and the people is necessary to produce the correct results. Yet I know some physicians who would not co-operate. They even dislike having a visiting nurse, because they claim she would interfere with their business.

"It is necessary to find all diseases as soon as possible, and school supervision would help in a large degree to detect these afflictions at the earliest possible moment.

WILL PROTECT GAME BIRDS

Sportsmen of Nicollet and Surrounding Counties Organize Association —Propose New Laws.

St. Peter.—Sportsmen of Nicollet and adjoining counties have organized an association for the protection of game and migratory birds, particularly in the vicinity of Swan Lake. A. G. Bierbaum of New Ulm is president of the association, and the other officers are John Dorn, Nicollet, vice president, and J. H. Spencer, Mankato, secretary and treasurer.

At the meeting when the organization was formed, the principal address was delivered by E. A. Cleasby, of Portage, Wis., district inspector under the Federal migratory game law. He explained the steps being taken by the Department of Agriculture to prevent the extermination of game birds, and severely criticised the Minnesota law which permits a hunter to have 45 upland birds and 50 waterfowl in his possession at any one time. He favored limiting the number to 12.

The new association will aid in the enforcement of game laws, and also endeavor to obtain the enactment of more effective legislation.

TEST PLAN IS DISCARDED

Olmsted County Fails to Support Whole Time Health Official, State Finds.

Rochester.—Failure on the part of Olmsted county, outside of the city, to receive and support the whole time health officer plan will result in the abandoning of the institution by the state board of health, according to Dr. H. G. Lampson, who has resigned as acting health officer of Rochester.

More than two years ago, through the effort of the Civic league of this city, Rochester was selected as the city for a test of the plan. The state board of health offered to pay $1,000 annually toward the project, the Civic league accepted the responsibility of paying $1,000, and the city paid the remaining $1,000. The enterprise was a success in Rochester.

According to the plan of the state board of health, the whole time health officer was to serve the entire county. However, only twenty calls were made upon him outside the city in a year, and only two townships accepted his services as health officer.

PRAISE FOR MINNESOTA PLAN

Federal Public Health Service Indorses State Board Program for Fighting Tuberculosis.

Washington.—Indorsement of the Minnesota state board of health's program for the control of tuberculosis is contained in an August report of the United States public health service. This program, as recently developed, requires the reporting of all cases of tuberculosis, the isolation of every case of open tuberculosis, either in a sanatorium or at home, and the caring for all early cases of the disease in such a way as to prevent its reaching a stage that will become dangerous to others, if possible.

The government report says: "The action of the Minnesota state board of health seems to be one of the most logical and sincere efforts to control the disease made by any health department. The results obtained in Minnesota during the next few years will naturally be watched with much interest by all associated with public health administration."

Zumbro Bass Fishing Good.

Mazeppa.—Bass fishing on the Zumbro has been unusually good the past week. A party which went out last week caught eleven of fairly good size. Other fishing parties also have reported good success. Alvin Wilde caught a 5¼-pound pickerel Sunday, about five miles down the Zumbro. The fish gave him a hard fight, but the size of the capture made up for the trouble. Pickerel have been scarce in local waters of late years, and to catch one is a rarity.

MINNESOTANS IN WAR ZONE

Minneapolis.—Stranded for seven days on the Belgian border and later in Verviers with German airships hovering overhead day and night and with cannons roaring constantly as the Germans tried to take Liege a few miles away, was the tale told in London by Dr. W. H. Aurand of Minneapolis, who, with his wife and son Colvin, and Dr. Robert Rizer of Chicago and his wife and two small children and Miss Metz of the Spencer school, New York, arrived there this week.

The two doctors had been studying in Vienna and caught the last train out of the city when it was swept by the war fever, leaving booked for London via Ostend, Aug. 2. When the party reached the Belgian border the Americans were stranded, but later succeeded in getting to Verviers by wagon. They were permitted to leave on an army wagon by the German army officials after several days' delay.

30 MEETINGS IN TWO DAYS

Owatonna.—Steele county has been covered from end to end by one of the finest corps of better farming evangelists ever brought together in the state of Minnesota. Holding thirty neighborhood meetings in two days, they reached 1,500 farmers with their slogan "alfalfa on every farm," and combined for a big round-up meeting in Owatonna last Tuesday.

As a result of the campaign, the partisans of alfalfa are confident that she will be elected by a large majority in the great dairy county of Steele next year. The interest taken by the farmers was a revelation. Not only the young fellows, but the grizzled veterans of a farming age that is passing turned out to the meetings, took in every word and asked questions that showed they were soaking up the information and thinking about it.

SOUTH STATE DOCTORS MEET

Dr. J. Mayo on Program at Winona—One Hundred and Fifty in Attendance.

Winona.—The Southern Minnesota Medical association held its annual meeting here and 150 physicians were in attendance at the banquet in a local hotel.

After the dinner a meeting was held at the Masonic temple, opened by Dr. William J. Mayo of Rochester with an address on "The Influence of European Surgery Upon American Practice." The rest of the evening was given to a discussion of public health problems. Dr. H. M. Bracken of St. Paul, secretary of the state board of health; Carrol Fox of Washington, D. C., and D. B. Pritchard of Winona spoke.

Friday afternoon the physicians were the guests of the Doctors Mayo of Rochester on the surgeons' excursion steamer Oronoco.

GIRDERS FALL, CRUSHING MEN

Minneapolis.—One man is dead and another is believed to be fatally injured as a result of the falling of a load of steel girders from the nineteenth story of the First National-Soo line building, which is under course of construction. The boom which was hoisting the great load gave way, causing the accident.

A car on the Fourth avenue line was stopped just in time to save the lives of some fifty passengers, who were panic stricken when they heard the awful crash. The impact of the iron on the paved street was so terrific as to knock the motorman insensible for a time.

Two horses, used by an employe on the building, were killed.

U. S. Files Amended Complaints.

Fergus Falls.—The United States government filed 338 amended complaints in the Federal court here in cases brought to cancel titles to land sold by Indians to white purchasers, the allegations being that the Indians had no right to sell. In the amended complaint, the government alleges that the white buyers have been stripping the lands of timber under color of pretended title, and asks that the courts issue an order forbidding further cutting and compelling an accounting for the amounts already out.

Gun Club for Rochester.

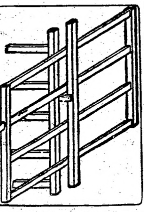
Rochester. — Rochester sportsmen have reorganized the Rochester Gun club, following an active campaign for members, and the new organization starts out with a large number of followers of the hunting game. Weekly shoots are being held on Gun club hill, where some excellent scores are made with clay pigeons. Officers of the club are Spencer Knapp, president; Allen Purlow, vice president; Dr. T. D. Abernathy, treasurer, and Dr. A. P. Kilbourne, field captain.

MOST HANDY GATE FOR FARM

If Well Made It Does Not Get Out of Order and Swings About as Easily as Any Other Kind.

There are probably more farm gates made in the manner shown by the illustration here than any other kind, says Wisconsin Agriculturist. If well made, such gates last long, do not get out of order, and swing about as easily as any kind to be found.

This gate hangs on a cleat between two posts set eight inches apart, and one six inches ahead of the other. It opens by sliding it back and swinging it around. A large bolt through both posts will allow easy sliding of the gate, and when it is pushed back three or four feet the weight is so evenly hung on the cleat or bolt that there is little lifting to be done, the gate being balanced over the cleat or rod between the posts. When the gate is shut, the free end fits in between two other posts, resting upon a cleat so that it is off the ground. It pays to make a good, strong, well-braced gate while we are at the job. Such a one will last for years.



Handy, Inexpensive Gate.

FEEDING THE YOUNG CHICKS

Nothing Given to the Little Fellows Until Two Days Old—Give First Feeds Sparingly.

(By C. E. BROWN.)

We do not feed little chicks before they are two days old, but from the beginning give them water. During this period the hen is given her food out of reach of the little ones. The first feeds are given sparingly every two hours, and are usually wet mashes.

After the third day, we feed some of the cracked grains, a little at a time, till, at the end of the fifth or sixth day, we are giving only two feeds a day of the mash, and three feeds of the cracked grain. Occasionally we give a little whole wheat, and by the end of eight weeks we are feeding most of the grains whole. If the chicks are unable to get worms or insects in sufficient quantities, they must be supplied with a substitute, such as milk or beef scraps. Green feed is given in the form of finely-chopped lettuce, a piece of potato or turnip or mangel when they are not able to run outside on the grass.

CHEAPEST OF CATTLE FOODS

Beef can be produced in Nebraska at a lower cost and with greater profit on a combination of the corn plant and alfalfa hay than on any other combination of foods available in the state. According to experiments carried on at the university farm of Nebraska, corn silage is worth 60 per cent more a ton than shredded corn stover (stalks) when each is fed with corn meal and alfalfa. Corn stover, however, has a value 80 per cent as great as prairie hay, and the portion consumed is fully as valuable. Prairie hay at its usual market price is not profitable for fattening cattle.

In growing calves to be fattened for the market, the cheapest gains were found to be made on a liberal ration of corn silage and alfalfa without grain, the cost of grains increasing in proportion to the amount of corn meal fed.

OBJECTS OF SOIL TILLAGE

Principal Reasons Are to Provide Growing Place for Desired Crop and Destroy Weeds.

Speaking in a broad way, drainage and any similar operation might be included under soil tillage; but, in the usual acceptance of the term, "soil tillage" refers only to the operations necessary to the preparation of cultivable soil for the planting of crops, and to the subsequent processes necessary in bringing these crops to maturity. The principal reasons for all care and tillage of the soil are: To provide a home or growing place for the desired crop; to liberate plant food; to conserve soil moisture; and to destroy weeds. With proper tillage we are able to overcome or modify adverse climatic conditions, and by it we may improve conditions already favorable.

Proves a Poor Policy.

Experiments at the Iowa station indicate clearly that hogging down ripe small grain is poor policy, owing to the waste. Sometimes not more than 15 cents a bushel is got for small grain handled in this way. With corn it is different, for the hogging down of corn pays well.

EARTH'S MOST LONELY SPOTS

Though scientific progress has made it possible to do double journey between England and America in a fortnight, there remain many islands with which it takes years to communicate.

Off the Scottish coast are the groups of islands known as the Hebrides, Orkneys and Shetlands. Of these the most isolated island is St. Kilda, some three miles long and two miles broad. The inhabitants lead lives of great loneliness, for it takes a month to get to the next island, and the sea often makes any communication with St. Kilda impossible for months.

The group of eight Phoenix islands in the Pacific has a total population of only 158, while another little bit of the British empire is Fanning island. This is a landing place for the Pacific submarine cable, and usually there are about one hundred people in the place.

The loneliest of all parts of British territory is the Island of Tristan Da Cunha in the South Atlantic, which is also the smallest inhabited island in the empire. It is 1,800 miles from land, has a population of 74 Scottish Americans, and the inhabitants get news of the outer world usually once every two years.

FACE FULL OF PIMPLES

4240 So. California Ave., Chicago, Ill. —"About a year ago my face was full of pimples and red spots. To sleep one night without itching was almost impossible. Some of the pimples would get big and red and if I touched them they would pain, while others would get white heads on them and when they broke open some matter came out. They would burn and itch and I scratched them so that sometimes they would break and bleed. That always caused them to be worse.

"I bought all kinds of salves and creams and I found out that they did me no good. I noticed the Cuticura Soap and Ointment advertisement and I sent for a free sample. I went to the drug store and bought a cake of Cuticura Soap and some Cuticura Ointment and I found the pimples were drying out. In two months I was well." (Signed) Chas. J. Peck, May 7, 1914.

Forgetful Vacationist.

The family had gone off for their holiday in a taxi. Twenty minutes later the taxi snorted back up the road.

"Forgotten the tickets?" cried a neighbor.

"No," said the irate householder, "but my wife's just remembered that she's left a kettle boiling on the gas stove."

He dived into the house, and came back the next moment with a ghastly calm on his face.

"All right now?" said the neighbor cheerily.

"Right! I'd forgotten that I'd turned the gas off at the meter—and now we've two hours and a half to wait for the next train."

Not to Blame.

"What shall we do, John," said the farmer's wife, who had retained much of her sentiment through 25 years of married life, "what shall we do to celebrate our silver wedding?"

"Reckon up where all the silver's gone to in bringing up our family," grumbled he.

"Oh, no, John, it must be something real good and out of the ordinary. I tell you what. Let us kill the fattest pig and give a banquet."

"Maria," said the husband solemnly, "I don't see how the unfortunate animal is to blame for what happened 25 years ago."

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHY I MARRIED AGAIN

PERHAPS the calendar hanging above my desk, telling me what day of the month this is, has set me thinking of the reason that led to my second marriage. For this is the anniversary of my first wedding day. It seems strange that I should remember this, and that there is nobody to whom I can talk of the thoughts that the date brings to me.

Ernest and I were absurdly happy, our friends said. Maybe they were right, but I did not see any absurdity in our bliss. My husband's income was a comfortable one, but not large. I suppose we could have saved money, but we did not try to, and lived up to every cent we had.

"Why should we bother?" Ernest would ask merrily. "I'm sure of my job, and it brings us in enough to give us a good time and to pay as we go. Since we have each other, why not make the most of all the happiness that comes to us? When we begin to grow old we can being to save."

Yes, it was a care-free, happy life. I had left college, expecting to support myself, and began by writing an occasional story to earn a little money. I was, in fact, a poor girl when I married. My parents were dead and an aunt in the West had cared for and educated me until she died, leaving me with sufficient money to take me to New York, where I had a few friends and where I determined to make my living by my pen. How easy it sounds, and how easy I thought it was before I knew life!

But I did not have to earn the precarious living then for, during the first fortnight in New York, while I was still staying with the friends who took me in until I could look for a suitable boarding place, I met Ernest. Ours was, I suppose, what people call " a case of love at first sight." We had a short engagement, and had the prognostications of our acquaintances proved true, we would have repented at leisure. But we never did. For five perfect years we were the happiest couple in the world. We had a dainty little apartment and kept one excellent servant. In society we had friends who liked us; at home, we had each other. Our honeymoon lasted five times twelve months.

And then Ernest died. It was all so sudden that I felt as if he had slipped away into the Great Unknown without stopping to wave me a last good-by. I suppose I was numbed and dazed, for I did not cry out nor make a moan. I remember wondering how Ernest could do such a thing when he knew that he was all I had. He might have waited long enough, I thought, to tell me that he was going, and what I was to do without him. I almost envied him because he was spared the loneliness to which he had left me.

Anyone who has been through a crushing sorrow knows the misery of the obsession of petty thoughts. It is as if one's true self were made unconscious by the blow, and only the small, weak, and trival side of one's nature asserted itself.

The night before they buried Ernest I was left alone with him—except for the servant asleep in her room. My friends had been very kind and had attended to everything for me. I suppose they thought that it was all right to leave as calm a woman as I seemed alone on this last night. I have remembered that often since then when I have heard people declare that someone in sorrow "is wonderfully quiet and brave." How little they know! But I was glad my friends thought this of me. After they had coaxed me to go to bed, and all had gone away, I got up, put on slippers and wrapper, and went into the little parlor where Ernest lay. As I gazed at him I could at first only remember how handsome he had looked on the last evening we had spent alone together. He had taken me out to dinner and I had chided him, laughingly, for ordering so many good things, "just for me." He had insisted that when he dined "with the sweetest woman in the land," he liked her to eat the best things he could afford. He had looked at me as he said this, lifted his glass of champagne to his lips, and drank my health, the smile I loved to see brightening his face and lighting his eyes. Now, for an awful moment, I looked down on his closed eyes. Then the truth came to me, and I felt that he was dead.

Nobody ever knew what that appreciation or realization meant to me. The whole world changed while I was alone in that little parlor, before I crept back at daylight to my own room. God was very far off and did not seem to hear or care. And Ernest was dead.

My friends helped me find a four-room and bath apartment in an unfashionable street. It was up four flights of stairs, as the higher one went the cheaper it was. Only "flat-houses" were on that block, and the street swarmed with children—most of them the small sons and daughters of the janitors. The courts were narrow and I used to hear the neighbors talking across the air shaft. Sometimes they quarreled, and the sounds of altercation disgusted me. It was like another world from that to which I had been accustomed. My only life in an apartment had been in that to which Ernest had taken me when we were married—a small apartment, to be sure, but in a handsome house overlooking the river. Now I was a poor woman. Yet I did not feel that we had made a mistake in saving nothing for such a contingency as the one that had arisen. While I lived, I lived, I reminded myself. I had had my day.

I fed my physical being with enough tasteless food to keep it alive. I suppose that self-preservation is one of the great laws of nature that work while we are unconscious of them.

I did not want to meet my friends of happier days, and, in my deep dejection, I did not make them very welcome when they ran in to call on me. I felt uncomfortable when the few women who came reminded me of how far I lived from my old haunts and from their present homes, so I did not urge them to repeat their first calls. Men do not seem to mind one's surroundings, in fact scarcely appear to notice them. And one does not feel that one must apologize to a man when he has to take a long trip to call on one. So when Charlie Borden, a young reporter to whom my husband had been kind, got into the habit of running in to see me every week, I showed him that he was welcome. He took me out to supper occasionally on Sunday evenings, or for a walk on Sunday afternoons. These calls and outings made a break in my round of work, for I was writing now for my living—or trying to. I know the boy was sorry for me, and one evening he said so. We had returned from taking supper in a downtown restaurant, and found the apartment dark and cold. He shivered as he lighted the gas in my tiny reception room and heard the wind howl at the windows.

"It's dreary here for you," he said, with embarrassment. "I don't suppose you care to hear me say so, but I have a heartache when I think how lonely you must be sometimes. And I can't help thinking of what a dandy home you had and how happy you were—before he went."

"Don't!" I said sharply. "Don't talk about it!"

I feared that I had hurt the boy and told him I was sorry. He murmured confusedly something about "wishing he could do anything to make things easier."

"You do," I said gratefully, "by coming to see me."

After that he came twice a week instead of once. I did not object. I liked the lad and remembered that Ernest had been fond of him. I was at my desk most of the day except when I went downtown to try to sell something I had written. I could not work all the day and all the evening, too, and I found Charlie a diversion.

But one spring evening, coming in and finding me sitting alone in the twilight, he told me that he loved me. At first I was shocked, then angry, then bored. I tried to be kind and explain that I was ten years older than he, a woman of the world, while he was a mere boy. He thought that he was horribly hurt. He did not call again for a month, and then but once, until the following October when he came in to tell me about his engagement to "the dearest little girl ever." I congratulated him, and he looked more confused than when he had told me he loved me, as he asked me to "try to forget the foolish mistake he had made last spring." I tried to make him believe that I had forgotten it weeks ago.

I have mentioned this little affair because Charlie Borden was the first man who showed me, after my husband's death, that my life was a rather complex problem. There were, of course, other men, for there are always men for the women who enjoy them and are good comrades. I was not handsome, nor even pretty. But I like men and they have always been kind to me. I met many of them at this stage of my existence, and to their encouragement and interest in my work I owed the fact that I got enough writing to keep soul and body together, and to dress the latter in decent clothes. Black is always a safe garb and I bought only that which was in good style and took excellent care of it.

I learned very soon in my lonely career that if one would succeed, one must appear successful. That I had not known that fact earlier was, perhaps, the reason one editor looked at me patronizingly when I offered him a story.

"Do you write because you like to write?" he asked bluntly.

"No," I said tremulously, "because I need the money."

"I see," he replied. "I doubt if you can do just the kind of stuff we want for this magazine. But I will look over your story."

It came back to me in a few days with a printed slip.

Later, after I had had more practice and had acquired a kind of "knack," my work provided me with an income that kept my rent paid, my body fed and garbed. But I had to be careful of every cent, and the constant effort to suit the notions and idiosyncrasies of magazine editors wore on my nerves and spirits. I would come home elated one day, but horribly depressed the next. There were periods of discouragement when I almost gave up hope of making my living with my pen. At one of these times I spoke my thought to my best man friend. Will Mason was older than I, and successful in his profession. He knew much of the publishing business and was in touch with many editors. I have often thought that had he not steered me through that first year I would never have had the courage to continue. Late one afternoon I called at a magazine office to offer to the editor an article I had in mind. I had never met this editor before, and he was not a gentleman. As I unfolded my plan he threw himself back in his chair with a contemptuous laugh.

"None of that in ours!" he declared roughly. "We don't want that stale kind of stuff in our publication."

I felt my cheeks burn as I took the elevator to the street. It was dusk as I left the building, and I actually staggered with a dumb nausea and revolt against the life I was leading. I felt as if I had been begging, instead of offering to do honorable work. I did not take a car, but walked slowly uptown. "I can't stand this kind of thing any longer!" I muttered over and over.

I repeated the declaration to Will Mason when he called on me that evening. "I would rather take in washing than hawk manuscripts around!" I said.

He shook his head, although there was a gleam of sympathy in his eyes. "Don't talk like that," he protested. "You couldn't wash a pocket handkerchief properly! You're up against it all right, but you'll have to play the game out, child. I'll help all I can by standing on the side lines and cheering."

He did. It was he who told me that I needed self-confidence, that I should seem brave even if I wasn't. After that I tried to be brave, and I was, I suppose, for things began to grow brighter.

An editor offered me a hundred dollars for a short story I had written. A hundred dollars! And I did need the money so badly! I was so much excited over this piece of good fortune that I called Will Mason up at his office and told him of it. He seemed as much pleased as I was and suggested that I meet him that evening and dine with him in celebration of the event. Perhaps it was unconventional, for Will is a married man, but I did not stop to think of that, and I accepted. Will was kind to me, and had a great bunch of violets at my place at dinner. We had a little table away off in a secluded corner of the downtown hotel and had a merry time.

A week later a woman whom I knew came to see me and told me that Mrs. Mason had heard that I had dined with her husband and was angry. That evening Will came to call and I told him frankly what I had heard.

"Please explain the matter to your wife," I urged.

He shrugged his shoulders and laughed. "Why should I? She resents the fact that I took you out to dinner. I saw a friend of hers in the restaurant that evening. Had I seen her earlier, we would have gone somewhere else."

"But—why?" I asked. "There was no harm in my dining with you, an old friend."

"Of course not. But people don't want to believe the best, but the worst. And if there had been any harm in it, whose business would it have been anyway?"

"Your wife's and mine!" I flashed out hotly.

He rose to his feet with a forced laugh. "Your ideas are as narrow as Mrs. Mason's," he said curtly. "I supposed you were a more sensible woman. Good night!"

I was alone once more. I was tired, and my head ached. My little parlor was deadly dull. Was this all there was to be in my life? A pleasant friendship was spoiled. And yet what could I have done to keep it and my self-respect at the same time? But I was horribly lonely. Not only did I have nobody to love me, but, worse still, I had nobody to love. I had given my husband my all, and now my heart was turned back upon itself.

But I had my work, I remembered, and after this I wrought at it with feverish intensity. I took my next article to an editor whom I had met several times, and he ordered some other work from me. He wanted to talk it over with me, he said. Would I go out and lunch with him, and we could discuss it while we were eating and drinking?

I flushed uncomfortably, for I knew he had a wife. He laughed merrily as I tried, stammeringly, to "wonder if it was all right."

"It's only business, you know," he said. "I often ask some woman writer to lunch with me while we talk magazine work. My wife likes me to do so, for then I eat a decent meal instead of bolting a sandwich and coffee at a quick-indigestion lunch counter."

I breathed freely and murmured, "Thank you." Then, and often since then, I have wondered why nearly all the nice men are married. For they are. I thought so at that time. I knew it later when a young fellow whom I had met at a friend's house on one of the rare calls I made during my lonely life, and who often came to see me, told me that he was going abroad that summer. I spoke out the thought that arose immediately to my mind.

"How lovely for you! But how I shall miss you!"

"Miss me?" he asked, in some surprise.

"Yes," I declared. "I shall miss you and all the kind things you have done for me. It has been nice to have someone to bring me the newest novel, or a box of candy, or some one of the many things that women like—and which of late I have had to do without."

I was tired, and as I spoke one of the waves of cruel remembrance, such as all bereaved persons know, swept over me. I suppose there were tears in my eyes, for I had for the moment forgotten the lad who stood near me. I was recalled to the present by a hand on my shoulder.

"I am sorry," the young fellow was saying, "for making you feel like this. I never fancied you cared for me except as you might care for a brother!"

When I had explained and the discomfited youth had gone, I sank down upon my couch and laughed, then cried. But the cry lasted longer than the laugh. Yes, all the nice men were married, and most of the unmarried men were fools!

To the lonely and sad hearted the winter is not the dreariest time, if we except the holiday season. At least it is not the dreariest time if one lives in town. One can pull down the shades, turn on the lights, and read at night. But the summer, with the windows open and the hucksters making hideous sounds all day, with the children and noisy groups laughing and talking on the sidewalks far into the night—all these add horrors to loneliness. And one cannot walk off these horrors by a swift tramp through the open air. The streets are hot and dusty, and one is unspeakably tired.

I appreciated all this as I walked up Broadway one July noon. I had just secured an order for another article that would mean a hundred dollars. I had also, several months ago, taken the editorship of a woman's department on a magazine, and this would bring me in a small check each month. But any enthusiasm in my work was growing faint, for I had never really loved it. What was it all for? I asked myself. Just to keep up the same round and grind, month after month, year after year. There was nothing else to look forward to—nothing else!

The thought of marrying again had, of course, come to my mind once in a while, but I had put it from me as something unutterably abhorrent. To my way of thinking the widow who married again had never loved her first husband. I mused on this fact for the twentieth time as I strolled slowly uptown on that hot noon. I was brought to the present and my surroundings by a pleasant voice speaking my name. In front of me stood a man whom I had met the year of my marriage, and who had left New York while I was still a bride. I had always liked him, and meeting him just now, when I was morbid and depressed, gave me the feeling that he was an old friend. His hair was grayer than when I had last seen him, he was handsomer for the flesh he had gained, and he had the well-groomed look of a prosperous man. He fell into step beside me, and, after asking a few questions about myself and my work, told me that he was now settled definitely in New York and was glad to renew our acquaintance. Might he call?

Thus began a friendship that was a help and stimulus to me. For the first time since I had been alone I was the happy possessor of a man friend who was old enough to be my adviser and yet unattached and under no obligations to wife, mother, or sister. He was good company, and we had many delightful open-air excursions together. Days in the Bronx woods, trips up the Sound, afternoon teas together—all rested and refreshed me. This man was a great reader and excellent critic, and would suggest gently and tactfully this or that improvement in my style. He read my work as fast as it was published, and talked of it with an interest that was comforting to my lonely heart. Perhaps what appealed to me most was that he was, like myself, lonely. His mother had died the year before, he had no near relatives, and he had been away from New York so long that he had gotten out of touch with many of his friends, even had they been in town at this time of year. I got to depending upon him for companionship, and I knew that he turned to me for rest and sympathy.

So it was natural that I should have a feeling almost like jealousy when, in the late autumn, he told me that several of his old friends had looked him up and had invited him to their houses for two evenings of the following week. I lay awake far into that night reasoning with myself and chiding myself. Why had I let myself lean on this man's friendship? Did I love him? No—a thousand times no; if I compared the feeling I had for him with that which I had given my husband! Did I want to marry him? Again, no! But how I would miss him when his friends claimed him, as I was sure they would do now that they had found him! What a weak fool I had been to let myself become so dependent upon this man for companionship! And now all the awful loneliness would come back to me, worse than ever, if that were possible!

Several days passed before I saw him again. One Sunday evening he called as usual. It was good to hear his pleasant voice, to feel his cordial hand clasp, to talk of the things that interested us both.

Perhaps he and I were thinking the same thoughts, for suddenly he sighed

"Do you know," he said, "that I have missed you miserably this week? And yet I have seen you twice."

I made no reply. His face and tone were serious as he added: "I have accepted three invitations for the coming week, and I find myself wishing they were all from you."

"I wish so, too," was my unexpected response.

He looked at me keenly. "Have you missed me?" he questioned abruptly.

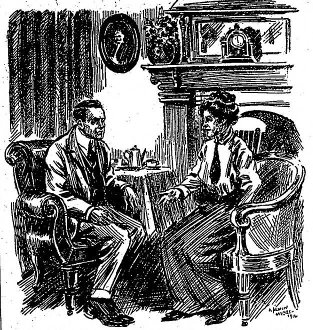
"Yes."

He had risen to his feet, as had I. He stood in front of me looking me straight in the eyes.

"Will you be my wife?" he asked, without further preamble.

I was no longer a young girl to start and blush. I was simply a superfluous woman, and a lonely one. I answered his question with another: "Do you love me?"

He took my hands in both of his. "I hardly know," he said slowly, "what is meant by love. I care more for you than for any other woman; I admire you; I find you are the best companion and comrade in the world. I miss you and long for you when I am not with you. I am proud to be the friend of a woman with your mind, your courage, your tact. And I am not a foolish boy, but a man of forty. You have known one perfect love, so I do not ask you if you love me, but I believe you are fond of me. I hope I may make your life happy. Will you marry me?"



HE THOUGHT THAT HE WAS HORRIBLY HURT

I saw opening before me a door into a brighter world, into a lighted place away from the black desolation, the monotonous dreariness, the fear of loneliness and of a long, solitary life. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps has said "Fear is the multiple of suffering." I had proved the truth of this. In the open doorway I saw standing a man whom I liked, who was congenial, who would care for me, and who would let me care for him. And I put my hand in his and turned to the lighted door.

Do I regret it? No.

Am I happy? Does any human being have in this world more than one period of complete happiness?

KING OF DUELISTS NO MORE

Death Removes Etienne Laberdesque, a Picturesque Figure of French Capital.

M. Etienne Laberdesque is dead and the boulevards of Paris are poorer by reason of his passing, remarks the Kansas City Star. For Laberdesque was the most picturesque of modern swash-bucklers, and he might well have strutted in the muddy streets of Paris what time M. Francois Villon and his friends made those streets unsafe after nightfall.

A sort of Twentieth-Century D'Artagnan, this Laberdesque bristling for duels with whoever failed to please his fancy. He should undoubtedly have worn doublet and feathered cap, and a sword might very fittingly have been a part of his everyday costume. As it was he knew how to use a sword as well as any man in Paris, and he kept his skill from growing rusty.

Consider, if you will, how he fought five duels with five friends of M. Max Regis, mayor of Algiers, and when the five had been conquered, fought a two day's duel with the mayor himself. Name of a name! This was a man out of the heart of romance.

Of course, those duels were not too bloody; but on the second day the mayor was pricked upon the arm a smart touch, and the blood spurted beautifully, and the seconds rushed in, and fell to disagreeing and challenging one another, and the spectators took sides and shouted epithets and defiances at one another; ay, 'twas a most vociferous affair!

"I fought you to show I was not afraid of your sword. You are, nevertheless, an assassin."

Whereupon Laberdesque challenged him to another duel.

"Though his clothes were the prosaic garb of modernity," says the London Globe, speaking of Laberdesque, his spirit belonged to the days of cloak and ruffle, when men drew swords on a quarrel and spitted their opponents deftly. He was the hero of more than a hundred duels. Tall and broad, with a brown face, he swaggered along the boulevards a few years ago, ready to pick a quarrel with any one whose presence was obnoxious to him and ask for satisfaction at the point of the sword. His manner was grandiloquent and authoritative.

"When he lifted his slouch hat with a medieval flourish, you could almost see a cloak and sword behind his lounge suit. He rolled his name grandly as he delivered his challenge to those who were luckless enough to merit his anger. 'Laber-r-desque,' he would say.

"Laberdesque was born in Cuba of a Spanish mother. He quarreled with his family at the age of eighteen and went to fight in the Venezuelan revolution. When a revolution was threatened in Cuba he turned there, and in the course of three years fought forty-three duels with saber, pistol and yataghan. His father succeeded in shipping him off to France, where he enlisted in the Spahis. He had astonishing strength and was capable, it is said, even of carrying his own tired horse on his back after being carried about by it all day."

After leaving the army, Laberdesque founded a club in Paris which he called "Les Mousquetaires." All the members were accomplished swordsmen, and they made it their business to maintain a censorship of Parisan society. When the Mousquetaires decided that a man wouldn't do at all they sent him a challenge, and he had either to leave Paris or take a chance of being run through the body. To keep in practise the members of the club used notched swords—swords with the points bare, but a notch of wood an inch below, so that though one might wound an opponent, he could not make a wound more than an inch deep.

Among his friends Laberdesque was noted not only for his bravery, but for his lavish generosity. What belonged to him belonged to his friends. And how he loved to gather a little knot of listeners around him and with magnificent gesture, rolling voice and flashing eye recount his adventures to them! There was a naive, childlike vanity about the man that quite disarmed his hearers and made his braggadocio the most delightful extravaganza.

He was just past 40 when he died, but he had certainly succeeded in cramming a world of living into those 40 years. One of his last duels was with M. Messimy, against whom he ran for a seat in the French chamber of deputies. Messimy boxed Laberdesque's ears in a public meeting and, of course, nothing but blood could wipe out an insult like that. They met and M. Messimy was disarmed by the famous thrust to the arm, not much more painful or dangerous than a barb wire cut. Honor was avenged.

Laberdesque leaves a widow, who was the Marquise del Flores, a beauty of Cuban and Spanish descent. She was a kinswoman of the Spanish ambassador to France.

A Wayfarer's Ruse.

"Please, mum, could I trouble you for a bottle of wine and a plate of pate de foie gras?"

"What!"

"I merely said that, mum, to prove to you that I have seen better days. A few cold biscuits will do."

Ragtime.

Mr. Flatte—That was the best piece of ragtime I have heard on our piano-player, dear.

Mrs. Flatte—Well, that was one of those porous plasters I got in there by mistake.

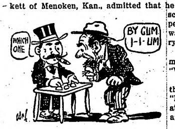
KANSAS CITY, MO.—"Experience is a dear school, but many profit thereby." This is a liberal translation of an old Latin proverb, and Bascom Truskett of Menoken, Kan., admitted that he had learned something in the dear school of experience when he appeared at the welfare loan agency and wanted to deposit $7 with Ralph Perry, manager of that department.



"What do you want to leave your money here for?" asked Mr. Perry. "Why not leave it at some bank?"

"There's a circus in town, that's the reason," replied Truskett firmly. "It'll be here fer two days, too. I ain't takin' no chances o' gettin' skint again by them sharpers."

"I don't understand," said Perry.

"Well," Truskett elucidated, "ye see Menoken is not fur from Topeka, and whenever a circus comes there business in Menoken closes and everybody goes in to the circus. But when we all get back home and each feller concludes to tell the truth, them as wasn't pickpocketed out o' their roll lost it trying to find which one o' three shells a little black ball was under. And I never heard o' anyone pickin' the right shell from our neighborhood. Now, I intend to see this circus, and if I git pickpocketed the pesky brutes won't git nothin'."

"Then you don't intend to try to find the little black ball under the shell any more?" asked Perry.

"Not me," replied Truskett. "I've been there before."

"How much do you want on the $7?" asked Perry.

"Jest gimme a nickel on it," smiled Truskett. "I've got enough to see the show, but I ain't takin' no chances."

A pledge ticket for 5 cents was made out in the regular way and the ticket and nickel given to the wise man from Menoken, Kan.

CHICAGO.—Frederick Krueger is a mild-mannered clerk in a downtown department store and resides at 4313 Lake Park avenue. There are times when he has wished that he could relieve the even tenor of his daily life by being the hero of a thrilling adventure. The other day the adventure came.

THEY STOLE MY CLOTHES

In common with other citizens, Mr. Krueger felt the heat that afternoon and decided to take a swim. He chose the lake at Forty-second street. His garments he placed on the breakwater. Then he plunged in.

While he was puffing joyously in the lake two men alighted from a passing freight train. They observed the Krueger apparel. In a minute or two more they were hurrying westward with a pair of pearl gray trousers.

Some ten minutes later Sergt. Edward Balder of the Hyde Park station saw a barrel approaching rapidly up Forty-third street on a pair of human legs. Investigation proved Mr. Krueger to be inside.

Mr. Krueger explained. The sergeant permitted him to go home and went in search of the trousers.

Floorwalker Gasps as Shoplifter Steals Washtub

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.—Washtubs of all shapes and sizes were strewn over the counters of one of Birmingham's stores the other morning, and huge placards announced the sale of these tubs at prices in no way commensurate with their size. The tubs were large and the prices small, so the washerwomen of Birmingham deserted their irons—on a nice day for ironin', too—and hied them to the store for purchases.

A black wave swept over and around the washtubs. The clerks were enveloped and the tubs began to disappear; the purchasers "toted" away the tubs, with smiles adorning their faces. One washerwoman, carrying weight for age, had formed part of the dark-hued rush, but left the crowd after a few minutes in the midst of the seething fray.

She carried no washtub. From her size it seemed she had all the weight she could carry. She was passing down one of the aisles and was almost clear of the rush, when there was a jam. A floor walker was also caught in the aisle between the huge cleaner of soiled linen and a counter.

The sharp edge of the counter pressed into one side, and he leaned toward the dark weight on his left, expecting to find it softer. Instead, a sharp circular edge threatened to cut him off at the hips. Surprised, he reached to save himself and his hand encountered the rim of a washtub. The washerwoman had her tub, but it was under her skirt and not under her arm.

The tub was removed and the washerwoman went back to her ironin' with a reprimand, but without the tub.

Ban on Sugar Cane, But New China Doesn't Care

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Broad grins and knowing winks predominated the other day in Chinatown when it became known that Uncle Sam, through his department of agriculture, has banned the succulent sugar cane, with its cheap sweetness, from importation into the country from Hawaii, Porto Rico and all foreign countries.

Yee Chung Tai, a leader among the score of proprietors of corner stands where are sold tobacco, fruits, candy, abalone and sugar cane, was the first to learn of the new order.

It was explained that the government has decreed that there are "injurious insects and fungous diseases" in the sugar cane, and when it finally became plain to Yee that this meant bugs, he expressed his own opinion in what might pass for an ingenious way.

But the spread of the news failed to disturb the equanimity of the district. Instead of mourning there was joy. A hundred Chinese repeated the report and walked to the nearest stand, where they purchased—sugar cane? No—chewing tobacco.

If we can't chew our sugar cane, because bugs won't allow it, well, we might as well learn to chew tobacco, was the prevailing sentiment.

In this wise did the march of progress catch up with Young China by eliminating the succulent sugar cane.

PRINCE OSCAR, KAISER'S FIFTH SON

The great war in Europe has cut short the honeymoon of Prince Oscar, the fifth son of the kaiser, and his countess. The prince was married recently to Countess Basewitz, daughter of Count Basewitz-Levetzow.

Prince Oscar is a captain of the Potsdam foot guards, and was born on July 27, 1888. He received the usual rigorous military instruction in his early years, as did his other brothers.

Prince Oscar first became acquainted with his bride when she was in attendance upon his mother, the kaiserin, as a maid of honor. His interest in the countess attracted the notice of the kaiser, and shortly afterward she left the royal entourage and returned to her home in Mecklenburg.

At first the emperor is said to have been resolutely opposed to his son's desire to marry the countess, thus breaking the tradition of the royal family by marrying beneath his rank. The emperor finally consented to the match and the engagement was officially announced from the royal palace on May 26, of this year. It is understood that the consent of the kaiser was obtained only through the intercession of the kaiserin.

In accordance with tradition, the kaiser conferred upon the countess a higher rank than that she is entitled to by her birth, although she will never be able to call herself a princess of Prussia or enjoy all the privileges of the royal family. The consent of the kaiser was necessary to the ceremony, as, upon attaining his majority, Prince Oscar had to agree in writing, like the other members of the Hohenzollern family, not to marry without the approval of the kaiser.

HEIR TO AUSTRO-HUNGARIAN THRONE

Since the tragedy by which Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir apparent to the Austro-Hungarian throne, was removed by an assassin in Bosnia, a remarkable phase of the changed conditions is the wave of popularity now raging about his young nephew, who suddenly finds himself confronted with the prospect of soon being emperor of Austria and king of Hungary.

As the new heir apparent, Archduke Carl Francis Joseph, appears already to have won a more affectionate regard from his people than his uncle had, and quite as warm a place in the hearts of many as his great-uncle enjoys. Everybody seems proud of him and confident of his future success as a ruler.

At twenty-seven years of age he finds himself with little more than a military training. He was only a junior regimental officer when the news of his uncle's death reached him. He began as a cavalry lieutenant and was most popular among his comrades, who never felt that an imperial highness and future monarch was in their corps. He performed his duties with the utmost exactness and was just as punctilious in his behavior to the senior officers as any young subaltern. No duty was too small. He carried out the routine work most carefully and when he heard of his young comrades grumbling would merely say, "What do you expect—orders are orders?"

A REGULAR BOOKWORM

Representative Gordon Lee of Georgia is something like the measles in his talent for "breaking out." A few weeks ago he lingered in his office until the dewy shades of evening gathered over the restaurant across the way. When he tried to open the door, it had slipped the bolt, and Lee was a prisoner.

Banging and calling did no good, for the legislative halls seemed deserted. By the feelings far down in his stomach he knew it was time for dinner. The shadows began to creep over the table and he thought it time to say at least "Ishkabibble," if not express himself in stronger language.

Unless he wanted to remain over night a prisoner in the midst of luxury, Lee knew it was up to him to do something. There was a door opening into a committee room which communicated with this, but a bookcase was reared against it. Lee pulled that out, opened the door, and there in the other room was another case of huge proportions. So he pushed out one row of books and began to squeeze through. Tipping the scales at 240, Lee is no featherweight, and it was surely some sight to see him squirming through—but only the brave deserve the dinner—and Lee got home in time for the soup.

QUEEN WILHELMINA OF HOLLAND

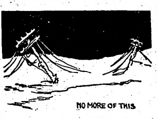
"Little Wilhelmina," often termed "the poor little queen," who is beloved by every Dutch subject and the most admired woman member of Europe's royalty, stands as one lone figure in the terrible conflict that threatens to overturn the whole of Europe. Austria has always been her friend and kindly feelings have existed between Servia and the country of dikes. Russia and England, as well as France, have shown no hostility to her recently, and while officially the friendliest possible relations exist between Germany and Holland, still the little country has always been afraid of the eagle.

Queen Wilhelmina is the last descendant of the long row of noble men and in her is centered the hope of the Dutch nation, which still remembers with deep gratitude the part played in the Netherlands' history when her ancestor, prince of Orange-Nassau, defended their liberty against the Spanish oppressors, and, by his personal courage, saved the Dutch Protestants from complete annihilation.

WASHINGTON CITY SIDELIGHTS

Washington and Boston Connected by a Subway

WASHINGTON.—At last Washington and Boston are connected by a subway. That is rather startling, is it not? A very few knew such a project was under way. It is not a great big tunnel, however, and is not designed for passengers and freight, but is for the telephone lines between these two cities and the hundreds of intermediate points.



NO MORE OF THIS

The crying necessity for this subway was emphasized at the time of the inauguration of President Taft in 1909 when the national capital was cut off from communication with the outside world for several hours by a severe sleet storm. The interruption in the service caused the telephone companies a heavy loss in revenues as well as in expenses for repairs, and plans were made during those awful hours for just exactly such a subway as is now being completed.

It has been found much cheaper to dig a trench for the wires than to string them over a line of poles, and the economy has been emphasized by the shortage of timber suitable for telephone poles, and then the very great advantage is that service can never be interrupted by storms as the overhead wires are. It is said that along each cable it is possible to conduct 99 telephone conversations at once and to send, at the same time, 296 telegraph messages.

In building the subway a trench was used which crawls along the right of way, leaving a trough large enough for the cables. Wherever streams were crossed the conduits are carried through creosoted ducts suspended from the bridges, or else in pipes which cross on the bridges. Pipes are only used in places where the bridges are liable to be submerged by spring freshets. At ordinary crossings iron is not used, because it rusts away and is liable to cause short circuit and to break down in the course of time.

Monkeys Enlivened Mrs. N. Longworth's Dinner

THOSE people who are prominent in the official life of Washington do not always have the privilege of selecting their own pets. Many come to them in the shape of "freak" gifts from all over the world, and often prove an embarrassment because they are alive and cannot be stored away in some safe and secure place, to be taken out only on occasion.

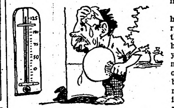
Thus it happened that Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, the daughter of former President Roosevelt, and wife of the distinguished Ohio representative, had presented to her among many other gifts, two little monkeys, who lost no mite in sustaining their reputation for mischievous antics, and they kept the Longworth household in a panic as to what was going to happen next. They were too nimble and quick to be punished for the evil of their ways, and so, week in and week out the monkeys had a lovely time of it. When Mr. and Mrs. Longworth entertained, the little creatures were shut up behind lock and key.

This had always insured the success of a party, without any disturbing interruptions, until one fateful night when Mrs. Longworth looked up to discover a monkey grinning at her from the top of a picture. It was only a second until the other one climbed up the corner of the cloth, and snatched a few nuts from some of the panic-stricken guests. His partner in crime leaped from the picture and perched himself upon the shoulder of a guest, and the details of what followed are not laid down in the directions given to polite society as to how to entertain.

"But," laughed a guest not long ago, "I shall never forget how utterly funny it was, nor how we all enjoyed it, just as soon as we were assured the monkeys would not eat us."

Senator Smith Names Hotter Place Than Capital

HEAT has no terrors for Senator Mark Smith of Arizona, though he suggested the other night there was prospect that the members of the senate might get overheated and cut short the session. Senator Smith lives in a hot country that is hot.



"Yuma, Ariz., is said to be the hottest place in the United States," remarked Senator Smith. "I don't think I ever saw the thermometer higher than 125 degrees, but, bless you, there's a hotter place in California than Yuma. Down on the shores of the Salton sea, where it is 180 feet below the sea level, I have seen the mercury at 116 degrees at one o'clock in the morning. But neither at Yuma nor in the Salton sea is the weather so oppressive when the thermometer registers its highest as it is in Washington at this time.

"There isn't a drop of humidity in Yuma, and 125 degrees there is not more burdensome than 98 degrees in this city."

THERE dwell in the remotest part of Nigeria, not yet under the complete control of the British, several tribes whose women wear tails and are proud of them. The information came to the National Geographic society the other day in a letter from Maj. A. J. N. Tremearne, who has served there both as a political and police officer. These tails, he said, play an important part in the social life of the people, for they are the sign of matronly dignity. A woman, on becoming a bride, casts away a simple girdle of twisted grass, which up to that time has been her sole adornment, and begins to wear an apron of leaves and a fancy tail.

"These tails are made of palm fiber, platted or bound together with string and usually stained with a red earth, which is also used for the further adornment of the lady's body," Major Tremearne said.

"To add further to their beauty, both the upper and lower lips of these women are pierced in order to admit a flat, round disc of wood called the Tichiak, which is usually about the size of a half-dollar. The object of this singularly discomforting adornment is to prevent the women from eating dogs, which are considered the greatest delicacy by the men of the tribes. Both sexes decorate their bodies with regular designs. When girls arrive at marriageable age, two sets of parallel lines are cut both on the chest and the back, and as soon as possible after marriage headlines are made. These consist of a number of short cuts across the forehead."

SWIFT AND POWERFUL CRUISERS OF ENGLAND

FIVE GRENADES HURLED INTO FRENCH CAPITAL INJURE TWO WOMEN, BUT FAIL TO DO SERIOUS DAMAGE.

ALLIES STILL HOPEFUL ENEMY WILL BE CHECKED

Although Press of Kaiser's Domain Confidently Assert Paris Will Be Occupied Within Few Hours, England and France Are Taking Offensive.

Paris, Sept. 1.—Flying at a height of 6,000 feet, a German aviator hurled five bombs into the city.

Little Damage Done.

One struck near L'Est railway station, not far from the military station, but did no damage. Others dropped near the Quai D'Jemmapes in the Rue Ricollet and in the Place De La Republique.

Two women were injured and a number of windows broken. A section of pavement was blown up.

Calm Still Prevails.

Though the city was startled by this threatening occurrence, which brought home to the people with stunning force the realization that the Germans are within striking distance of the capital, calm still prevails.

According to the Paris Temps, the aviator also dropped a manifesto reading as follows:

"The German army is at the gates of Paris. There is nothing for you to do but surrender.

(Signed) Lieut. Von Hidssen."

He disappeared as suddenly as he came and before any attempt could be made to bring him down, though for that matter he was sailing so high that any attack upon his machine would have been futile.

Order Houses Razed.

The official communication issued by the military governor ordering that the houses within the zone of action of the Paris forts be evacuated and razed has been the subject of much discussion and upon this order rumors of various kinds spread throughout the city.

Germans in Paris by Sept. 2.

London.—A Times Copenhagen dispatch declares that the German emperor and several high German officers are selling their Russian and English orders and turning the proceeds over to the Red Cross fund.

The German press confidently asserts that the official prediction that their troops would be in Paris on Sept. 2 will be fulfilled.

Fighting Is Resumed.

Fighting of a desperate character continues in France. A report from Dieppe, France, not confirmed here, says that the prefect of Dieppe announces that French troops under General Pau annihilated an entire German army corps.

Advance of Germans.

The advance of the Germans through Picardy, the northernmost province of France, is reported from Amiens, as having been checked by the combined French and English forces, after the Germans had advanced farther to the south. Tremendous losses have been inflicted on the Germans.

Severe Action Is Now in Progress.

Severe action has been in progress since Friday about Launois and Signy La Abbaye, 10 miles southwest of Mezieres, says an official statement. From this report it is inferred that the crown prince's army, recently in the Belgian ardennes, is trying to break through to conform with the advance of the German right. It is anticipated that a corresponding movement will be made by the German army recently in Luxemburg, probably against the line of the Meuse, between Dun and Stenay.

French Check First.

Further west the French have checked the Germans' advance guard and at the other extremity on the Meuse the French are offering a vigorous and successful resistance which extends along nearly the whole front.

Allies Ready to Take the Offensive.

The allied forces are now ready to assume the offensive. Indeed, this movement has already begun. The British, in conjunction with the French left, have begun a vigorous assault on the German forces who have penetrated a short distance on the Somme river in the direction of La Fere, in the department of Aisne.

Koenisberg Taken.

London.—The Chronicle's St. Petersburg correspondent sends the unofficial announcement that the Russian forces, pursuing the German army, succeeded during the general confusion in entering the city of Koenisberg, East Prussia, on the heels of the enemy, and securing command of the town and fortress.

Desperate Fighting Continues.

Desperate fighting continues along the Austrian frontier, says an official statement issued at St. Petersburg and telegraphed here by the correspondent of the Reuter Telegram company.

"In East Prussia," continued the Russian war office, "the garrisons and fortresses of Thorn and Graudenz (east of the Vistula) are taking part with a large number of siege guns. We have taken 3,000 prisoners in the operations east of Lemberg (capital of Galicia).

German Loss of 3,000.

"Near Podgerz (just south of the Vistula) the enemy lost 3,000 men and we captured four guns, a number of caissons of ammunition and nine guns abandoned when they crossed the Solokia. North of Tomacheff we took 1,000 prisoners and surrounded and defeated the Hungarian Fifteenth division east of Tomacheff, entire regiments surrendering.

"The enemy is making his principal effort in the direction of Lublin (in Russian Poland, 95 miles southeast of Warsaw), where the fighting is fierce."

Consider Poles Criminals.

Grand Duke Nicholas, commander-in-chief of the Russian army, declares, says the correspondent, that the Polish solkos, in view of their disloyal conduct and their use of explosive and flat-nosed bullets, have no claim to be treated with magnanimity and therefore will be considered not as combatants but as criminals under the military laws.

First Official Accounts.

In a dispatch from St. Petersburg, the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says:

"The first unofficial accounts of the Russian armies are beginning to come through. The Novoe Vremya's correspondent supplies an account of the battle of Gumbinnen (East Prussia, 66 miles southeast of Koenisberg) which it seems, broke the back of German resistance in East Prussia.

Victory for British.

British warships met the German fleet and immediately opened fire. When the battle was over two of the German cruisers and two torpedo boat destroyers had been sunk and the third cruiser, having caught fire, fled in a sinking condition.

The admiralty later announced that the British fleet engaged in the battle was that in command of Rear Admiral Sir David Beatty, son-in-law of the late Marshall Field of Chicago.

Cruiser Mainz Sunk.

The admiralty describes the British fleet as "a strong force of destroyers supported by light cruisers." One of the German warships sunk was the cruiser Mainz. The other sunken cruiser was of the Koeln class.

The British losses comprised the lives of a small number of men and damages to the flotilla cruiser Amethyst and the destroyer Laertes.

The scene of the combat was not far from the fortified island of Helgoland which formerly was a British naval base, but which within comparatively recent years has been sold to Germany.

Serves as Restorative.

The glad tidings from the sea, therefore, proved to be just the medicine needed to restore the spirit of the public.

The naval victory, coupled with the reported success of the Russians in crossing the Vistula, has consoled London, and it is the general feeling that the allies are "giving Germany as much punishment as she has given them."

U. S. Sends Warship.

Washington, Aug. 29.—The United States has informed the powers of Europe of its intention to send the armored cruiser North Carolina to Europe to carry gold for the relief of Americans, according to an announcement to the state department.

While the North Carolina goes on a mission of financial relief, her presence in Turkish waters is intended to have a salutary effect with respect to the treatment of Christians and foreigners generally, residents in the Ottoman empire.

WAR SEEN IN BRIEF.

A German aviator appeared Sunday over Paris and engaged in dropping bombs in a populous section of the city. Several of the bombs failed to explode, according to accounts and only two persons were injured.

The United States government has announced its intention of sending the armored cruiser North Carolina to Turkish waters. The warship will carry gold for the relief of stranded Americans in the Ottoman empire. Washington officials also expect that the ship's presence will also have a salutary effect with respect to the treatment of Christian and foreigners generally in that country.

ITALY ABOUT TO BEGIN WAR.

Will Present Ultimatum to Austria Very Soon—Ready to Fight.

"I am informed Italy will present an ultimatum to Austria requesting an explanation of Austrian mobilization on the Italian frontier. Only a brief period will be given for an answer and within a short time Italian troops are expected to be in Trieste."

EFFORTS FAIL; TURKS TO FIGHT

SULTAN'S DECLARATION OF WAR EXPECTED AT ANY TIME.

Efforts of Triple Entente to Pacify Ottoman Government Are Unsuccessful.

London, Sept. 1.—The Daily Telegraph's diplomatic correspondent in an article says:

"Turkey may declare war at any moment. It is now only a matter of a few days—possibly a few hours.

"All efforts of the powers in the triple entente have failed and the London embassy admits the situation very grave. The military party, now dominant in Constantinople, has reported the conclusion that the present is the best time to effect the restoration of a Macedonia and Aegean island.

"German officers and men are being poured into Constantinople to help the Turkish army and navy. Turkey apparently counts on the Balkan states quarreling among themselves while Turkey fights Greece, but it seems likely that Turkey's declaration of war against Greece will be regarded as a hostile act by the triple entente, which will send a fleet to dispose of all the Turkish and German ships.

"The British government has warned Turkey plainly that in starting any campaign at this time she signs her own death warrant."

Washington Gets News.

Washington.—The probable entrance of Turkey into the European struggle as an ally of Germany and Austria and possible uprisings among Great Britain's Mohammedan subjects were forecast by a wireless message to the German embassy here.

JAPS WOULD STARVE ENEMY

TO BLOCKADE TSING-TAU PORT AND SURROUND WITH TROOPS.

U. S. Issues Neutrality Proclamation Recognizing State of War Between Austria and Japan.

Washington, Aug. 29. — President Wilson has issued a proclamation of neutrality, recognizing that "a state of war unhappily exists between Japan and Austria-Hungary."

It is similar to other proclamations previously issued.

The Japanese campaign contemplated, it was said, the establishment of a rigid blockade of Tsing-Tau from the sea side, which would not expose the Japanese warships to the fire of the land fortifications.

The idea was to starve out the garrison, which would be hemmed in by Japanese and perhaps British troops in the rear, while the Japanese commanders would be content to wait patiently until the station surrendered or the small German war fleet, now under the protection of the shore batteries, was driven to sally forth and engage in battle with the Japanese fleet.

GREAT GERMAN LINER SUNK

London, Aug. 28.—In the house of commons First Lord of the Admiralty Churchill announced that the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse has been sunk off the West African coast by the British cruiser Highflyer. Those surviving the battle on the German vessel were landed before it sank. Churchill said one member of the Highflyer's crew was killed and five were wounded by fire from the Kaiser Wilhelm's guns before the German ship was sent to the bottom.

The Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse was one of the palatial steamers of the North German Lloyd line. At the outbreak of the war she was converted into an armed cruiser and since has been reported active in searching for British merchant men. She had a tonnage of 14,349 and was built in 1897. She was 626 feet long with a beam of 66 feet.

SITUATION VERY GRAVE AT BUTTE; MILITIA CALLED

CRISIS COMES AS RESULT OF DYNAMITING OF MINE EMPLOYMENT OFFICE—CITY THROWN INTO PANIC.

MINERS MAY ATTEMPT TO "CLEAN UP" STATE TROOPS

Butte, Mont., Sept. 1.—Mines of the Anaconda Copper Mining company and of other large companies operating in this district, were placed under guard as a result of the dynamiting Sunday of the employment office at the Parrot mine, operated by the Anaconda company.

No News of Mobilization.

News of Governor Samuel V. Stewart's order mobilizing at Helena the state troops for duty at Butte, was withheld from the local public, for fear the miners would attempt reprisals. The miners had heard rumors of the troops coming, but they have heard such reports before and do not consider the report of the militia mobilization at Helena is true. They based their confidence that this latest report was groundless upon the belief that Governor Stewart would not risk sending so small a force as 600 militiamen against the miners, who number, according to the roster of the Butte Mine Workers' union, 800. It is said upon apparently good authority, that many outside "gunmen" are in Butte.

State Troops Arrive.

The state troops are expected to arrive late today, but in the meantime, there is reported to be in the city a large number of peace officers from nearby cities. The guards at the stores have been strongly reinforced since the dynamiting.

Plans for the entry of the militia into Butte are being kept secret, as it is feared that if the approach of the trains containing soldiers becomes known, mines will be laid. Miners have long been open in their threats against the militia, whom they profess to believe they would have no trouble "in cleaning up."

Federal Troops Wanted.

Business men and the mining officials are making every effort to procure the presence of federal troops in Montana. Numerous telegrams were sent last night to Montana's delegation at Washington, urging that they prevail upon President Wilson to send regulars either to Fort Missoula or Fort Harrison at Helena, to be ready to cope with the situation in Butte.

The city has been quiet but the streets crowded. The feeling is tense.

Renewed Riots Anticipated.

The reopening of the miners' jurisdictional quarrel that involved the city in riots and bloodshed last June, has been anticipated since the Mine Workers' union, the organization that is seeking to overthrow the Western Federation of Miners in this district, made the announcement that only members of the new union may work underground. Sine the new organization began to enforce that decree, Butte has virtually experienced a reign of terror that culminated Sunday.

Two Killed in Auto Mishap.

Minneapolis, Aug. 31.—Mrs. Robert Roberts and Raymond Speaker were killed, and three injured, one seriously, when an automobile driven by Robert Roberts, carrying five persons, plunged over a 15-foot embankment two miles north of Bush lake and four miles southwest of the city limits Sunday afternoon. The machine turned over in a swamp. The injured were Robert Roberts, said to be seriously hurt; Hazel Roberts, his daughter, cut and bruised and Gladys Speaker, sister of Raymond, slightly bruised. The party was traveling toward the city when their car skidded on a sharp sandy curve.

English Take German City.

London, Aug. 31.—The official information bureau announced that Apia (a seaport of Upolu, Samoan islands and capital of the German part of the group), surrendered on the morning of Aug. 29 to a British force from New Zealand. Germany's Samoan territory has been considered her most strategic possession in the Picifis. Apia, seized by the British, is the commercial metropolis of the group, contains numerous fine churches, schools and residences.

Cities Reported Taken.

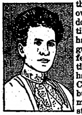
London.—Germans have occupied the French cities of Lille, Valencienens and Roubaix, according to a dispatch from Ostend, Belgium. The French war office denies that Lille has been occupied, however.

Try to Embroil Spain.

Madrid, Aug. 28.—Efforts of a certain portion of the political leaders to stir up sentiment that will force Spain to cast her lot with the allies against Germany are being sternly frowned on by the king.

WOMEN WHO ARE ALWAYS TIRED

May Find Help in This Letter.



Swan Creek, Mich.—"I cannot speak too highly of your medicine. When through neglect or overwork I get run down and my appetite is poor and I have that weak, languid, always tired feeling, I get a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it builds me up, gives me strength, and restores me to perfect health again. It is truly a great blessing to women, and I cannot speak too highly of it. I take pleasure in recommending it to others."—Mrs. ANNIE CAMERON, R.F.D., No. 1, Swan Creek, Michigan.

Another Sufferer Relieved.

Hebron, Me.—"Before taking your remedies I was all run down, discouraged and had female weakness. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and used the Sanative Wash, and find today that I am an entirely new woman, ready and willing to do my housework now, where before taking your medicine it was a dread. I try to impress upon the minds of all ailing women I meet the benefits they can derive from your medicines."—Mrs. CHARLES ROWE, R. F. D., No. 1, Hebron, Maine.

I Want Some of THE BLACK SHELLS

THE BLACK SHELLS primer gives a hotter and more uniform flame than any other—because it has none of the ordinary mercury and ground glass. Mercury is heavy—glass is light. Judge the difficulty of combining them evenly, so that each tiny cap load shall be uniform. A big per cent of your misses has been due to varying primers and to nothing else. Our priming mixture is a strictly chemical combination and must be uniform. Again, ground glass absorbs 16% of the heat, while our primer materials are all combustible and so increase the heat.

To reach the main charge the primer flame goes through the flash-passage which in THE BLACK SHELLS is twice the ordinary size. This again means increased speed, because twice as much of the primer flame rushes directly into the main charge.

The third of THE BLACK SHELLS big advantages is a perfection of waterproofing that is unknown to other shells. Fog, rain and ducking don't make them misfire or swell.

There are three of THE BLACK SHELLS—Romax for black powder; Climax and Ajax for Smokeless.

SYNOPSIS.

Anne Ives, mascot by reputation, starts from Winnipeg for London to attend the coronation of King George. Her father had come to America following a quarrel with his father, Comte d'Yves of France. Anne's father, at his death, left her a key to a strong box containing bonds of the defunct French Panama Canal company. The box is in the vaults of Magniff & Co., Paris bankers. On the steamer Anne meets the dissolute son of Magniff, who, not knowing her identity, tells her of a scheme to get hold of the canal bonds and extort money from Magniff. Anne volunteers to go as a passenger with a French contestant at an aviation meet in London. The Frenchman wins, but disappears without disclosing his identity. She meets him again in the crowd at Westminster abbey and accompanies him to the coronation. She learns that he is her cousin, Chevalier d'Yves, and that his companion is her grandfather, Compte d'Yves. Sharing her father's hate for the family, Anne abruptly leaves the abbey. She loses her purse, and borrows money to go to Paris. On the way she meets an official of the aviation meet who, thinking her the wife of the winner, forces on her the prize of 500 pounds. She learns that Banker Magniff is extremely bitter against her grandfather and holds a mortgage on the ancestral home. Magniff tells her a new key must be made for the box. He induces her to sign an agreement to sell him the bonds for 50,000 francs. Young Magniff returns Anne's purse, but disclaims all knowledge of the key to the strong box. The chevalier and his grandfather call on Anne regarding important diplomatic papers which were stolen from the chevalier in London. Anne, in her indignation at being suspected, discloses her identity and the comte takes her to his arms. The chevalier declares his love and finds that it is reciprocated.

"But they shall not," I repeated, frowning. "Charles, you know I am a mascot. All my friends have told me that. Did I not bring luck to you as a passenger in the machine? And didn't I get Estelle Christie inside the abbey to see the coronation? I say that Clichy shall never fall into Magniff's hands. Why, has it withstood seven seiges by the English and two by Burgundy, not to speak of countless gallant defenses in olden times against Frenchmen themselves; in the wars of the Fronde, against the Huguenots, against Henry of Navarre and Richelieu, even that it should succumb now to a paltry mortgage?"

"Bravo," said Charles, clapping his hands. "Your eyes flash fire, dear Anne. If they were mortars and used in our defense, I warrant Clichy should never go under."

"Mock me as you please," I answered, a little petulantly. "Clichy shall be saved, or I will never be called mascot again."

Thursday came, the last day accorded us, and the interest was as far off as ever. It was a sad gathering that morning at the breakfast table. Everything was packed, and we were to remove to the little cottage at Rambouillet owned by the comte's daughter, where they hoped to find a precarious existence for a while on a few thousand francs that remained of her dowry.

"It will last us a year, Anne," said the comte grimly. "And then—well, I am not likely to see the next. And Charles can take care of his mother somehow."

I could not restrain a sob. "But my money from Magniff!" I cried. "You must take it; I can earn my own living in future, as in the past. On that you can live decently, at least."

The comte smiled sadly.

"We'll talk of that when the time comes, Anne," he answered. "At least we are not yet dispossessed."

"Nor shall be," I replied defiantly. "Does not the law give three days' grace to us?"

"Three days or thirty," answered the chevalier, "it is all one to us now."

And while we still sat talking over our plans, we saw a smartly fitted dogcart turn up the drive and there descended—Leopold Magniff, Jr.!

I confess that I was thoroughly unnerved at the sight of this man. I had never believed that he would dare to cross my path again. The memory of my threats which he had made on the occasion of our last interview recurred to me and afflicted me with a presentment of overwhelming horror.

He came in jauntily, bowing to all of us, an affectation of regretful humility hardly concealing an air of obvious triumph. The comte and the chevalier arose grimly and stood confronting him, like two statues of stone.

"Monsieur," said our visitors, addressing each alternately, and becoming disconcerted as neither appeared to recognize his remarks, but merely stood to receive him—"monsieur, it is with deep regret that I come to receive the interest upon my father's mortgage or, in default, to take possession of the chateau."

Then at last the comte spoke, and each word seemed wrenched from the fibers of his heart.

"We cannot meet the interest. The chateau is at your disposal."

"Stop!" I cried. "The law allows three days of grace, I believe."

Magniff turned toward me and bowed sneeringly.

"Quite so, mademoiselle," he answered. "But it permits me to take possession immediately pending this period."

The old comte touched a bell and Jean Casseroy, the ancient butler, entered. "Take this gentleman to his apartment," he said. "Obey his orders and make him comfortable. The library will be at his disposal."

Magniff, thoroughly disconcerted, stood glowering at the comte, uncertain whether to bluster or to accept this most distant hospitality. And, then, with a most charming courteousness of which, I am sure, I should never have been capable, the chevalier's mother arose.

"I shall see to it that your sheets are aired, monsieur," she said, smiling as though he were the most welcome guest. "The grounds are at your disposal; pray make yourself master here."

You may as well leave tomorrow, Anne," said my grandfather. "Every moment spent here now is a humiliation."

I took him by the arm and patted his trembling hand. I knew that the departure from Clichy would quickly snap the thread of his still vigorous life. Though I no longer hoped for rescue, I was resolved that we should hold out to the uttermost.

"Grandfather," I said, "when Richelieu invested Castle Chichy and the last ounce of powder had been fired, the last atom of provision gone, Clichy did not surrender. And, at the last instant, rescue came. Let us fight to the uttermost. Let us remain till Sunday."

"You are quite right, my dear," he answered. "What do you say, Charles?"

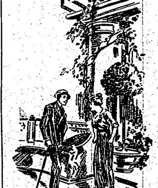
"She is right," answered the chevalier. "It was a woman like you, Anne, who inspired our ancient defenders, as you inspire us today."

Friday came, then Saturday. But a bare four-and-twenty hours remained. Magniff had not ventured to leave his apartment during the period that had elapsed, but on the morning of the last day but one I encountered him in the grounds. I think he had been watching for me.

"Wait a moment, mademoiselle," he exclaimed, as I made to hasten past him. "A moment only. Will you not believe me when I say how profoundly I regret the part I have to play? Let me assure you, I have no enmity against your grandfather."

"Then why are you here—how did you dare come here?" I asked indignantly.

"It was to see you," he answered. "Now do not go, mademoiselle. I knew that you had met your relatives and become reconciled and gone to reside with them. Meanwhile, my father and I have become reconciled, also. And nothing would content him but that I should assume this odious role of bailiff. He wished me to keep you under surveillance."



"And I Believe You Did, Liar and Thief," I Cried.

"Oh, that was unnecessary," I retorted. "Nor does it seem probable, since he refused to see me when I called at the bank, nor deigned to answer the letter I wrote him. And, besides, in less than a week, I am due at his office to receive payment for my bonds. Oh, I assure you he is not so vitally concerned about me."

Magniff stepped up close to me and every atom of sincerity left his face.

"Miss Ives," he said bluntly, "you are living in a fool's paradise. Believe me, you are on the verge of complete ruin, and so is the chevalier. No, do not look so disdainful, for assuredly you will come to a realization of that fact unless you accept my proposal. He will not lose Clichy alone; he will lose his liberty, perhaps his life. The loss of his estate will be as nothing in comparison with the shame that will be his, that will send down his grandfather into an unhallowed grave." He bent his face until it almost touched mine, and hissed in my ear:

"He sold the treaty!"

"Impossible!" I cried, starting from him.

"Improbable to the uttermost, but true," Magniff rejoined. "I told you on the occasion of our last encounter certain things derogatory to his character. You refused to hear me. Listen now! He has a reputation for wildness second to none in Paris. It was to pay his gambling debts, debts which he had concealed from his grandfather from very shame, that he sold the draft of the Anglo-French treaty to the triple alliance. Doubtless he has accused me."

"And I believe you did, liar and thief," I cried.

He only laughed.

"If you persist in your refusal to see things as they are, Miss Ives," he said with intense earnestness, "then I must abandon you to your fate. I only warn you that the net of evidence has been woven around him. He cannot escape it. His arrest is imminent. Only you yourself can save him. Say the word that will avail, and I will see to it that the vital evidence is missing, that he remains unscathed. Marry me!"

"Never!" I cried. "I loathe you and despise you."

"I am unfortunately aware of that," he answered. "Nevertheless, you shall have the completest liberty. Until I win your love I shall never molest you. You will be free to come and to go; I only ask you to go through the form of the ceremony with me."

"You may plead forever," I answered, "but you will waste your breath. I do not believe a word of your concoction of falsehoods, and, if I did, I would not marry you."

"Not to save Clichy?"

"How—how—?" I stammered.

"Marry me and, on the day of the ceremony—as soon as the union has been pronounced—I will present your grandfather with a full and free release."

"You will induce your father to forego his revenge?" I cried. "You lack the power monsieur. Not for a thousand worlds would he be balked now, after these years of scheming."

"He must," answered Leopold. "I have him in my power. He knows it; that is why he made terms with me."

"How?"

"Because I hold your bonds," he answered. "You know their value now."

"They are his; I have sold them."

"Anne," said by persecutor, "we are wasting words. Can I never convince you? Listen! Give me your solemn promise to marry me and, on the morning of the ceremony I will restore Clichy to your grandfather. And the chevalier shall go free."

"Wait—wait!" I cried desperately, trying to pierce the tangled net of cunning that surrounded me. "Give me until tomorrow to make my decision."

Suddenly he seized my hand.

"O, Anne, be wise," he cried. "I love you; I worship you; you are the one woman I have loved out of all who have come into my life. You can redeem me with your goodness. Marry me and I swear to heaven that I will adore you, I will be your slave. I will consecrate my life to you. I love you Anne."

And falling at my feet, he poured forth a more impassioned plea to me. It was impossible to mistake the sincerity of his passion; I could not but recognize that in this, at least, he was not base. I turned away and left him kneeling in the path.

In the hallway I met Charles. I feared that he would see my agitated face, but his own was so distressed that I feared that the greatest of sorrows must have come to him.

"The comte!" I gasped; and then I noticed that in one hand he held a can of kerosene.

"My monoplane," he answered wildly. "I am going to burn her, Anne. She shall never fall into his clutches, she who bore us aloft that splendid day—"

"I took the can from him. "Wait until tomorrow, Charles," I whispered. "Much may happen by then."

I left him standing irresolute and went up to my room and sat down in a chair. I did not weep. My brain was in a whirl, and a thousand thoughts and doubts oppressed me. Magniff's threats, his infamous suggestions as to the honor of my fiance, the imminent loss of Clichy—all this presented aspects and I strove dimly to pierce to the heart of the problem which confronted me.

If I married Magniff, Clichy would at least be saved. That seemed the chief consideration. My happiness—that of Charles, even, was nothing compared to the preservation of the old home that had withstood so many vicissitudes. Other women, braver than I, had sacrificed themselves in the past for Chateau Clichy. Then why not I, even though I should kill myself afterwards?

Then, in the midst of these cogitations there flashed into my mind, in the most incongruous way, the memory of Mr. Spratt.

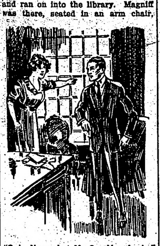
Angrily I sought to free myself from this recollection. What had this little Winnipeg teacher to do with my present troubles? He was the last, the very last and least thought that should come to me. But my mind wandered, and again I seemed to see him bidding me a timid farewell upon the Winnipeg platform. "My great work, Miss Ives," he panted, offering me the code. "The work of many years. Take it; you will need it in France." His odious little rabbit-like face rose up so plainly in my mind's eye that I seemed to visualize him in the room, and I pressed my fingers hard upon my eyelids in a fruitless effort to dismiss him.

I rose at last, still miserably uncertain. My suitcase lay packed upon the bureau and, opening it idly, I caught sight of that wretched gift of Mr. Spratt to me. I raised it; an envelope fell from beneath the paper cover. I opened it—and recoiled with a suppressed scream.

Five bank-notes, of the value of one hundred pounds apiece, fluttered upon the floor. Five hundred pounds! Twenty-five hundred dollars, twelve thousand five hundred francs! The interest upon the mortgage!

It was the prize money that Charles had won that day in England when he made his aeroplane flight with me, which the secretary of the aviation meet, obstinately assuming me to be his wife, had thrust into my hands that evening of our chance encounter at Charing Cross station. I had put the money away in Mr. Spratt's book and wholly forgotten it.

I think I must have gone mad with joy, for I ran down the stairs, waving the money wildly, shouting incoherently. On the way down I encountered Charles. I shook the bank-notes into his face and rushed on past him. The comte and his daughter were in the drawing room and came out as I descended; I waved the money at them and ran on into the library. Magniff was there, seated in an arm chair, reading a newspaper. As I entered he rose and came toward me, a light of triumph in his eyes.



"Go! Never Let Me See You Again."

"You have come to accept, Anne, he cried.

"I have come to pay your blood fee," I cried wildly, and flung the notes down on the table. "Take these and go. Go! Never let me see you again. You understand?" I babbled on. "Go! Go!"

Then everything swam around me. The old comte caught me from behind and supported me as I fell fainting into his arms.

CHAPTER VII.

The Stolen Treaty.

At last the day arrived on which the safe containing my bonds was to be opened. My bonds, I say—well, hardly mine, since I had blindly sold them to the banker for a paltry $10,000; not knowing their value to him, when I might have utilized his need of them to force Magniff to release my grandfather from his mortgage. I reflected with some bitterness upon my folly. Still, even $10,000 was not to be despised. That would enable my grandfather to meet his interest and thus retain Clichy for at least two years, during which period much might occur.

As to the future of myself and Charles I dared not think. Marriage was out of the question under the present circumstances. Every penny that could be scraped together had gone to pay the interest on that miserable mortgage, and in three months more the interest must again be met.

"We shall be driven to giving exhibitions in our monoplane for a bare living, sun-goddess," said Charles to me, gaily. I could not re-echo my fiance's mirth. Since the loss or theft of the treaty draft Charles had been suspended from his office in the diplomatic service of France. I feared, too, that suspicion had fallen on him. He had no other source of income than his meager pay as captain in an infantry regiment, from which he had been detached for special service of the state.

Despite the fact that, in accordance with my agreement with the financier, I was to receive $10,000 upon the safe being opened, I arose on the appointed morning after a restless night, overwhelmed with misgivings. Empty and vain as they appeared to be, I could not but recall Leopold Magniff's threats, his self-confident assurances that the chevalier and I stood on the brink of ruin. What schemes had he prepared for us? What might he not have done, being in possession of my key, as I felt sure he was? I voiced my fears at the breakfast table, but Charles laughed them away. Much as he hated us, he argued, Leopold Magniff would hardly dare utilize his possession of my key to remove the bonds from the safe, since they could not be negotiated, and he would merely be placing himself within the grasp of the law.

"You will find the bonds in the safe, Anne," said Charles optimistically. "Or, rather, we shall."

"You will come with me?" I cried, and all my fears and doubts immediately resolved themselves.

We asked advice of my grandfather, who cordially approved of the chevalier's suggestion. "For you see," he said, "our little Anne came to us in such an unexpected fashion that she is liable to disappear, perhaps in the guise of some beneficent fairy, after having saved Clichy to us, if we permit her to go to Paris alone."

"Never fear that you will lose me, until you are tired of me, grandfather," I answered.

The old comte had changed considerably during the brief period that I had known him. His great age—eighty-four, appeared to have begun at length to manifest itself. Not that his vigor of mind or body was in any manner impaired, but I could discern that he had begun to detach himself, with that natural change which comes upon the very old, from the more active and external interests of life.

I believe that in my coming he beheld a pardon for his crime in driving my father from his roof—a crime which he had repented bitterly through all those years that had elapsed since that unhappy time.

Charles and I set off for Paris by an early train. We traveled through the pleasant, fertile fields of Normandy, among little old villages where life seemed at once so simple and so kindly that it required some little effort of will to realize that we were, perhaps, rushing into an unknown danger, that the activities of many enemies might even now have laid a trap for our undoing. I had revealed to my fiance the story of Magniff's threats, omitting, of course, his vile suggestions that Charles had been a traitor and sold the treaty. Charles did not receive the news so lightly as I had expected.

"Let us go straight ahead, confident in our own integrity, Anne," he answered. "Then let them do their worst. They cannot harm us; treachery always recoils upon itself, be it never so cunningly contrived."

We were so fortunate as to have a compartment to ourselves. It was so charming to be seated together, side by side. Charles placed his arm round me and drew me to him.

"Will you let me announce our engagement, Anne?" he pleaded. "It is surely realized at home. My grandfather and mother know we love one another. Besides, if any danger does threaten us, I can protect you better as my wife."

"You travel very rapidly, monsieur," I answered. "A moment ago it was merely an announcement of the engagement that you required. And now you end the sentence by proposing another relationship."

"When we reach Paris I shall show you the office of a registrar," he answered. "There we shall be formally betrothed. And then—"

"Yes, monsieur?" I said, with feigned coolness.

"I shall serve formal notice upon my mother and grandfather of our betrothal, in accordance with the provisions of the Code Napoleon," he answered.

I had listened with beating heart to the unfolding of these proposals, but the mention of the code brought instantly to my memory the image of little Mr. Spratt, presenting me with his famous code. "Take this volume . . . my life-work . . . a compiliation of love . . . you will need it abroad," the little man had gasped as handed it to me. And now in every crisis of my life, it seemed, the vision of Mr. Spratt was destined to arise like some specter confronting me. I became suddenly silent.

Charles carried out his program. Upon our arrival at the terminus he hurried me along a maze of small side streets, up a narrow staircase and into the presence of the registrar. There we complied with the formalities which the famous code prescribed. We were betrothed—an incident, merely, in Anglo-Saxon countries, but here a matter of severe formality, and necessary preliminary to a marriage.

But I leaned happily upon his arm as we descended the narrow staircase. The happiness, the perfect joy in the irrevocability of the step, thrilled me. Winnipeg seemed like a distant memory of some former, dimly remembered existence at that moment.

"And now, should anything befall me I shall be content," he said as we descended to the street.

Often those words recurred to me afterwards.

We arrived at the bank and sent in our cards. I could not avoid a thrill of expectation as to the outcome; would Magniff refuse to see me? But he did not. He would see both of us, he said, and we were ushered almost immediately into his private office. There he sat, half buried among his ledgers, as on the occasion of my former visit to him; but this time he was attended by a couple of severe-looking functionaries in semi-uniform. He bowed distantly to Charles and bade us be seated.

"The Chevalier d'Yves attends, I take it, as an interested party," said Magniff, looking at me through his gold glasses. There was a peculiar expression upon his features; a sort of cunning triumph, as though he held the situation perfectly in hand.

We bowed our acknowledgment to the suggestion. Then, at a summons by bell, a messenger brought in the agreement which I had signed three weeks before.

"Your name is Anne Ives," Magniff said rapidly, glancing over the document. "You claim to be the granddaughter of the Comte d'Yves, of Clichy, Normandy, and the possessor of certain bonds now in one of our safes. You have sold these to me for 50,000 francs, payable upon delivery."

As I admitted each of these several propositions the banker handed the document to the functionaries, who glanced at it, swiftly, and then at me and Charles.

"The duplicate key has been fashioned," Magniff continued, "and these gentlemen are the government officials whose presence at the unlocking of the safe is required under the Code Napoleon."

The pale and studious face of little Mr. Spratt stood out before my eyes with startling clearness.

"Then let us proceed to the vaults," said Magniff, and we all rose and followed him. The functionaries closed in around us in a significant manner, almost as though we were prisoners, I thought, and as though the vaults were destined to be our dungeon.

We proceeded by a subterranean stone stairway into the depths of the earth, emerging through an iron doorway into a huge room, lighted by electric light, around which innumerable safety compartments were arranged. Nobody else was there, except a janitor who stood at a door at the far end, which communicated by a flight of steps, with the street outside. Magniff led us to the safe and handed the key to me.

"It has not been opened for thirty years," he said. "You may find the hinges stiffened. Nevertheless the Code Napoleon prescribes that you yourself shall open it. If it is beyond your power, doubtless, the chevalier will hold your fingers. But he must not unlock the safe."

I made no answer, but stepped forward and fitted the key into the lock, turning it until I obtained the combination. The functionaries, apparently inspired by intense interest, drew close, one on each side of me. The heavy door swung open easily. Inside the safe I saw a bundle of papers. My hand shook so, from excitement, that I could barely lay hold of them.

"Observe! Her hand trembles, Gaston!" I heard one of the officials say to the other in a stage whisper.

I drew the papers from their resting place and handed them to Magniff.

"Pray examine these, and, if you find that they are made out correctly, complete the contract," I said.

"You again claim, before these gentlemen," said the banker, "that these are your own Panama bonds?"

"Indubitably," I answered.

Magniff signaled to the officials, and they came up to me. He glanced at the papers and began to shuffle them rapidly. One sheet became detached and fluttered to the ground. It was a doubled piece of notepaper, such as used anywhere for correspondence, and it was covered with minute writing. Suddenly Charles darted forward.

"The treaty!" he exclaimed, and grasped for it.

One of the officials stooped; his hands met those of my fiance. As they rose I heard something click. The chevalier was handcuffed!

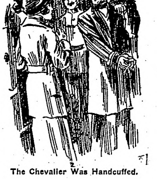
The second man stepped up to him and touched him on the shoulder.

"Charles Victor Sebastian, Chevalier d'Yves," he said. "I arrest you for espionage and theft of a secret government document."

Charles was too stupefied to attempt resistance, even if the thought had entered his head. I stared from one to the other of the group, still mystified. I had not yet fully comprehended. Magniff whispered to the second man and he came to my side.

"Mademoiselle Anne Ives," he said, "I arrest you for complicity in the theft of a government document, and also for attempting to obtain money by the sale of worthless forged bonds."

Magniff nodded his head. "A very clumsy forgery," he said. He turned to me. "It grieves me, mademoiselle, to have to place you under arrest," he continued. "I hoped that at the last moment you would not have the audacity to carry out this scheme. Remember, pray, that I warned you upon the occasion of our former interview, what would be the inevitable consequences should you persist in this attempt of yours to extort money from me. Had I alone been concerned," he concluded, "I should have permitted you to go unscathed. But I have my duty as a Frenchman. When I discovered that this trick of yours was part of a wider scheme to defraud and betray France, that you had actually concealed the stolen document in this safe of yours, thinking to hide it when you removed the forged bonds, then my patriotism arose and forced me into action."



The Chevalier Was Handcuffed.

"Oh, spare your patriotism," I returned, cold with humiliation and anger. "No, let him do his worst," I continued, seeing that Charles was upon the point of springing to my side. "It is the last baffled scheme of a desperate trickster."

"Bravo, Anne," said Charles, clapping his manacled hands. At the hollow chink of the steel, the words of anger died on my lips. For the first time I realized that Leopold Magniff's nets had closed round us. He had fulfilled his threats.

A Guinea Garden.

Those who have heard words spoken so carelessly that their real meaning must remain a matter of conjecture will sympathize with the Italian mother in one of the Brooklyn settlements where a kindergarten is flourishing.

She reached the building early one morning, and with a distinct grievance in face and voice confronted the kindergartner:

"Why!" she demanded, "why you no call this a school? Why you call him a guinea garden?"

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. S. HUFT.

We believe it is the privelege of any American citizen to become a candidate for office, and we as a publisher do not intend to do any injustice to any candidate, but there is occasionally one that has so abused the position that the people intrusted to him to fill, that we consider it a duty that we owe to our subscribers to publish their records while in office, then if you desire to re-elect them, we will endeavor to stand their conduct if you can.

The Thief River Falls Times makes an unwarranted attack on candidate H. O. Kjomme in their last week's issue, because Mr. Kjomme indorsed County Option in his speech at the Mayfield picnic. It also accuses Mr. Kjomme of being on the wrong side in the Thief River Falls election. No one knows better than The Times that there was lots of other important issues in that election besides the temperance issue, and as this is to be a non-partician campaign, with all men of different political views and different religious views on an equal footing, we are surprised at the lack of intelligence shown by The Times, trying to stir up political ill-feeling over that Thief River Falls fight. However if they really want it that way let them open their mud batteries, and their crowd will get cleaned up from cellar to garret.

WHY WE WILL NOT SUPPORT O'NEIL.

We will quote again some of that drainage law that Attorney Brown and O'Neil fixed up and passed, and Fasel USED. Here it is:

"No extension of the time of construction shall be granted unless applied for in writing by the contractor to the county auditor or county auditors as the case may be, stating to the satisfaction of said county auditor or county auditors, good and sufficient reasons therefor. The first extension shall not be for a period of time exceeding one year."

Now was not that a nice law for the great farmer Representative O'Neil to get through the Legislature, with all of the ditches in eastern Pennington and Red Lake counties lying with the construction work at a standstill?

Now let us see what they did with this great drainage law that the Representative of the farmers had passed.

The farmers on ditch 42 became tired of the unnecessary delay in the construction of that ditch, but were informed by Mr. Fasel that he was urging it as fast as he could and everlastingly going after the contractors. As a last resort the farmers banded to-gether and employed an attorney, Charles Loring of Crookston to look after their interest. When Mr. Loring looked up the records in the County Auditor's office he informed the farmers that he could do nothing as their County Auditor had granted an EXTENSION OF TIME to the contractors, and of course the ARRANGEMENTS had been made.

These are cold facts gentlemen, and we challange either D. P. O'Neil or A. H. Fasel to deny it, and offer free space in THE SUNBEAM to deny it. Next week we will take up that eighty-five per cent drainage bill and show you what that was worked through the legislature for, by our great farmer Representative D. P. O'Neil.

Wm. E. Lee Will open his state campaign at Marshall Minn., on the 14th, of this month.

This is the month of the opening of the state and county campaigns, and the newspaper publishers are all supposed to roast "the other fellow."

Some of the U.S. citizins, who took land in Canada and became subjects of Great Britain, will now have an opportunity to get their heads blown off by German machine guns, over in France.

The Russians are still rushing their four million army toward Berlin, while the Germans are pushing their army towards Paris, both nations are slaughtering the common soldiers by machinary, and the slaughter is something beyond comprehension.

THE LOCAL NEWS

Jack Frost made his first call of the season last night.

Teams for breaking are now in good demand, at $1.25 per acre, as the farmers now have a sure market and will open their farms as soon as possible.

Thoreson has closed his store at Highlanding and has removed all the goods out of it, and stored them until he gets his new building ready at Goodridge, the new townsite.

A newspaper publisher cannot conceal his preference for candidates for office, as what he says is public property, while an individual can give the glad hand to two candidates for the same office and assure them of his support.

We are of the opinion that the rush of merchants to the new townsite will rather cool off next summer, when they look through their spy glass and see the good steady cash business that Ellingson is doing located close to the Highlanding Creamery.

The rails are now layed on the Electric Line to Goodridge, and that place is "booming." The completion of this line fills a long felt want for the farmers of this locality, as it makes them a market close enough so they can market their grain by one day's labor per load.

All political announcements will be published in this paper, soliciting the support of our subscribers, at regular advertising rate. No special rates will be given later in the campaign, so there is nothing to gain by delaying to send in your announcements.

Now that the Electric Line is completed, that grade north from Highlanding should be widened out so that teams can pass each other in safety, as that will now be a main traveled road. Of course the Ditch Contractors got pay for doing that work, but it is not done yet.

T. P. Anderson candidate for County Auditor was making the acquaintance of the Mayfield voters last Sunday. Mr. Anderson is a gentleman of fine appearance, and a talk with him would lead you to the conclusion that he was just the man to place behind that Auditor's counter to open them books for inspection by the ditch tax payers.

We publish in another column the announcement of Bernhard Knudsen, candidate for County Treasurer. This is the first time that Mr. Knudsen has become a candidate for any office although he has been quite active in politics, to assist his friends, who will now stand by him as faithful as he did by them, which means his election on November 3rd.

The Young Peoples' Meeting of the town of Mayfield held at the residence of Gunde Austad last Sunday was well attended, and the young people gave a very good program of reading and singing. There were quite a number of older people present, and candidates T. P. Anderson, Casper Dale and Theodore Liden were present making acquaintances, and incidently talking a little politics.

We understand that Brother Lattimore has taken the new townsite fever, and is contemplating moving to Goodridge. As for us we have had our experience in running a newspaper in a small village, as the ownership and management of the paper changes too often to suit our style of doing business. Usually one publisher goes into it, expecting to get rich, and after he is "busted" another one takes hold of it until he follows his unfortunate brother to the scrap pile, and then another one takes hold of the enterprise to follow the foot steps of them "who have gone before."

There was a social dance given by the young people at the homestead farm of Willie Swansons last Saturday evening.

The hog sickness seems to continue in the Eleven Towns and it does not seem to be confined to any one neighborhood or locality as we have heard of hogs being sick from the town of Star to the town of Mayfield, while some farmers seems to have not had any sickness among their hogs.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof and we will make out your papers free of charge.

ULTRA VIOLET LIGHT RAYS.

Science begins to dream of a day in which man will gather his food direct from the air and digest it without much aid from the various ferments and juices which are now mainly instrumental in that work.

The chief agent in this mighty revolution, according to no less an authority than Bertholet, will be the ultra violet light rays. These are not visible to the human eye. They do not appear upon the spectroscope. They affect the photographic plate, however, and are probably discerned by some of the lower animals, whose sense of sight is much more acute than that of man.

Much is known of their chemical effects. Few microbes can long withstand their power. The redness and pain of "sunburn" are their work. They are particularly injurious to the eye, which upon exposure to them becomes totally blind in a little while.

Through the agency of these rays Bertholet has actually combined carbon dioxide and water vapor into sugar and other carbohydrates. He has inclosed carbohydrates, fats and albuminoids in sealed vessels of quartz and has seen them digest under the rays. The process is very expensive, of course, but it is hinted that modern inventive genius will so cheapen it in time that fields of wheat may be replaced by factories where food is manufactured from the gases of the air.

And should the men of that day be troubled with indigestion the same agent that makes their food will come to their relief. Stomach troubles will disappear at once before a little bulb of light rich in the ultra violet rays.—Boston Herald.

BIFOCAL LENSES.

Everybody who uses bifocal glasses probably wonders where the idea originally came from. Bifocal glasses are the kind that possess two separate lenses cemented together so that by looking in the upper part one can see at a great distance and by looking through the lower half one can read.

Most authorities are inclined to give Benjamin Franklin credit for the invention. He was, so the story goes, an inveterate reader and could not use his reading glasses when looking any distance away.

Finally the notion came to him that he could combine his glasses, and he thereupon had the lenses cut in half and one-half of each lens placed in the rim of each spectacle rim. The result was that a single pair of glasses was sufficient, though present day oculists state that the sharply drawn line must have affected his eyes.

From this idea the oculists gradually developed a glass in which the lower part was arranged for reading and the upper part for long distance vision, while the annoying "marking line" was eliminated.—Washington Star.

Mount Rainier's Shadows.

There are some wonderful shadow effects produced by and upon the gigantic snowy cone of Mount Rainier. It sometimes happens that the sky as seen from the city of Tacoma just before sunrise is covered with a dome of cloud 15,000 feet or more in height, while behind the peak toward the east, the sky is clear. In such circumstances the rising sun casts the shadow of the great mountain upon the cloud curtain overhead in the form of a vast blue triangle, the point of which rests upon the apex of the peak. At other times the shadow of the earth can be seen creeping up the cone in a distinct curve, while the flush of sunset stains the snow above the line of shadow to a deep pink.

STATE RAILROADS SHOW A DECREASE

ORE SHIPMENTS ONE CAUSE

Report of First Six Months Is $6,445,-280 Below Same Period Last Year—War May Affect Last Half Year.

St. Paul.—A decrease of $6,445,280.40 in gross earnings for the first six months of 1914 from the gross earnings for the same period of 1913, is shown by railroads reporting to the Minnesota Tax commission on their earnings in the state.

Shown by All.

The thirty-six roads that have reported to the commission show a total of $43,081,935.92 in gross earnings for the first six months this year, as compared to total gross earnings of $49,-527,216.32 for the first half of 1913.

They will pay a 5 per cent tax to the state, which, for all roads, amounts to $2,154,906.75. This is a decrease in the state's revenue of $322,264.07 from the first half of 1913 when the taxes totaled $2,476,360.82.

Light Ore Shipments.

A marked falling off of gross earnings is noted in the reports of those railroads serving the Iron Range country. Light ore shipments are said to be the cause.

Two big ore hauling roads, the Duluth & Iron Range and the Duluth, Missabe & Northern, show large decreases from their earnings of the first half of 1913. The Duluth & Iron Range realized $2,597,383.81 for the first half of 1913, as against $1,775,275.02 for the corresponding period this year; a decrease of $822,118.79, or 31.65 per cent.

The Duluth, Missabe & Northern earned $1,811,402.71 for the first half of 1914 and $3,218,137.60 for the first six months of 1913. The decrease is $1,406,734.89, or 43.68 per cent.

Small Demand for Steel.

This year is said to have been the lightest ore hauling year in the last two decades. Small demand for steel, it is said, has resulted in the demand for ore being held down to the minimum.

The Great Northern, another large ore hauling road, shows a decrease of $1,997,169.27 in its gross earnings for the first half of the year, as compared with the same period of 1913. The earnings of the Northern Pacific dropped $955,982.

That the war will have its effect on the gross earnings of the railroads for the last half of the year is said to be true.

MOOSERS HAVE TO PETITION

Progressives Seek Sufficient Number of Signatures to Put Halbert's Name on Ballot.

St. Paul.—Under the direction of Clarence W. Halbert, chairman of the Progressive state committee, petitions to put the name of the chairman's brother, Hugh T. Halbert, on the state ticket as Progressive candidate for Governor are being circulated in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Hugh T. Halbert has been in St. Paul for the past few days. He does not expect to open his campaign until late in September and says he will make it as short as possible.

"People are talking about war too much just now to make it possible to stir up much political enthusiasm," he said yesterday. "The Progressive party, however, intends to put up a hard fight in Minnesota this year and expects to win."

The petition was made necessary because the two candidates for Governor at the primaries failed to poll 10 per cent of the vote of the party at the general election in 1912. The other party nominees had no opposition and their names will go on the ballot in the regular manner, according to a ruling by Attorney General Smith.

Bedfast Mother Is Cremated.

Kenyon.—Mrs. Oscar Follingstad, wife of a farmer living 12 miles northeast of here, was burned to death in a fire which destroyed their home. The fire started from the explosion of a gasoline stove in the kitchen and the flames spread so rapidly that Mr. Follingstad was unable to come to the assistance of his wife, who lay in an upstairs bedroom.

Governor Returning Sept. 8.

St. Paul.—Governor A. O. Eberhart is due back in St. Paul from his lecture tour on September 8. Already politicians are wondering whether he will take any part in the state campaign. The Governor finishes on the Chautauqua circuit September 1. Before returning home he will go to Maine, where he is to speak at the invitation of the national committee. When Governor Eberhart was in St. Paul several days ago he said it would be hard for him to keep entirely out of politics in Minnesota.

PREPARING FOR CAMPAIGNS

Lee to Open Speaking Tour Sept. 15—Hammond Is Forced to Postpone Opening.

St. Paul.—William E. Lee will open his speaking campaign for governor Sept. 15 at Marshall.

W. S. Hammond will not open his campaign at Red Wing on Sept. 3, as first announced.

These two announcements were made simultaneously from the headquarters of the two state party organizations. The Lee meeting was arranged for by Chairman Gunnar B. Bjornson of the Republican committee, who lives in Lyon county. This county was carried by Lee in the primaries four to one, making it the banner Lee county of the state.

The opening of the Hammond campaign had to be postponed because the candidate finds that he cannot leave Washington for awhile. Business of importance is holding the congressmen at the capital, and Mr. Hammond cannot get out for the campaign before about the middle of September. His opening speech will probably follow that of Mr. Lee a few days.

Chairman Bjornson of the Republican committee issued a statement to set at rest a report that Mr. Lee had abandoned county option. It has been circulated broadcast that in his speech at the state central committee meeting Mr. Lee "sidestepped" the temperance issue, though his statement was understood by those who heard him as one more advanced in its position than ever.

"Mr. Lee is for county option first, last and all the time," said Chairman Bjornson.

MAYORS ASK FOR HEARING

Seek Definition of Indian Country and Cause of Law Enforcement With No Reds There.

Duluth.—"When is Indian country and why seek to protect 'Poor Lo' when he is not there to protect?"

The mayors of Hibbing, Chisholm and Bemidji, as well as other persons in Northern and North Central Minnesota, want these questions answered by the Department of the Interior.

Through Congressman Miller they have asked for a hearing on the question of the enforcement of the prohibition clause of the treaty of 1855.

A recent decision of the United States Supreme Court held that even if this is true, the prohibitory clause covering the entire district can be abrogated only by an act of Congress. Liquor interests have submitted a brief asking for a re-hearing.

The committee, originally consisting of five members, is to be enlarged to double that number, with representatives from all sections of the territory affected. The latter part of September or the first of October, it will go to Washington to meet the Secretary of the Interior, if a conference can be arranged.

The committee consists of Mayor Victor L. Power, Hibbing; Mayor Joseph Austin, Chisholm; E. E. McDonald, attorney, Bemidji; M. N. Koll, Cass Lake, and H. A. Brown, attorney, Crosby.

Women Thrown Into Ditch.

Alexandria.—The car of A. H. Warren of St. Paul went off the side of the road three miles east of this city, throwing three women occupants into a slough in which there was a foot or two of water. Mr. Warren and the driver remained with the car, which had skidded sideways and came to a stop at an angle of 45 degrees. Further than getting wet, the women were not injured. They were Mrs. Warren of St. Paul, Mrs. Spear of Chicago and Mrs. Smithers of St. Louis, all guests at the Blake hotel on Lake Carlos. The accident happened when the driver, Clarence Myers, attempted to pass another car.

Aged Goodhue Citizen Passes Away.

Red Wing.—Hon. Osmund J. Wing, one of the oldest residents and most honored citizens of Goodhue county, died this week at the home of his daughter, Mrs. H. G. Kintzinger, in Minneapolis. Senator Wing underwent an operation at Minneapolis some time ago and remained there for treatment for some considerable time. As soon as his strength seemed to warrant it, he returned to the old homestead in Wanamingo. He did not improve as fast as had been hoped, in fact, there were doubts as to his ultimate recovery, particularly on account of his advanced age.

Daylight Robber Gets $1,800.

Minneapolis.—In sight of nearly a dozen people, where teams are passing every minute, at noon Tuesday, an armed bandit apparently not over 20 years of age, held up Jacob Tschudy, a driver for Regan Brothers' bakery, robbed him of $1,800 in gold and silver, leaped from the Fifth avenue viaduct to the railroad tracks and got away to the Seventh street viaduct, where a confederate in an automobile awaited him. He escaped. The money was for the bakery's payroll.

LOST IN WOODS FOR 40 DAYS

MAN IN NORTHERN MINNESOTA FOUND STARVING.

Penniless, He Undertook to Walk From Duluth to Port Arthur, Ont., Lived on Berries Over Month.

Duluth. — Having been lost in the northern Minnesota woods for 40 days and nights, Hans Hanson, aged 32, of Port Arthur, Ont., was found in a semi-conscious condition on the shore of Basswood lake, 25 miles from Winton, Minn. He had no shoes, his clothes were in tatters and his reason partly gone.

According to his story he left Duluth July 14, penniless, determined to walk to Port Arthur, where he had friends. He was told of an old Indian trail that he could follow from Robinson, Minn.

During all the time he was lost Hanson did not meet a human being, he says. He lived on berries after his food supply gave out. He gave his weight at 180 pounds, but when put on a scale was found to weigh 135 pounds.

For five days, he says, he walked in a circle. Each night he would find himself near the place from whence he had started in the morning.

Acquaintances in Duluth verified his story, saying that he started on his trip July 14 and had not been heard of since.

Hanson is a German, and has been in this country but about two years. He is being cared for at a Winton hospital, and later will be sent to Port Arthur, if he recovers.

DIVERSITY SAVES THE DAY

Red River Valley Not Dependent Upon Wheat Crop Alone—No Depression Is Felt.

Crookston.—While the wheat crop in the Red River valley was damaged by hot weather, which caused rust, an encouraging note was sounded as a result of the meeting of northwestern millers in Crookston. All of them have taken in more or less of the new wheat crop and in an interview Manager S. M. Sivertson of the Crookston Milling company said:

"The new wheat, which is more or less shrunken, is 25 per cent better as milling wheat than we had expected. As a rule shrunken wheat tests from 50 to 52 pounds to the bushel. Similar wheat this year is testing from 56 to 58 pounds to the bushel. This, we figure, indicates that the wheat can only indicate a greater percentage of gluten, which makes flour."

There is now such a diversity of products in the valley the fact that wheat is not up to the standard is not having a depressing influence. The barley crop is one of the biggest ever raised, rye is excellent, and the corn crop, according to Henry O'Neill and J. M. Stephens, the pioneer corn raisers of the county, will be the biggest ever known in the valley. In addition there will be the biggest alfalfa tonnage in the history of the valley and a large amount of cloverseed raised for the market. Threshing is being rushed on all sides and the land will be cleared for fall plowing the earliest in the history of the valley.

WIND ALMOST CAUSES WRECK

Boxcar on Track at Eyota Blows Away and Serious Accident Narrowly Averted.

Rochester.—A wreck on the Chicago & Northwestern railway was narrowly averted when a boxcar standing on a side track at Eyota was given momentum by a terific wind.

The car started down grade and, reaching the switch, instead of being ditched, all four wheels righted themselves on the main track, and with the wind as a propelling force the car continued its journey down the line, increasing its speed every moment.

From the east a heavy freight train was coming, and the first intimation of the fast approaching runaway car was given the engineer by flashes of lightning that illuminated the track many rods distant. The brakes were automatically applied and a wreck averted.

Sixteen Girls Are Paroled.

Sauk Center.—Sixteen girls were paroled from the Sauk Center training school for girls by the board of control at the institution Tuesday. The paroles were granted subject to finding proper homes for the girls. The population of the school is 177. In the last two years 133 girls have been paroled. Of this number 24 returned, some of them voluntarily. From 12 of these girls the school officers have not received good reports.

Meetings of Episcopal Church.

St. Paul.—The Protestant Episcopal church will hold a series of important sessions in the Twin Cities October 7 to 11. A feature will be the election of missionary bishops to fill vacant bishoprics in Cuba, Washington and Nevada. The primary meeting of the synod of the sixth province, which embraces Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming and Colorado, will be held in St. Paul October 10. The sessions will be in the club house of the church of St. John the Evangelist.

There exists now a new, compelling reason for buying Goodyear tires. It results from War conditions.

These leading tires—built of extra-fine rubber, in the same way as always—are selling today at June prices.

You will find today a very wide difference between most tire prices and Goodyears.

Due to Quick Action

Early in August—when war began—the world's rubber markets seemed closed to us. Rubber prices doubled almost over night.

Men could see no way to pay for rubber abroad, and no way to bring it in. We, like others—in that panic—were forced to higher prices. But we have since gone back to prices we charged before the war, and this is how we did it:

We had men in London and Singapore when the war broke out. The larger part of the world's rubber supply comes through there. We cabled them to buy up the pick of the rubber. They bought—before the advance—1,500,-000 pounds of the finest rubber there.

Nearly all this is now on the way to us. And it means practically all of the extra-grade rubber obtainable abroad.

Today we have our own men in Colombo, Singapore and Para. Those are the world's chief sources of rubber. So we are pretty well assured of a constant supply, and our pick of the best that's produced.

We were first on the ground. We were quickest in action. As a result, we shall soon have in storage an almost record supply of this extra grade of rubber.

And we paid about June prices.

Now Inferior Grades Cost Double

About the only crude rubber available now for many makers is inferior. In ordinary times, the best tire makers refuse it. Much of it had been rejected. But that "off rubber" now sells for much more than we paid for the best.

The results are these:

Tire prices in general are far in advance of Goodyears. And many tire makers, short of supplies, will be forced to use second-grade rubber.

Be Careful Now

In Goodyears we pledge you the same grade tire as always. And that grade won for Goodyears the top place in Tiredom—the largest sale in the world.

And, for the time being, our prices are the same as before the war. We shall try to keep them there.

We accept no excessive orders, but dealers will be kept supplied. And we charge them, until further notice, only ante-bellum prices.

That means that Goodyears—the best tires built—are selling way below other tires.

AIRSHIPS AND SUBMARINES WASPS OF WAR

MAY FIGHT ONE ANOTHER

Each Invention Now Is Prepared to Pull the Other's Sting, but Their Actual Value Is Yet to Be Demonstrated.

Every modern war has been fought with new weapons, and for the last century there have been countless inventions for the carrying on of warfare in a particularly destructive manner, with the philanthropic intent that war was fast becoming so horrible and terrible thta it must soon pass away from the face of the earth, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

But it happened that as soon as a particularly horrible contrivance was invented and introduced into armies and navies inventors immediately busied themselves by offsetting and discounting its probable effect. Consequently war not only has not passed away, but we still have it with us. Thus it is that each big war, after being heralded as the world's last conflagration, is found upon examination to be false, and the end of war is not yet arrived.

Trying Out Inventions.

In the present war in Europe there are being tried under the conditions of actual hostilities many improvements and inventions that previously have been tried only under laboratory conditions. Their real worth will only be discovered at the close of the conflict.

No army or navy engaged in the present conflict in Europe but what is possessed of nearly all of the modern improvements made since 1870. The submarine, which was a dream in 1865, is owned by the navy of the smallest power. It is true that single submarines are not expected to accomplish much in a real struggle, so the larger navies of the great powers have fleets of submarines. The aeroplane and the dirigible balloon are to be found in the possession of all armies in Europe today, yet they, too, are only expected to be of real service when they are possessed in large numbers.

The airships and the submarines are the wasps of modern warfare. Like the little insect, while they have a powerful sting, they are very vulnerable, and may be easily crushed and rendered powerless.

Aeroplane and Wireless.

In the recent smaller wars, aeroplanes have been used to a limited extent, and this use has been so much limited that their real efficiency is expected to be finally determined by the present war.

It is much the same with the wireless telegraph. While it was used in the Russo-Japanese war of ten years ago, the apparatus was still rudimentary, and the installations too few, while the range of the apparatus was too limited to show the greatest efficiency. In the intervening decade, however, great advance has been made in wireless. It is now possible and, indeed, is a custom every day, to send and receive messages from a distance of more than 5,000 miles. This, then, is a new and important factor in naval operations, as was seen by the censorship put over the great sending stations on this side of the Atlantic by the United States authortiies.

Wireless has also been successfully attached to aeroplanes.

The submarine was in existence in 1904, but it was a very different sea wasp to that which England, France and Germany are using today. Yet its real value is yet to be determined, and it is expected that this demonstration will come during the present conflict.

Rapid Increase of Submarines.

At the time of the Spanish-American war there were only five submarines in all the navies of the world.

The latest edition of Brassey's Naval Annual for this year gives the number of submarines in the various navies, and shows what interest is being taken in the wasp of the sea. Great Britain has 76 built, and is building 20 more; Germany, who only began building a few years ago, already has 27, 70 and is building 12 more; France has 70 and is building 23 additional onces; Russia has 25, and is building 18; while the United States has 29, and is building 21; Austria has 18, and has four under construction, while Italy owns 18, and is building two. Yet the submarine is still an unknown quantity in warfare.

Submarine in War.

Many of the early submarines are small and probably of little efficiency, and France has numerous types about which little is known by the outside world. The German submarines are said to be built along the Holland lines, while the Russian submarines are said to follow one or more of the French types.

The submarine, from a romantic viewpoint, should be a great factor in deciding a naval engagement, but the fact remains that up to the present time it has done nothing to prove its value. It was believed that the moral effect of the submarine would be almost as important as its physical effect upon an enemy's warship, but this belief has not been justified up to the present moment.

There were notions that there would be terrific fights under the seas by submarine meeting submarine and destroying each other. But it has been found that when submerged the submarine is as blind as the traditional bat. Its crew cannot see any object under water, and is compelled to resort to the use of the periscope, which emerges unostentatiously above the water, in order to see its own course.

It is known that the periscope is the eye of the submarine, and naturally attention has been paid to the best way of destroying this vital part of their boats.

The designers of the submarine did not count upon it being seen. It was believed that it would go upon its way, dealing death without observation, although its periscope does make a slight wake on the water, and when submerged there are telltale bubbles. But it has been discovered that from a certain height an observer may trace the course of a submerged submarine with as great accuracy as if it was running on the surface. The dirigible balloon and the aeroplane now can ferret out the sneaking submarine, and they both are supposed to be armed to destroy the warship that moves like a fish.

WASTE LAND MADE FERTILE

Remarkable Results Have Followed Experiments Only Recently Undertaken in Egypt.

As an indication of the ultimate outcome in the great delta of Egypt, where 1,500,000 acres of wash salt land awaits development, toward the end of 1912 about 800 acres of absolutely waste land at Biala were taken in hand. The land was so heavily impregnated with salt that for ages nothing had grown on it. A scientific system of irrigation and drainage was laid out, under direction of Lord Kitchener, at a cost of $50 an acre, and it was then handed over to the fellaheen in five-acre plots for cultivation. Last year the land was washed, and a crop of rice was grown, giving a satisfactory yield. After the rice crop the salt distribution was measured, and the percentage was considerably reduced. To the great astonishment of the fellaheen cultivators, a permanent result had been achieved in one year, which under the ordinary system prevailing in the country would have taken thre or four years to accomplish. Cotton is now, therefore, being satisfactorily grown on a fair proportion of this area, and it is expected that it will bring from $75 to $100 an acre.

CANADA'S HUGE GRAIN BINS

From the Port Arthur (Canada) Evening Chronicle

Kansas City gains the attention of the New York Evening Post and is given five inches of space in that admirable newspaper by reason of increasing the capacity of a grain elevator there. The Evening Post says:

"When the additions and alterations to its huge grain elevator at Kansas City now under way are completed the Missouri Pacific-Iron Mountain railroad will have one of the largest plants of its kind in the world."

The present capacity of the Kansas City product is one million bushels. When it gains its promised stature and becomes "one of the largest in the world" it will have a capacity of 2,133,000 bushels.

At the mention of grain elevators the twin ports at the head of the lakes prick up their ears and take notice. The name of Lloyd-George at a Tory garden party, or of President Wilson at a bankers' convention catches attention no quicker than the word "elevator" in the hearing of a Port Arthur-Fort William man. Toronto prides itself on its churches; Pittsburgh specializes on millionaires; Chicago has its pork and Boston its pork and beans—as for us, we rise to fame on the bins of our elevators, and he who says "one of the largest" about any old two-million-bushel outfit in Missouri must withdraw the statement or name the place and weapons.

If the Evening Post had said "one of the largest in Missouri," or in the general but expressive American phrase had said "some elevator," we wouldn't have minded it so much, but when it describes this stunted Missouri receptacle as "one of the largest grain elevators in the world" then it is time to kick. Why, two-million-bushel elevators are so common hereabouts that the secretary of the board of trade does not point them out to distinguished visitors. Nothing could show clearer than that what we think of two-million-bushel elevators.

When we have pointed to the 9,500,000-bushel C. N. R. elevator and the 7,800,000-bushel C. P. R. elevator and the 6,500,000-bushel G. T. P. elevator; then to the 3,500,000-bushel Dominion Government elevator which is only the first unit of what is to be a 30-million-bushel plant, by that time the air is so full of millions that the listener would be annoyed if we bothered him with mention of a mere two-million-bushel affair. So we just lump the balance together and describe the grand total of 45-million-bushel capacity already standing at the head of the lakes.

Upon the basis upon which Kansas City got five inches of space in the Evening Post we claim a complimentary writeup of at least three columns and in the article we would state that in one respect we are like Kansas City—when it is a question of big elevators we also are from Missouri.

SISTER'S TRICK

But It All Came Out Right.

How a sister played a trick that brought rosy health to a coffee fiend is an interesting tale:

"I was a coffee fiend—a trembling, nervous, physical wreck, yet clinging to the poison that stole away my strength. I mocked at Postum and would have none of it.

"One day my sister substituted a cup of piping hot Postum for my morning cup of coffee but did not tell me what it was. I noticed the richness of it and remarked that the 'coffee' tasted fine but my sister did not tell me I was drinking Postum for fear I might not take any more.

"She kept the secret and kept giving me Postum instead of coffee until I grew stronger, more tireless, got a better color in my sallow cheeks and a clearness to my eyes, then she told me of the health-giving, nerve-strengthening life-saver she had given me in place of my morning coffee.

"From that time I became a disciple of Postum and no words can do justice in telling the good this cereal drink did me. I will not try to tell it, for only after having used it can one be convinced of its merits."

Ten days' trial shows Postum's power to rebuild what coffee has destroyed.

Postum comes in two forms:

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

SLAUGHTER AT CHARLEROI IS GREATEST IN HISTORY

By FRANKLIN P. MERRICK.

International News Service.

Paris.—Burned villages and heaps of bodies lying on Belgian soil around Charleroi show the ferocity with which the allied French and British troops opposed the wave of German troops that rolled them over and drove them back to France.

For ten hours the tide of battle ebbed and flowed at Charleroi, the town being taken and retaken five times before the allies withdrew.

Part of the city was wrecked, according to reports received by the war office. The villages of Marchiennes, Monceau, Chatelet and Landelles were burned.

Citizens Killed.

Though the inhabitants of the peaceful little villages had been warned that the conflict was coming, scores remained in their homes and perished in the flames or were killed under the rain of shot and shell that swept the streets when they were driven from the shattered structures.

Fierce hand to hand fighting took place in Charleroi. The French were the first to occupy the town, but they were driven out by a bombardment from the German artillery. The Germans then entered by the left bank of the river Sambre, but within a short time more of the allies' troops arrived and the conflict was renewed. The Germans sought cover in the houses in the lower part of the town and to dislodge them the French were forced to sweep that section with their artillery.

Wounded Fill Town.

The lower part of the town was soon in flames and the Germans were forced into the streets. Back and forth through these surged the contesting soldiers, fighting desperately for victory. The dead lay thick when the French were finally forced to withdraw.

For three days wounded soldiers have been pouring into Maubeuge. The monastery and nunnery there are filled. The inhabitants have given up their homes to the war's victims.

On Sunday the Germans drove the French troops through the town of Charleroi, back to the second defensive position on the line defined by the towns of Avesnes, Rocroi and Mezieres.

Recaptured by French.

The French artillery from the heights now turned a furious cannonading on Charleroi, which had been bombarded previously by the Germans from the other side. The German position was so weakened by the deadly accuracy of the French gunnery that a counter attack by the allies was ordered and at daylight on Monday the entire line advanced, charged the German position and recaptured Charleroi.

The conflict probably was unequaled in history in severity and casualties. The Germans must have succeeded in bringing up reserves, for early on Tuesday they made a successful counter attack along the whole battle line and retook Charleroi, driving the French back to an intrenched position, which they held until the morning of the second day.

Retreat in Good Order.

The retreat was made in good order, the main forces of the French remaining intact.

Both armies suffered terrific losses. The battle has not yet finished.

The German catapult is hammering at the French and British allies again, trying to batter its relentless way to Paris. There is desperate fighting along the Belgian frontier at several points, and French victories are reported at two places, Charleroi and Courtrai, though nothing official has been given out.

Turcos Charge Battery.

At the beginning of the combat, the French made a sortie in a medieval manner, with the object of surprising the enemy. The latter were found in number far exceeding the French expectations, and the attempt to rout them failed.

Then the Turcos, in the face of a withering fire, charged a German battery at the point of the bayonet. Five hundred of these brave French soldiers from North Africa left on the charge. Only 100 returned.

Before the railway station the Germans fought for two hours in an effort to capture the bridge. Their losses were enormous, but the bridge was captured.

French Beaten Rapidly.

After the Teutonic advance overwhelmed the bridge, the Germans gained ground rapidly, taking in succession the villages of Marchiennes, Landelis and Montignies and the country as far as Walcourt.

Later the French artillery opened fire on Charleroi and the French infantry advanced under this cover. The tide of battle appeared to favor the tri-color, but not for long.

French infantrymen declared the roofs became so jammed with dead that the victims of battle remained standing where they were shot, and were used by the living as breastworks from behind which to fire on the enemy.

The last stand of the French was along the line between Thuin and Mettet.

At nightfall the fighting ended, both sides tired beyond endurance. Monday morning the French returned to the attack, entering the town in the face of a withering fire from machine guns mounted in the steeples, and driving the German defenders in confusion across the river Sambre.

Many Houses In Flames.

They found many houses smoldering or in flames. The inhabitants, terror-stricken, were in the cellars. German officers and soldiers were found dead in the streets, side by side with Frenchmen who had fallen before or afterward.

One German officer was shot while he was washing his face, and his head was bowed over a basin, while his face was covered with soap.

Another had been lifting a cup of coffee to his lips when a French bullet brought death. He was found lying face downward across a table, the broken cup beside him on the floor.

German Losses Enormous.

An idea of the enormous losses of the Germans in the great battle in southwestern Belgium and of the bravery of the kaiser's soldiers is given in the story of a returned traveler who witnessed part of the fighting along the Sambre river, southwest of Charleroi.

"I was near Fereux, in a region covered with dense woods, while the fighting was taking place," said he. "I could hear the sound of cannon away to the east and knew that a big battle was raging. From my place in the forest I suddenly saw the advance guard of a German army approaching along a roadway which skirted the trees.

"There seemed to be an endless procession of soldiers, all dressed in a uniform of gray. Rank after rank passed by and I thought that the end would never come.

"There was no hesitation. The men swung forward with quick steps and I saw officers galloping along the lines urging them forward.

French Open Fire.

"Suddenly there was a fresh sound of battle, this time in front of me and I knew that the French artillery had opened upon the advance guard of the Germans. I moved cautiously forward to a point where I could get a view of the battle scene. It was a view which seared itself into my memory.

"The French guns were hurling a hurricane of steel and flame into the German ranks, but the soldiers pushed forward with their battle shouts on their lips. Straight into that pit of destruction rushed the advancing troops. Men fell, on every hand. It seemed that whole platoons melted away.

"Over the bodies of the dead and wounded pushed the rear ranks of the invading army, rushing with fixed bayonets upon the smoking muzzles of the French artillery. It was a superb picture of gallantry.

Aeroplane Is Smashed.

"Near Erquelinnes I saw a German aeroplane brought down. The military aviator was flying high in the air, taking a reconnoissance of the allies' positions. The specially constructed guns, designed to attack air craft. were turned upon the aeroplane, but the aviator continued his work. Suddenly I saw the machine lurch, splinters flew, and then the shattered machine began to drop. It had been smashed by a projectile."

GERMANS DRAG GUNS OVER THEIR OWN DEAD

London.—The correspondent of the Daily Mail describes a visit among the French who were wounded in the battles of the Vosges and have been brought to Vichy, where the hotels have been transformed into hospitals.

A wounded artilleryman contributed the following experience:

"I witnessed one horrible scene. The Germans were shooting from the deep trenches among which our artillery was doing terrible work. But as fast as a German dropped a fresh man took his place until bodies of the Germans were on a level with the surface of the earthworks.

"At this moment a German battery was ordered to advance. The heavy wheels sank in the trench, but the drivers furiously lashed their horses and finally dragged the guns across the human bridge."

WHAT PRISONERS OF WAR WILL EAT

The following scale of daily rations for prisoners of war has been approved by the military authorities:

One pound of bread, three-quarters of a pound of biscuit, one pound of preserved meat, three ounces of cheese, five-eighths of an ounce of tea, one-quarter of a pound of jam, three ounces of sugar, one-half of an ounce of salt, one-twentieth of an ounce of mustard, one-thirty-sixth of an ounce of pepper, one-half of a pound of fresh vegetables.

Two ounces of tobacco will be furnished each week for smokers.

Gunners Made Stone Deaf.

London.—A medical correspondent of the Times who has just returned from Belgium says it is morally certain that all the artillerymen of the forts at Liege are now stone deaf.

"The nerves of hearing must fail under the strain of dwelling upwards of a fortnight in a world of mighty explosions," he says. "For these men the guns thunder now only in a silence which may never be broken."

It broke out in tiny blisters, then would get dry and crack and swell so I could not have my hands in warm water they hurt me so badly. I could not do all my work. The itching and burning were terrible. The more I scratched my hands the worse it made them. They were so bad I could not help scratching them and would walk the floor they annoyed me so. I could not sleep, lost many nights of rest on account of the eczema. My hands were not fit to be seen and I kept them wrapped up and wore mittens that I made out of old linen.

Water Is Good Medicine

Many people who have weak kidneys fail to appreciate how much water can do for them—but while it is good to drink water freely, it must be pure water. In many sections, the lime or alkaline water starts kidney trouble of itself.

Doan's Kidney Pills are a most reliable remedy for weak kidneys. When backache or urinary disorders first appear, take Doan's and be sure to assist the kidneys by drinking plenty of pure water. Prompt treatment will assist the danger of gravel, gout, rheumatism.

Doan's Kidney Pills are successfully used all over the civilized world and publicly recommended by thousands.

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

THE TIE THAT BINDS

"OPPOSITES attract each other," say those who would explain the marriage of two persons totally unlike in taste and temperament. They may attract, but do they hold each other? When the excitement and flush of passion—mistaken for love—have subsided, the two parties to an uncongenial union remain distinct entities, together but entirely separate.

Of course when people fancy themselves in love they will not believe these facts. With the fine sophistry born of that condition, they think they know their own minds and that they are right and all the skeptical world is wrong.

So it was with Daniel Drayton and Daisy, his wife. Their Christian names were not more unlike than their characters. She was fond of society, caring nothing for intellectual pursuits—a butterfly of a girl. The man she married was deep hearted and affectionate, but grave and thoughtful. When released from business, he desired no other recreation than that found in his library. Books were his delight.

His wife was, by nature, a happy little creature, lovely to look at and ready to make friends with her husband's acquaintances in New York, to which city she came as a bride. She had a graceful, almost deferential manner that won for her a ready liking and admiration from all who met her. She was delighted to find herself invited to many places, and would bring cards and invitations to her husband with the joyous enthusiasm of a child.

"Dan!" she would exclaim, "you will go to this dinner-dance, won't you?"

"But you can 'sit out' dances, and you can always talk when you want to," she added archly.

He smiled affectionately. "I always want to talk to you," he said, "and I can do that to much better advantage in our own house than in a great drawing room full of chattering people for whom I care nothing."

"But you ought to care for them," she insisted. "I do. And I love that kind of thing—society, I mean—and I wish you did. You see, I never have had much of it, for I was at school until last year. And I am interested in knowing all about real life."

Her husband shook his head. "That is not real life, child. Don't fancy that. Society is the thing that people go into to try to make them forget that they have not made the most of the real things, or that they do not appreciate them."

"True human beings with souls above dress and dances and silly gossip; books that take one out of one's own narrow sphere and fill the brain with big thought," he declared gravely.

"It's queer," commented the wife, "that you care for dull, sober things when I want you to like what I am fond of—pretty clothes and jolly times. As for books, really, Dan, I could live happily all my days without them. I like a novel once in a while, but those dull books you have on your shelves are the limit!"

She raised her eyes to his as she spoke, and he noted with a thrill of admiration how pretty she was.

"It is time we were dressing to go to Mrs. Burton's reception, Dan."

He looked at her, appalled. "Mrs. Burton's reception! Is it tonight?"

His wife moved impatiently. "My dear Dan, I reminded you of it this morning and told you not to forget it!"

"Well, I did forget it," was the rueful reply. "Don't let's go. Send some one around with our cards."

In spite of his distaste for the kind of life that his wife loved, Daniel Drayton appreciated that she was too attractive a woman to be allowed to attend evening functions unattended by her husband, and, for the sake of the conventionalities, he formed the habit of acting as her escort to theaters and dinner, to receptions and soirees.

The second winter after their marriage Daisy was pale and languid, and Dan suggested that she consult a physician. This she refused to do, declaring that she was "just tired." The Christmas holidays, with their attendant festivities, had wearied her, mused her husband. She needed rest and change of air and scene. Such being the case, he acquiesced readily to her proposal that she make a visit to her mother, living in Chicago. The husband urged her to refrain from too much gaiety while absent.

"You know that your social life is waiting here for you when you return," he reminded her, "so do take care of yourself and get rested while away."

Daisy's letters showed him that she had forgotten or disregarded his advice, for they were full of accounts of the various functions she was attending and the good times she was having. Feeling powerless to interfere any further, the husband shrugged his shoulders and accepted philosophically his present life. But when she had been away for a fortnight he was aroused from his placidity of mind by a special-delivery letter from his mother-in-law. It informed him that Daisy had been taken suddenly ill, that the worst was now over, but that she had asked that he come and take her home as soon as she was well enough to travel. The next paragraph in the letter stunned the reader:

"I am sorry," it ran, "that neither you nor Daisy thought it worth while to inform me of the true condition of affairs. Had you done so I would have guarded the dear girl against such over-exertion as has culminated in her present illness. It followed upon a long evening of dancing. I find it hard to excuse your reticence and hers when I consider that, had we been more careful, I should by next summer have held my first grandbaby in my arms."

The husband gasped and dropped the letter. How could he tell his mother-in-law that he, himself, had not known the truth? Yet, when he knelt beside Daisy's bed and felt her arms about his neck, all resentment died within him.

"Don't be angry, Dan," she sobbed.

Of course he kissed her and told her not to cry. "But," he queried, "didn't you know you should be taking care of yourself? Why didn't you tell me everything, darling?"

"Because," she murmured, "I knew you would stop my going out, and make me stay stupidly at home for months. And I didn't want to do that yet."

"Didn't you think of the baby that was coming to make us happy, dear?" suggested the husband.

"Yes," she declared, "of course I did! And," her eyes overflowing again with tears, "I planned all about the pretty things I would buy for it—and now that's all over!"

Pity for her evident distress kept the man silent on the subject during the weeks and months that followed. It was this same motive that prevented his uttering any objection when, as soon as she was well again, Daisy returned to the social world of which she liked to feel herself a part. It helped her forget her disappointment, Dan reminded himself.

Yet, in her heart, the wife longed for greater liberty than she possessed. Once she tried to break away from what she felt to be her husband's restraining influence and accepted an invitation without waiting for his final decision upon it. It was on a beautiful spring morning more than two years after her illness that she received an invitation for herself and Dan to spend the week-end at a country place on Long Island.

Daisy's heart beat high with anticipation. Dan had already gone to his office for the day—what about him? He had said last fall that he hated week-end parties, and that the last one of which he was a self-sacrificing part, and at which Daisy had had "a perfect time," was "a miracle of stupidity." He did not play bridge, and would not learn when asked to; he did not dance, he had no small talk, and in the huge house in which they were guests there was, he complained, "nothing worth reading, even if the people had been quiet long enough to allow one to read." No more of that kind of thing for him! Daisy had bitten her lip and said nothing. But today she hoped he had forgotten his decision. To make sure of it she would call him up at once. His voice at the other end of the wire was so perfunctory and dry that his wife felt little shivers run along her spine. But, summoning her courage, she explained the situation. There was a moment's silence, then her husband's only reply was in the form of a question:

"Well?"

"Oh, Dan, didn't you hear what I told you?" exclaimed the nervous woman. "I said that this morning I got a letter—"

"I heard all that!" interrupted Dan. "But what do you want to know?"

"Why, if you will go, of course!" came the tremulous answer.

The wife knew by her husband's tone that he was exercising all his self-control to speak patiently. "My dear, I really have no time to consider any trifling matter of that kind this morning. I am up to my ears in work at present. We will talk the matter over when I come home tonight. Is there anything of any importance that you wish to speak about just now?"

For a moment the angry woman held the receiver in her hand, her face flushed, her eyes full of tears. Then she made a sudden resolution and, with a voice that still trembled, called up the number of the friend from whom she had received the alluring invitation. She explained that perhaps Dan would be detained in town on business, but that she, herself, would surely come if her hostess would take her alone. Would it be time enough if she let her know Dan's plans tomorrow?

When Dan heard the condition of affairs that night he looked his astonishment. "You accepted an invitation without knowing whether I would go or not!" he exclaimed.

There was a new note of defiance in the wife's tone. "I certainly did," she retorted. "I do not mean to miss the things I enjoy just because of a whim of yours."

"But suppose I do not want to go?"

"Then I shall go without you," declared the woman firmly.

There was a dead silence for a minute. Then Daisy went on with: "I would, however, like to know, for the sake of courtesy, what I am to tell Mrs. Jackson. Common politeness demands that you accept or decline."

"And uncommon politeness has moved you to leave me out of your arrangements," affirmed her husband.

The wife laughed with forced mirth, then grew grave. "See here, Dan," she urged, "do, for once, look at the matter sanely and, if possible, unselfishly. You like one kind of thing, I like another kind. Why may not each of us enjoy life in our own way? You like to stay at home and read, and I prefer to go out and have a good time. Is not my right to live my life as good as your right to live yours?"

"You mean," asked her husband, "that you want me to say you may accept any invitations without consulting me, and I am at liberty to decline or accept them as I please?"

"Just that."

For a moment the man knew that he felt in his innermost soul a throb of relief at the possibility that hereafter he need not go about to all kinds of society affairs with his wife.

His wife's voice checked his musings. "Really, Dan," she was saying tremulously, "when you remember that in a few months I won't be able to go out and have fun, I do not think that you need grudge me the enjoyment of this little outing now."

With a pang of remorse the husband drew her to him. "Forgive me, dear!" he pleaded. "I was a brute to forget. Of course we'll go to the Jackson's week-end party, and anywhere else you want to go, and you shall have all the good times you want now, for"—his voice softening—"when you have a dear little child who needs you, you will not want to go away from home any more."

His wife looked at him gravely. "I am not so sure of that," she said calmly.

And her husband had the wisdom to make no reply.

During the weeks of the following summer when Daisy's physical condition prevented her going into society, Dan set aside, as often as was practicable, his work, his books, and all his personal inclinations in order to minister to her whims and fancies. He walked with her and drove with her, for they had taken a furnished cottage in a quiet country place for the heated term. He knew that she was wearied by the monotony of their daily life, for, as she cared little for books, and was not well enough to meet the few city people who were summering in the nearby village, one day was much like another. He wondered sometimes whose fault it all was. One day a man met on the train was talking of marriage, and dropped a sentence that lingered in Daniel Drayton's memory for months afterward.

"Married life," affirmed his new acquaintance, "must have something more than love to hold two people together. A couple who are congenial may be comparatively happy, even if they do not feel a passionate love for each other; but the most ardent love will faint and die if it is not backed by congeniality of taste and interests. Were I a woman I would rather that my husband were my friend than my lover. A real man does not go back on a friend, but husband and wife who are not comrades and chums tire of each other, and"—with an expressive gesture—"smash something—the marriage vows, or their own lives, unless, of course, there is the one great tie which makes their smashing things a crime."

"And that tie," queried Dan, "is?"

"A child or children, sir!"

"No," said the other bitterly, "they don't, except when the parents are too decent to let the children pay for their mistakes."

In his own room that night, after a dull evening with Daisy, Dan sat by the open window, smoking and pondering. He dwelt on the evening just past, and recalled how Daisy had talked a little of what some of her friends were doing in the mountains or at the seashore, of what the magazines said of the fashions for the coming autumn, of how she would like to have her furs remodeled for next winter. Dan had yawned, but not openly, as Daisy did, for he did not want to hurt her feelings. But he sighed with relief when the clock struck ten, and she said that she was weary and wanted to go to bed. She heard the sigh and turned on him suspiciously.

"What's the matter? Are you tired of hearing me talk?" she demanded.

"Why, no," he answered mendaciously, "but the heat in town today was very enervating."

Now, alone, he whispered the truth. "Heaven forgive me! I was bored to death!"

He sat for some time trying to appreciate what the condition of affairs meant, how he and his wife would live together through all the coming years, each preying on the other. His soul sickened at the thought. Did Daisy appreciate it as he did?

Her voice calling him from the next room came as an answer to his question. He obeyed her summons promptly, carrying his cigar with him.

"Dan," came the sweet but fretful voice, "won't tomorrow be the first of September?"

"Yes, dear." (That perfunctory "dear"! How hard married couples "work" it!)

"And we will surely go home the fifteenth, won't we?"

"Certainly."

"Thank the Lord!" she murmured.

Daniel and Daisy Drayton had been married five years when their son was born. Daisy took the responsibilities of motherhood as she took everything, lightly. She was not to blame, for it was her nature. A full pint-measure is really just as full as is a gallon-measure. The husband used to remind himself of this fact when he was tempted to be impatient with what he called, when angry, her "shallow nature." "Perhaps, after all," he would muse, "she is wiser than I. Things don't hurt her long. As for me—well, I won't let them hurt me. She and I will just have to rub along as other people do. And, thank God, there's the baby to keep life endurable!"

For the dissatisfied man soon found that the knowledge that he had a son to love and live for did much toward making the future bright.

As long as Daisy had her baby and her social pleasures she looked no deeper into conditions. She did not neglect her child as the woman of today terms neglect. She made time each day to play with him, to rock him in her arms and to listen to suggestions from his nurse as to what was needed to make his tasteful wardrobe even more elaborate.

Familiarity with society and obedience to its many claims did not breed contempt of it in Daisy. As she and her husband grew farther apart, she threw herself into the gay life more enthusiastically than ever. As Dan must be at his office all day he need never be pressed into service for afternoon engagements. But he still, with such patience as he could muster, did escort duty to evening affairs, except on the one night of the week on which Daisy attended the meeting of the musical club to which she belonged. To this club she went in a cab, returning in one. She did not mention to her husband that one of the men members often accompanied her to her front door. But one evening, returning home earlier than usual, she suggested that Tom Nash, her escort, come in for a few minutes. Dan, hearing a man's voice in the drawing-room, left his book and came in, as in duty bound, making an ennuye third in the brief chat that ensued before the guest took his departure.

The next morning at breakfast the husband remarked, apropos of the conversation of the previous evening, that "Tom Nash carried light guns."

The wife flushed uncomfortably. "I wish you would not criticize my friends," she demurred.

Dan raised his brows in suprise. "Is he a friend of yours?" he queried. "I thought of him simply as a chance acquaintance."

"He has been of service to me several times," insisted Daisy, too much vexed to consider the admission she was making, "in bringing me home from the club."

Her husband frowned. "I wish," he protested, "that you would not have men bring you home at night."

"Why, not?" queried the woman petulantly. "I see no reason why I should take that drive alone."

"And if I am willing to leave at a garage a standing order for a taxi for you whenever you want one, I see no reason why any man need act as escort to you."

"Fortunately," retorted the wife, "other men have more regard for my comfort and safety than you have."

A hard look came into the man's eyes. Only last week he had received a letter from his sister, who had been paying a visit in Daisy's former hometown, and it had contained a sentence that had rankled. "I wonder," it ran, "if you ever knew that Daisy was engaged to another man when she met you, and that rumor declares that she did not break off her affair with him until after she had accepted you." Dan had grown hot with indignation when he read the sentence, but the resentment was against his sister, not Daisy. He did not believe the rumor. Women were jealous; his wife was a popular beauty, his sister an unattractive spinster. But, underneath, the suspicion remained, not dead, but smoldering. At his wife's taunt it flashed into a blaze.

"You seem to know a great deal of other men's regard for you," he said significantly. "Apparently you know how to handle several of them at a time, as you did at the time that we became engaged."

To the husband's painful surprise the shaft went straight home. The woman paled slightly, and her eyes widened in startled amazement.

"What do you mean?" she asked quickly.

"Only that it is well to be off with the old love before one is on with the new!" scoffed the man. "I happen to know that you kept one man dangling on your string until you had landed another, then dropped number one."

Daisy's eyes flashed. "So you've been listening to gossip about your wife, have you!" she burst forth. "And may I ask what business it is of yours or of anybody's what I did before I was married?"

"It's a good deal of my business what you did after you were engaged to me," replied her husband, but the woman rushed on, heedless of his remark.

"You taunt me with what you consider the facts, and I'll give you truth as it was!" she declared hotly. "I was at school. Then I met you, and I accepted you, for I knew—or thought"—with cutting emphasis—"that I loved you. And I wrote at once to the other fellow—he was hardly more than a boy—and discarded him. There, that is the truth, and more of it is that I was a fool to do it. He at least was a gentleman!"

With a sob of rage she fled from the room. Her husband stood looking at the door she had slammed behind her. "It's hell!" he muttered between set teeth. "That's what it is, hell!"

Then, with a sudden chill, he appreciated that, though angry, he was not wounded. Once such a scene with Daisy would have wrung his heart. Now he felt no tenderness of pity for her. Was his love dead? he asked himself. And was hers, too?

After that episode the shams of mutual consideration which each had reared during the past years were often down. Daisy liked her ease too much to quarrel unnecessarily, and, as it was more comfortable to be pleasant than unpleasant, she did not, unless already angered, seek cause for quarrel, and her husband followed her lead. But only those who are bound to each other by law and the church know how many inescapable causes of friction occur in the family life.

It is strange how certain traditions hold when, that for which they first stood is gone, how those who deny the spirit still cling to the form. This is shown in nothing more strongly than in the meaningless nightly kiss exchanged in some households between the uncongenial heads. It amused Dan that Daisy kept up this custom. She, not being of an analytic or introspective nature, retained the habit of pausing each night long enough to drop upon his unresponsive lips the perfunctory percussion that had replaced the wifely kiss. The irony of the situation caused his nature to revolt on a certain night on which, as he had a cold, he had gone to his room early. It was on the evening of the annual dinner of the musical club, to which each member was allowed to bring a guest. As Dan had been the unwilling victim upon several of these occasions, he found himself reconciled to the slight attack of bronchitis which made his remaining at home on this particular night advisable. Daisy declared that she must go if he was well enough to be left, and, she added as an afterthought, if Dan did not mind. Dan did not mind, he assured her, seeing in her unusual deference to his wishes a happy mood produced by pleasurable anticipation of an evening of gaiety undarkened by the shadow of his compulsory presence. At heart he knew that Daisy would not let a little thing like his wishes stand in the way of the jolly dinner at Delmonico's with the set which she enjoyed, and of which he inwardly disapproved. He had voiced this disapproval long ago, but his remarks were met with such outbursts of vehement protest from his wife that he had not, since then, ventured to utter any further criticism on this subject. He did not care enough to court a scene by interfering.

So this evening, after he and his boy, who was now over two years old, had had their accustomed romp, Dan took his solitary dinner, and went to his room. He lay in bed reading when his wife returned from the Delmonico dinner at eleven o'clock and stopped to tell him good night. As she approached him the acrid odor of cigarette smoke reached his nostrils.

"Whew!" he ejaculated, "what a smell of tobacco! Have you had a cigarette?" he demanded suspiciously, for he was so old fashioned that he disapproved of women's smoking and drinking in public places.

"No," was the soft reply, "but all the men were smoking, and I sat near Tom Nash, who had an awfully strong cigar. That's why my hair and dress smell of it."

Her eyes did not meet her husband's, and he knew she was evading the truth. To prevent further questioning she bent hurriedly and gave him the usual good night kiss. He laughed roughly.

"And I suppose Tom Nash had been drinking, and the reason your breath smells of liquor is because your lips were so near his!" he mocked.

For a moment the wife was staggered by the cool brutality of the speech, then a wave of anger, made more intense by the champagne she had been drinking, swept away her self-control.

"You brute!" she exclaimed.

"Only your husband, remember," suggested the man coldly.

"That's as hard on me as it is on you!" she retorted.

"You are overexcited, my dear," remarked Drayton, still calmly. "The wine you took at dinner has affected you somewhat. By morning you will be more sane."

"Oh!" she gasped, striking her palms together, "when you talk like that I almost feel as if I could kill you!"

With a yawn the man turned over on his side, with his face from her, closed his eyes, and settled himself as though to go to sleep.

"Perhaps," he said colorlessly, "that would be about the kindest thing you could do and the simplest solution to this whole damnable business."

Then he switched off the light at the head of his bed, leaving the woman to find her way across the room and into her own chamber by the gleam of the hall chandelier.

It was a week later that Daniel Drayton, opening his front door with his latch-key on his return from business one night, was arrested by the sound of his wife's voice speaking at the telephone. The instrument was in the rear of the hall and not in sight from the front dor, but the words reached the master of the house in that moment in which he instinctively paused:

"Yes, Tom, he's going out at eight-thirty. Come any time after that."

The husband slammed the front door, and his wife, startled, hurried toward him, where he stood under the glaring ceiling light. A glance at his grimly determined countenance told her that her speech had been overheard.

"Dan," she tried to explain, "I was only telling—" but her voice failed her, trailing off feebly into silence, and she sank down, trembling, on the hall chair near her. "Well?" she whispered, looking up at her husband.

His voice was so unnatural that she started violently when he spoke, but her eyes did not leave his.

"Daisy," he said, "this is the end! I won't stand this life any longer! I said long ago in anger that it was hell; now I say it in sober truth. It's hell for you as well as for me. You do not love me; I sometimes think that you hate me. We are tired of each other. It's got to stop! You may go your way, and I'll go mine."

As he spoke he saw a gleam of hope dawn in the frightened eyes into which he looked. The pale lips trembled a moment as if their owner were about to cry, but she steadied them and spoke quickly, almost eagerly.

"Dan, listen to me. I've been faithful to you."

He smiled drearily. "As if that counted," he said, "in a case like ours! So far you've been what the world calls faithful—I don't say you haven't. But you'd always rather be with other men than with me; you make an appointment with a man on the only evening in weeks on which I happen to have a business engagement, and you telephone him that I'm to be away! How long do you think that kind of thing could go on and either of us keep a spark of respect?"

Still the look of hope in the woman's eyes. The husband saw it with a peculiar thrill and rushed on, his voice rising as his excitement increased.

"We made a mistake in marrying! I'm tired of it, so are you! I say I won't stand for it any longer. Yes, this is the end!"

"Now!" he exclaimed. "I swear I won't—"

"Daddy! Daddy!" came the high treble. "Aren't you comin' up?"

The man steadied his voice to answer, though his face was contorted with a spasm as of physical pain. "Yes, son," he called hoarsely. "In a minute!"

But the baby voice came again, "Daddy!"

There was a hurrying of feet in the upper hall as the nurse hastened to capture her small charge, who had for the moment escaped her vigilance. The nursery door closed behind the pair. The man dropped upon the lower stair, his face buried in his hands.

"The boy!" he groaned.

His wife sprang up and caught him by the arm excitedly. "You won't let him make any difference!" she exclaimed imploringly. "His life is all before him! Surely we have a right to ours!"

Her husband lifted his head and looked at her, and again she shrank from him, although her hand still clutched his arm. He rose and faced her.

"Listen!" he said sternly. "For the moment I forgot him—God forgive me! I forgot the child! Yours and mine, remember—the child that for our own pleasure we called from nowhere to suffer in this devilish world; the child for whom we are responsible to man and to God Almighty. Can't you see," he exclaimed fiercely, "that we have no right to punish him for our mistakes?'

But his wife shook her head as if dazed. The man made a hopeless gesture.

"We've got to stand it!" he declared savagely. "If there were only you and I we could do as we pleased. But we're tied, tied, do you hear?—and with a tie made of flesh and blood? He didn't ask to be born, did he? We've got to pretend to live decent lives until he needs us no longer. We can't get away! We can't!"

The woman uttered a weak wail. "And what about me? What about me?"

The man pulled himself roughly from her grasp on his arm, and she sank down again, trembling, upon the chair, still looking up at him.

"You're his mother, that's all I care!" he exclaimed. "And that's why we've got to play the game out till death delivers us!"

He turned and, without another glance at the crouching woman, went heavily up the stairs toward the room in which the child was waiting for him.

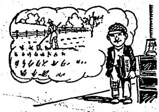
Newsie to Enjoy What He Calls "God's Freedom"

NEW YORK.—Lower Broadway is going to lose one of its newsies. Isidore Greenberg, who for 13 years has sold papers at the northeast corner of Broadway and Fulton street, is going to enter Cornell to study scientific agriculture! He told a reporter that he had been selling newspapers since he was five years old. He is eighteen.



"I kept my wits about me," was the way he put it. "I worked hard, I studied and observed men and events, and now I am going to be graduated from the street corner. It was a good 'prep.' school, even if it was a hard one."

"But why scientific agriculture?" he was asked. "Why not the law or medicine?"

"The woods are full of them," said Izzy, "and then you've got to remember that scientific agriculture is the coming thing.

"I've watched the faces of the thousands of men and women who passed me in the crowds and it struck me that a lot of them were playing a losing game. They were prisoners of the city, serving a life sentence.

"I knew that the day would come when I'd have to quit the game on the corner, and I kept wondering what I'd do. The outdoor life has made me hard as nails. I wanted to find something that would keep me out in God's fresh air—something that I liked and that would be a paying proposition."

Love Powders a Failure; Wizard Lands in Cell

CHICAGO.—Prof. Pesizo Lomez, the "love-powder man," landed in jail the other day. The police believe this announcement will have the effect of breaking a number of "love spells" which the "professor" conjured up for negro women on the South side at $1 per conjure.

LADY, HAS YO' ANY LOVE TROUBLES? IS YO' FEE-AN-SEE UNTRUE TO YO'? THIS LOVE CHARM WILL FIX IT ALL UP SCRUMPOUS

Professor Lomez is a negro who found it convenient for business reasons to adopt the Cuban flag as his national symbol. His real name is John Henry William Rogers—at least that is as much of it as the police have at present.

"Lady, has you any love troubles? Is yo' fee-an-see untrue to you? Is yo' husband's love gettin' like a col' potato? Does you want to bring back some gentlem'n fren' who loved and went away?"

This was the introduction used at South side back doors by Professor Lomez.

The charm seller then introduced the powder that would bring to pass the wishes of the purchaser.

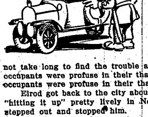
"Now concentrate on the object of yo' desiahs," he would say, tying a small gold-colored thread around the patron's left ankle. The dexterous collection of $1 completed the "conjuring."

Mrs. Anna Wilvey of 335 West Thirty-seventh street met the love powder man at Forty-second street and Wentworth avenue, where he was just coming out of a house. She called a policeman and had the "professor" arrested.

"That powder didn't work on me; I want my dollar back," said Mrs. Wilvey.

"Bread Cast on Waters" Returned With Interest

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Milton Elrod, an Indianapolis business man, has become convinced that bread cast on the waters will return after many days. In his case, however, it came back in a few hours.



With a party of friends he was driving in an automobile in the vicinity of Martinsville. Two miles north of that place they found a dead machine along the road with three perspiring men standing beside it.

"Say, partner," said one of the men, "know anything about an auto? We can't get this blamed thing to move."

Elrod remarked that he did not know a great deal about a machine, but he would fix it if he could. It did not take long to find the trouble and he soon had the engine going. Tho occupants were profuse in their thanks and offered to pay him for his trouoccupants were profuse in their than ks.

Elrod got back to the city about nine o'clock the same evening and was "hitting it up" pretty lively in North Meridian street when a policeman stepped out and stopped him.

"Little too fast there, partner. Better drive down to the station hous with me," said the policeman.

He then stepped up to the side of the car and got his first view of Elrod. A moment later he surprised that young man by ordering him to drive on.

"Beat it and beat it quick," he said.

Society Woman's Black and White "Child" Lost

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—A symphony in black and white, in which figured a black and white automobile, a black and white gowned society matron of Nob Hill and a black and white "child" almost turned out a tragedy the other day at the ocean beach. First the society woman left her automobile and raced up and down and in and out of the park near by. Finally she saw a policeman, and in accents wild implored him to "find her child."

FIND MY CHILD

"Just the sweetest little thing, so high," she moaned. "He's all in white, with a pink face. He crawled out of my car and ran into the bushes. Assistance, Mr. Policeman, dear Mr. Policeman, assistance."

Immediately the doughty officer thought of kidnapers. So, before he advanced into the bushes, he drew his trusty revolver and held it ready. The matron followed, remarking that the "child" might be in a sand pile, as he dearly loved to play in dirt.

At the end of half an hour's search the policeman saw a movement in the bushes. He crept up cautiously and drew the branches aside.

There, scratching and pawing in the ground, was a little white Spitz dog.

"My child, my own dearly beloved Ruthie!" cried the woman, as she leaped for the animal. "I thought I had lost you, you naughty, naughty girl. Oh, Mr. Policeman, please pardon me, but if you had known it was a dog you wouldn't have looked for it."

The black and white auto flashed up the road. Then, and not until then, the policeman said——.

ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE CALLAGHAN

Admiral Callaghan has been commander-in-chief of the British home fleets since 1911. To be admiral of the home fleets—which in reality means the control of several fleets—is to be at the head of the naval profession in England.

An Irishman, Admiral Callaghan nevertheless contrives to keep his shillalah up his sleeve. He is not on the admiralty's black-list of the contentious. When his term with the home fleet ends in December, he will not follow Lord Charles Beresford into the commons to try to win the doubtful honors of debate with men who know the Westminster range and are able to make better practice than the most heroic amateur. He belongs to no clique, and talks nothing but Hindustani to the interviewers who go to him for salty comments on naval administration. And in belonging to no clique he is in the latest naval fashion. Cliques are now broken up, discredited, and finally wiped out. His Hindustani he learned in the early years of his career, and the no less complicated science of fortifications he mastered while he was still a boy. Since then he has mastered every branch of his trade, from gunnery to sea-planes. In China in 1900 he was one of the most prominent figures in the march of the allies to Peking, and himself commanded the British naval brigade.

FORCED TO MARRY THE CZAR

If it should happen during the war in Europe that the czarina of Russia, friend of the Russian peasant, should be taken prisoner, her sensations probably would vary but little from those of the present. She has not been a prisoner of war, but she has been in prison all her married life.

Yet when she was little they called her "Princess Sonnenschien" in the quiet German town of Hesse-Darmstadt, and her merriment and her laughter made her the best loved princess in the empire.

"She will never marry, the dear little one," they said about her sometimes, and the wiseacres shook their heads. Just what was the nervous trouble that visited the princess from time to time none but the great specialists who had treated her knew. But often for weeks the Princess Sonnenschein—officially known as Princess Alix of Hesse-Darmstadt—was missing from the quiet life of the court and town. But they made her marry the czar. Little and loving and clever and religious, the old czar chose her from all the princesses of Europe for the bride of his wild boy Nicholas, and although the young people were indifferent, the match was urged. One day Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany visited Hesse-Darmstadt.

"Alix, little cousin," said he, "for the sake of Germany you must marry Nicholas."

"And change my faith?" said the Lutheran princess in wonder.

"Many things are asked from us in the cause of the country," said the kaiser oracularly. "You must even change your faith."

"I will do my duty for Germany," said this German princess, "but within my soul I shall die, cousin, have a mind to that."

FRANCE'S COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

General Joffre, the commander-in-chief of the French army, is a distinguished military engineer, famous for his roads and bridges, but with only one year's service in the field, when he was at the head of the Second army corps at Lille. He is sixty-two years old, and left the Polytechnic school as a cadet to serve in the Franco-Prussian war, sharing in the defense of Paris. In 1892 he went to Africa to build the French military roads from the Senegal to the Niger. In 1897 he was in Madagascar to organize the naval station at Diego-Suarez. Since 1901 he has served in France, in the engineering department of the ministry of war, as governor of Lille, as division commander of Paris, and finally as commander of the Second army corps at Amiens. He has undoubted genius in organization, but has been compared, not too happily, to General McClellan.

France needs at the moment not a McClellan but a Grant or a Stonewall Jackson. But since she is afraid that such a one might turn out to be finally a Bonaparte or a Boulanger, her enemies may reap the advantage of her fears.

TINIEST ADMIRAL A SEA-FIGHTER

Vice-Admiral Sir John Rushworth Jellicoe, K. C. B., who is in command of Great Britain's North sea fleet as full Admiral, is just the man to repel a German invasion of the British Isles, for he was the commander last year of the British fleet which represented a hostile German fleet in the navy maneuvers. He ought to know the weakness or strength of the English coasts, for his fleet outmaneuvered the squadrons representing the naval might of England and landed his troops on the Lincolnshire coast at Grimsby.

Although the smallest man, excepting midshipmen, in the British navy, and the tiniest Admiral in the world, he is a great martinet, and to him the British navy owes a complete reorganization and great improvement in her gunnery practice. For all his size, Sir John was a famous football player and a marvelous bantamweight boxer in his day.

He married a daughter of Sir Charles Cayzer, the great shipowner, and has three daughters. He lives in London when not on duty and is a lord commissioner and comptroller of the navy.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Glimpse Into Uncle Sam's Big Printing Office

WASHINGTON.—Approximately 4,000 men working in shifts through the 24 hours of the day and night, tons of paper going in and coming out, the ceaseless whir of presses, the rumble of machinery, the clacking of linotype machines—these are the things that strike the visitor when he enters the government's immense publishing house.

GOV'T PRINTING OFFICE

The infinite detail of the government printing office—for that is the official title of the publishing establishment—comes afterward. It is only after the confusion of first impressions has cleared away that the complexity of the public printer's problems are apparent. Perfect system, a knowledge of arrangement so that the minimum of time may be lost in transportation, and individual efficiency are some of the requirements.

What publishing house, putting out hundreds of new editions in all sorts of elaborate bindings, and running a newspaper on the side, would not feel that it was straining itself? That is what the government's printery is doing. An insight into the immensity of the work is gleaned from the figures of the post office showing that approximately 95 per cent of the total weight of mail disposed of in Washington is mailed under a government frank.

Perhaps the rush work of the printery is the most spectacular. Congress must have its Congressional Record every morning as regularly as the suburbanite must have his newspaper, and there must be no errors in the Record. When an error crops out in the Record a member of congress promptly arises next day and has it changed. So, as far as is possible, the government printing office must prevent them. While the mills of congress grind, the government printing office is going ahead with a speed worthy of an eleven-edition mail disposed of in Washington is mailed under a government frank, and this immense amount of printed matter represents, of course, only a part of the public printery's output.

Capital Social Strategists Have Many Difficulties

THE handling of the diplomatic corps in a diplomatic way at society affairs is no small matter at any time, but when any unpleasantness breaks out between two countries the difficulties of the social strategists in Washington increases ten-fold. It will take but a brief calculation to understand what would happen in Washington if the social season of the capital were in full swing now with the European situation in its present status. If peace is not declared within a few weeks there will be some curious situations developed in the Washington society world this winter. Hostesses will be put to it in the matter of inviting guests and the White House also will have some problems to solve.

It is true that handling of representatives from warring countries at society affairs will not be a novel experience to Washingtonians. It is not so long ago that the ambassadors from Italy and Turkey were not on intimate terms. Some time before that the representatives of China and Japan could not be placed side by side at a dinner. Prior to that it was the Russo-Japanese war that gave the society folk of Washington more or less trouble.

Hard as it is to manage society affairs here when two countries are drawing swords against each other, it will be as nothing compared with what must be done if practically all Europe continues to fight. It has been facetiously suggested that John Barrett, director general of the Pan-American Union, should be appointed to manage society affairs here this winter because of his success in promoting harmony among the representatives in Washington of the South and Central American countries for some years past.

Fish Leaps Into Boat of White House Sleuths

"DICK" JERVIS and "Tommy" Callahan, secret service men stationed at the White House, and good-looking fellows, have won reputations for catching counterfeiters, and land fraud crooks, but it was not until recently that they gained any reputation as fishermen.

The reputation, however, is based solely upon what they are telling themselves, Jervis, usually a reserved and modest individual, doing the telling and Callahan adding, "That's so." There are fish stories and then some more fish stories, but these bodyguards of the president have one which does terrible violence to the wildest imagination, their yarn being to the effect that a three-pound bass they displayed about the White House actually jumped into the boat.

"I guess maybe he didn't want to get his jaws pricked," opined Jervis. "Anyway, without the slightest warning, this bass splashed out of the river and almost into Tommy's lap. I think we must have caught his wife, as we had three pretty big fish when the sensational leap was made."

"Jimmy" Sloan, chief of the secret service squad at the White House, vouches for the veracity of his two associates.

What the Waiter Said to Senator Cummins

SENATOR ALBERT B. CUMMINS of Iowa rejoices in initials similar to those by which the diplomatic mediation commission was designated, for the first letters of his three names are A, B, C. His family originally came from Pennsylvania, but they emigrated to Iowa some years ago.

If Cummins has a fad it is books, and first-edition books, at that. His library is magnificent, and particularly rich in historical works. His pride is his ancient tomes, though he is equally proud of the fine farms of which his state boasts.

There is a story told on Senator Cummins to the effect that last summer he and his wife went to a fashionable roof garden in Washington. After a day at the capitol, the cool breezes and music seemed delightful; so the senator bethought himself of something to eat. Taking up the card, he tried to read it without his glasses, which he had left on his desk, but was unsuccessful.

He appealed to Mrs. Cummins, but that lady had also forgotten hers. So he handed the card to a smiling colored waiter who stood at the back of his chair.

"Waiter," he said, "please read this for me."

The man took the card, looked at it in a puzzled way, then gave it back.

"I's sorry, boss, that I can't help you out," he said, with a shake of the head, "but you see I ain't got much education either."

TURKS READY TO FIGHT; RUSSIANS ADVANCING; FORCES OF KAISER BATTER LINES OF ALLIES BACK

PARIS FORTIFYING; BORDEAUX IS SEAT OF GOVERNMENT

PRESIDENT OF FRANCE, STATE OFFICIALS AND EMBASSIES OF ALLIES GO TO NEW CAPITAL.

CRISIS OF WORLD'S GREAT BATTLE HAS BEEN REACHED

Kaiser's Men Have Thrown the Full Force of Their Army Against Allies in Northern France and Result Will Determine What Fate of Paris Will Be.

Paris, Sept. 5.—The Germans are nearing the outer fortifications of Paris, They are reported fighting furiously near Noyon, on the Oise river, in a final effort to reach the line of forts and begin their seige.

Control Northern France.

The Germans now control all of northern France from Dieppe on the English channel to Montmeny on the Belgian border. Amiens has been captured by the Germans. The French have abandoned the city of Boulogne on the channel.

The German advance guards are now reported within 32 miles of Paris.

Two Gates Open.

But one city gate on the north and one on the south remain open into Paris and they are heavily guarded. Prefect of Police Hennien has resigned on account of poor health. A German aeroplane that flew over Paris and dropped five bombs was brought down by French gun fire and its pilot captured. American Ambassador Herrick and First Secretary Bliss will remain throughout the siege.

Exodus From City Continues.

The exodus of the French people southward continues, the road between Paris and Bordeaux seeing a continual procession of refugees. Jubilation in Petrograd (St. Petersburg) over Russian successes in eastern Prussia is high and on every hand are heard predictions that the czar's armies will be both in Berlin and Vienna within 30 days.

Meanwhile the work of strengthening the fortifications around Paris goes on day and night, the French being spurred to the utmost action by continued reports of German successes in the northeast. Three million Frenchmen are under arms to defend Paris.

Fail to Check Invaders.

The French and British soldiers, falling back step by step, have inflicted enormous losses upon the Germans, but so far have failed to give a decisive check to the steady advance of the invaders. This was the situation yesterday as revealed in brief dispatches to the war office. The military zone in the suburbs and in the neighborhood of the capital was evacuated.

Martial Law Prevails.

French troops were brought in and distributed at the various forts. Martial law prevails. M. Laurent has been named to succeed Prefect of Police Hennion.

It is becoming evident now that the Germans will reach the Paris forts and a siege will ensue. The great 30-ton German Krupp guns which were used to batter down the Namur forts are on their way, being hauled by motor trucks.

A few hours, it is believed, will decide the issue of the battle north of Paris.

This fact stands out clearly, that the Germans are concentrating all their strength upon this advance on Paris. West Belgium apparently has been abandoned in order that they may pour all their forces toward Paris.

Fierce Battle Raging in Austria.

Petrograd, Sept. 5.—The Austrian troops that fled after the defeat near Lemberg have been joined by a new army of that city and a fierce battle is raging over a front of 50 miles. Nearly 1,500,000 troops are reported engaged, but the Russians have the larger force.

The surrender of Lemberg, capital of Austrian Galicia, is announced by Minister of War Sukromlinoff.

Austrians Lost 100,000.

Rome, Sept. 5.—The Russian embassy has been notified that the Austrians were overwhelmingly defeated near Lemberg, losing more than 100,000 men and 57 cannon.

Turks Have Mobilized.

Washington, Sept. 5.—Turkey has mobilized her forces in preparation for the declaration of war against the allies, and in support of Germany and Austria-Hungary.

This was officially announced here by Arnstem Bey, the Turkish ambassador to the United States, who discussed the situation with Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador. It was also learned that the declaration would be directed against Russia.

Refuses U. S. Request.

Turkey has declined to grant the request of the United States for permission to send the cruiser North Carolina through the Dardanelles to Constantinople to deliver $150,000 in gold deposited here for the relief of the Americans in the Ottoman empire.

The grand Vizier has informed the American government that the waters of the Dardanelles have been mined and that it would be unsafe for a vessel as large as the North Carolina to go through the straits. He also declared it might establish a precedent for the passage of other foreign warships and suggested that the American naval yacht Scorpian, on duty constantly in Turkish waters along with other light vessels that serve foreign missions, be sent to sea to meet the North Carolina.

U. S. Ambassador Remains.

Paris, Sept. 4.—The president and members of the government and all embassies of the allied nations have gone to Bordeaux, where they will remain during hostilities.

U. S. Ambassador Herrick, who has taken charge of the archives and embassies of all the belligerent powers, will remain in Paris with First Secretary Bliss and the second secretary.

Orders have been issued for the removal of the wounded from Paris to Rennes and Nantes.

The United States is now represented in Bordeaux by John W. Garratt, U. S. ambassador to Argentine, who went with the government, accompanied by Third Secretary Sulzeton.

Proclamation Explains Removal.

The removal of the seat of the French government to Bordeaux followed almost immediately upon the issuance of the proclamation by the minister of the interior who explained the reasons for the transfer. The proclamation said that the military authorities were responsible for the removal, having decided that the fortifications of Paris while not positively certain to be attacked, undoubtedly would be the pivotal point of the field operations of the opposing armies.

Two Important Developments.

Washington, Sept. 3.—Official advices received through diplomatic channels reported two of the most important developments of the present war.

Great Britain asked the United States to be prepared to care for British diplomatic interests in Turkey, indicating that the allies had practically lost hope of persuading the Ottoman empire to remain neutral. Dispatches received at the British embassy referred to the incorporation into the Turkish army of several German officers, which was regarded as the forerunner of intervention by the porte in behalf of Germany.

Turkey's entry into the conflict means the immediate alignment of Italy, as well as Greece, on the side of Great Britain, France, Russia, Servia, Montenegro and Roumania, diplomats here believe. Just what the attitude of Bulgaria will be is a matter of uncertainty.

Big German Victory.

The official statement of a big German victory against the Russians at Allenstein attracted wide attention. Military observers pointed out that if the number of Russians taken prisoners had been correctly estimated at 70,000 there must have been great casualties.

The text of the German dispatch begins:

"Official report of the victory at Allenstein shows that it was even greater than known before. Three Russian army corps were annihilated. Seventy thousand prisoners were taken, including two commanding generals, 300 officers and the complete artillery of the Russian army."

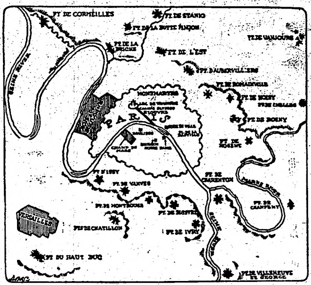
Fight in Air.

Paris, Sept. 4.—A fight in the air over Paris took place Wednesday evening. Three German aeroplanes hovered over the capital and immediately two French machines were sent up to engage them.

Meanwhile rifles and machine guns mounted on public buildings kept up a constant fire. By this means one of the German machines became separated from the others and the French aviators flew swiftly in its direction.

The Germans opened fire to which the Frenchmen replied vigorously. The engagement seemed to turn to the disadvantage of the German, who mounted speedily to a higher level and holding this position, was saved from further attack.

FORTIFICATIONS OF PARIS AND VICINITY



WAR SEEN IN BRIEF.

Turkey has mobilized her forces, in preparation for issuing a declaration of war. This will be directed against Russia, acording to the porte's ambassador at Washington. Turkey has been engaged in this mobilization for a month, it was learned from the ambassador and other Turkish authorities at Washington. In the meantime Turkey has refused to the United States the right to bring the American transport North Carolina into Constantinople, claiming that the waters of the Dardanelles have been mined and the ship's approach would be dangerous. The North Carolina carries a large amount of gold for the relief of Americans who are now stranded in Europe.

RUSSIANS SEEM TO BE WINNING OUT IN AUSTRIA

GALICIA HAS BEEN SUCCESSFULLY INVADED AND LEMBERG INVESTED—ADMIT GERMAN VICTORY.

MUSCOVITES READY TO BEGIN MARCH ON BERLIN

London, Sept. 3.—On the eastern war stage, Russia frankly confesses to disaster to two army corps with the loss of three generals. A dispatch from Berlin announces that German and Austrian troops have occupied Lodz, the largest manufacturing center in Russian Poland.

Russians Triumph.

Elsewhere the Russian army seem to have triumphed. Galicia has been successfully invaded and Lemberg has been evacuated, according to reports from the Petrograd (St. Petersburg) war office and from Vienna.

If this is true, the Austrian menace to Russian Poland will be ended and the Russian forces can begin to converge for the march on Berlin, the Russian objective in north Galicia, apparently being Koenigshutte, whence they can march on Berlin by way of Breslau.

Take 4,000 Austrians.

From Petrograd comes word that the general staff announces that the Austrian fifteenth division was completely routed near Lustchoff on Aug. 28, and that 100 officers and 4,000 soldiers were taken prisoners.

Will March On Berlin.

"The operations in eastern Prussia, while subordinated to the general campaign to crush the Austrian resistance, will be continued in force. The fortress of Konigsberg is now completely invested and a part of the city is held by the Russians. The Germans have been very heavily reinforced from the western armies and are now in great strength all along the lines of their first fortifications. Despite this fact, however, the march on Berlin will be begun just as soon as the Austrian army is annihilated."

Official Petrograd Report.

"After a battle lasting seven days the Russian army seized heavily fortified positions around Lemberg (capital of Galicia in Austria-Hungary), about 10 or 12 miles from the town. The Russian troops then advanced toward the principal forts.

"After a battle which was fiercely contested, the Austrians were obliged to retreat in disorder, abandoning heavy and light guns, parks of artillery and field kitchens.

Enemy Is Pursued.

"Our advance guard and cavalry pursued the enemy who suffered enormous losses in killed, wounded and prisoners.

TURKS MAY HAVE DECLARED

New York, Sept. 3.—Dow, Jones & Co. published the following on its news ticker:

"London.—Unconfirmed reports are current here that Turkey has declared war on Russia. Communication with Constantinople has been cut off and the Turkish ambassador stated he had no way of telling when he would hear from his government again."

Washington.—The Turkish ambassador, Rustem Bey, here, said he was unable to confirm the report that his country had declared war on Russia.

The ambassador declared that Turkey alone had half a million men mobilized, "preparing for any eventuality."

St. Petersburg Now Petrograd.

Petrograd (St. Petersburg), Sept. 2.—Czar Nicholas by an imperial edict, has renamed the Russian capital city, and St. Petersburg, capital of the Russian empire since 1712, will henceforth be known as Petrograd. This change eliminates the Teuton construction in the name by which the chief city of Russia has been known since it was founded by Peter the Great in 1707.

15,000 Japs Near Tsing-Tau.

Peking, China, Sept. 3.—Japan has landed between 10,000 and 15,000 troops from eighteen transports at Lung-Kow, a newly opened port about 100 miles of Tsing-Tau.

14 German Officers Taken.

Paris, Sept. 3, via London.—The Petit Parisien says that 14 German staff officers have been captured and sent to Nimes, in the department of Gard.

NEW POPE CHOSEN; BENEDICT XV. IS NAME HE TAKES

MUCH LIKE RAMPOLLA IT IS DECLARED BY FRIENDS

Born at Peglik in 1854—He Was Created Archbishop of Bologna and Created Cardinal Only Few Months Ago—Ancient Forms Observed.

Rome, Sept. 4.—Cardinal Giacomo della Chiesa, archbishop of Bologna, and former assistant papal secretary of state, has been elected pope, succeeding the late pontiff, Pius X. The election was on the ninth ballot. With all of the ceremony prescribed by the century-old traditions of the Catholic church, the new occupant of the Vatican received the first adoration of the cardinals who had balloted four days in the election.

Selects Name.

The new pontiff chose to be known as Benedict XV and will later designate the date for his coronation.

With the conclave called while all Europe is involved in the devastating war, which was largely responsible for the death of Pope Pius from a broken heart, the election of Benedict XV will go down in history as taking place at one of the most critical times in history. Several foreign cardinals have not yet arrived in Rome. Cardinals Gibbons and O'Connell, of the United States, arrived in Rome just an hour after Pope Benedictus had been elected. In the conclave were fifty-seven members of the sacred college, a majority of them Italians.

Following the Election.

When the scrutiny of votes showed the election of Cardinal della Chiesa, the secretary of the conclave, masters of ceremonies and the sacristican of the Vatican were at once admitted to the Sistine chapel. In accordance with the old traditions, the cardinal deacon, accompanied by the heads of other orders of the cardinals, presented themselves and asked whether the election was accepted. With the reply in the affirmative, the canopies over the thrones of all other cardinals dropped to the floor, that of the newly elected pontiff alone remaining in place. With the admission of Cardinal della Chiesa's priest, the new pontiff was then garbed in the white robe which was in readiness in a cabinet adjoining the chapel.

Receives Adoration of Cardinals.

Attired in his robes as head of the church, Pope Benedict then ascended the temporary papal throne, where he received the first adoration of the cardinals and gave his first benediction. The cardinals first knelt, then kissed the foot of the new pope, then the hand and at last were embraced by him.

These ceremonies concluded, the ring of St. Peter, which had been in charge of the cardinal camerlengo, was presented to Pope Benedict. Precedent prescribes that the cardinals shall then retire to their cells until public announcement of the election is made.

New Pope Born in 1854.

Giacomo della Chiesa (pronounced Kee-ay-sa) was created a cardinal on May 25, 1914. He was born at Peglik, in the diocese of Genes, Nov. 21, 1854, and was ordained a priest Dec. 21, 1878. He served as secretary of nunciature in Spain from 1883 to 1887, in which year he was appointed secretary to the late Cardinal Rampolla.

Is Archbishop of Bologna.

Cardinal delle Chiesa was created a cardinal May 25, 1914. He is the archbishop of Bologna, Italy.

Much Like Cardinal Rampolla.

The new pope is regarded here as being a man very similar to Cardinal Rampolla. He is described as a man of great spiritual character and one of the most highly esteemed in the hierarchy. He is about average height, of stocky build and of rather quiet and reserved manners.

Serbs Win Decisive Fight.

Nish, Servia, via London, Sept. 4.—An official statement gives new and fuller details of the battle of Jedar. The Austrian force, it says, was composed of 200,000 men and held a favorable position and by its retreat admitted defeat. The Austrians left on the field of battle 10,000 dead and more than 2,000 wounded, according to the report. "Altogether," continues the statement, "40,000 of the enemy were placed hors de combat. We have sent to the interior more than 4,000 prisoners.

G. A. R. Being Well Entertained.

Detroit, Mich., Sept. 3.—With the national salute of 21 gun booming from the revenue cutter Morrill, a fleet of six excursion steamers, carrying hundreds of civil war veterans, headed out in the Detroit river for a cruise around Belle Isle, then down the river to Fighting Island and back again to the city. The river trip was considered the principal event on Tuesday's program of the forty-eighth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic. The veterans are being shown every courtesy.

WAR RISK INSURANCE BUREAU

NEW DEPARTMENT IS NOW OPEN FOR BUSINESS.

Washington, Sept. 4.—Uncle Sam's marine war risk insurance bureau, designed to inspire confidence in American shippers and aid American trade expansion, is open for business at the treasury department. Secretary McAdoo announced the appointment of W. C. Delancy of New York, an underwriting insurance expert, as director of the bureau immediately following the signing of the bill.

Mr. Delancy has opened an office and is ready to insure American ships and American cargoes in American ships.

His bureau is under Assistant Secretary Peters.

Administration plans as to the merchant marine also have taken definite form in other directions. At a conference between the president, Secretary Daniels and members of the naval affairs and merchant marine committees of the house, differences between the two committees were smoothed out, and it was decided to press one measure for the obtaining of a government-owned fleet of ships.

Chairman Alexander of the merchant marine committee reported favorably to the house the bill providing for the organization of a $10,000,000 company controlled by the government which will buy or sell freight carrying vessels. A $30,000,000 issue of Panama canal bonds would be used to buy the ships, the government accepting bonds of the company as reimbursement.

It was decided at the conference to amend this bill to allow the ships built or purchased by the company to be utilized by the navy if necessary. The amendment is a compromise accepted by the naval committee members for their proposal that a fleet of naval auxiliary vessels be purchased to meet the emergencies of trade, the ships being used as cargo carriers as long as desirable. President Wilson made it clear at the conference that he believed no violation of neutrality was to be feared in the purchase even of some of the German steamers now marooned in American ports. He agreed entirely with the position taken by Secretary McAdoo Tuesday before the merchant marine committee, in urging a favorable report on the Alexander bill.

CAPTAIN SAVES 300 LIVES

Chicago, Sept. 2.—The lives of three hundred passengers of the excursion boat, City of Chicago, which caught fire about twelve miles out from this harbor in Lake Michigan, Tuesday, were saved by the resourcefulness of Captain Oscar Bjork.

His wireless failing to work, Captain Bjork ordered the engines set full speed ahead and forty-five minutes later the big boat, with a carrying capacity of 2,600 passengers, sunk her bow into the government pier and was wedged fast.

To avoid panic, the passengers, nearly all of whom were asleep in their cabins, were not notified to come on deck until the pier was visible.

"Women and children first," ordered Captain Bjork, and the men passengers as well as the crew stood back. Most of them were thrown from their feet by the impact when the boat struck the pier.

OFFERS AID TO CANADIANS

Southerner Writes That He Would Recruit a Regiment in U. S. for Service Abroad.

Ottawa, Ont., Sept. 4.—Dominion militia officials are being overwhelmed by men eager to go to the front. The first call was for 25,000 volunteers from which it was proposed to pick 21,000 to cross the Atlantic. There are now 35,000 men in camp at Valcartier and more coming.

Samuel Hughes, the minister of militia, said:

"I have just received another offer of a regiment 1,000 strong from the United States. This offer comes from a leading man in a southern state, who writes that if allowed to do so, he will bring up 1,000 men who are descendants of the best families of English, Irish and Scottish stock in the south."

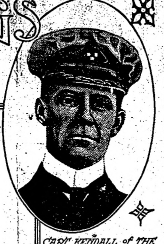
Brady Renominated in Idaho.

Boise, Idaho, Sept. 3.—Scattering returns from all parts of the state indicate the renomination of United States Senator J. H. Brady and Governor John M. Haines, Republican and the nomination of James H. Hawley, for United States senator and Moses Alexander, Democrat, for governor. Congressman Addison T. Smith, Republican, has been renominated.

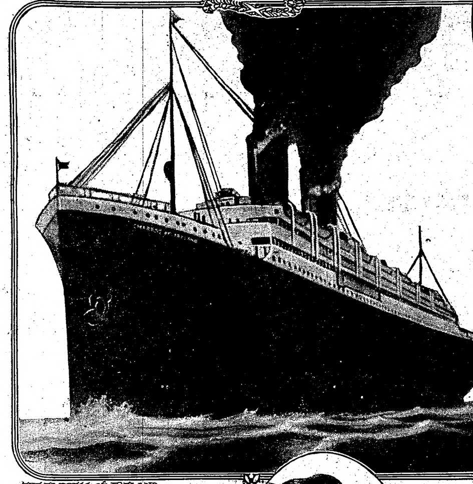
Marshall Says Wilson Will Run.

Washington, Sept. 3.—Vice President Marshall authorized a published statement here that President Wilson would be a candidate for re-election. Secretary Tumulty said the White House knew nothing of the statement and would not comment upon it. The vice president's statement was made in the course of an authorized interview on the political situation, which concluded thus: "The democratic party will have but one candidate for president in 1916, and his name happens to be Woodrow Wilson."

WHAT EVIL STAR HANGS OVER FATHER POINT?



CAPT. KENDALL of THE EMPRESS of IRELAND



THE EMPRESS of IRELAND

THERE is a legend told in the great woods along the Rimouski river of southeastern Canada that when a certain star hangs over Father Point all good men should keep to their homes, for on that night danger lurks on the St. Lawrence river off the point and the hunter and woodsmen of the interior are in danger of their lives.

Father Point is near the mouth of the Rimouski river and is on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. The people of that place are used to caring for the poor and distressed. They have seen so much disaster and heartbreak they have long ceased to regard such occurrences for long.

The history of Father Point dates back before the coming of the white man. The language of the Indians gives legends of the evil star.

One winter while the Indians of the Rimouski region were planning a trapping expedition to the Champlain river, the star rose above the point and by that sign forbade the Indians to embark. There were old men in the village who had heard of the legend and who told the young men to remain at home until the star had passed on. The young men laughed at the counsel of the old men and tried to depart. Then the old men went to the water and destroyed the canoes of the young men. They threw them on the fires and sat by in silence, while the young men railed at the older heads for the superstition.

But the Great Manitou took revenge for the rebellion of the young men. The legends tell how the Great Manitou sent the deepest snow that had ever fallen. The trails were buried and none were able to leave their wigwams. Famine came because they could not go on the hunt as formerly. The young men died and there were few left to tell the tale.

Then came the French. One night when the wind howled around Father Point and sighed in the branches of the trees of the Rimouski river, the star reached the zenith above the fatal spot.

"Don't go out tonight," chanted the Indian medicine men. "There is death in the land. Don't go out tonight."

But the French left their homes in spite of the warnings. All the young men of the river country marched away, because had not the great General Montcalm commanded? They were going to the defense of Quebec. Their boats took to the river that night and they mocked the star as it twinkled from above the crags. As their boats moved up the St. Lawrence toward Quebec the boats of Wolfe hove in sight. As the sailors of Wolfe's command passed Father Point the watch on the boat saw the star, so the records say. He pointed upward, for the star was in the zenith and it was of great brilliancy.

The men went on up the stream. The French landed and were welcomed to Quebec. The English followed them. They, too, landed, but it was many weary months after. Before that time the French soldiers had laughed many times about the warnings of the old Indian medicine chiefs. Before that time the English had forgotten the star which hung over Wolfe's vessel, but the watchman of that night did not forget and the Indian medicine men did not forget.

Then one night Wolfe, with his men, crept up the heights of Abraham above Quebec and when day broke he commanded the view of the city.

The French rushed to the defense of the city. On the plains of Abraham they fought most valiantly, but they seemed unable to stand before the onslaughts of the English. Every man from the banks of the Rimouski died in that terrible conflict. Montcalm, who had ordered them to the defense of Quebec, also was killed in battle and as he was about to die he reverently thanked God he was spared the sorrow of surrendering the fortress to the English.

The English won the victory, but the annals of that fight show that every officer and man who rode on the boat that night the star shone and even General Wolfe himself fell bleeding that morning. The watchman alone survived the fight, but he was so crippled he never took up arms again.

Cities have sprung up along the banks of the St. Lawrence. Father Point has grown from a point of rock to a town with a wireless telegraph station and with life-saving equipment. The people of that place do not believe in superstitions. They are a new race. The conquering English have succeeded the French and have occupied its business streets. But back in the hills and woods and along the waters of the Rimouski the fishermen who make their living from the Lake des Baies, still tell the stories of the disasters that have befallen travelers on the St. Lawrence or those who roam the woods when the star of ill-omen stands above Father Point.

Recently there was a great ship disaster in the St. Lawrence. The Empress of Ireland with Captain Kendall in command sank in a few minutes after she had been rammed by a collier in the St. Lawrence.

Because of the quickness of the time in which the Empress of Ireland sank many of the passengers were caught in their berths and drowned like rats in a trap. Then the ship listed to one side so that the lifeboats could not be put off on the other side of the vessel where the hull loomed up. The disaster came so quickly the rule of women and children first was hardly obeyed. It was a case of every passenger for himself. In the darkness, with the stillness of the sea all about them, the victims went down to death.

As soon as the liner was struck she sent out wireless messages for help. But when the rescuers arrived they found the ship already had gone down. The lifeboats which had been gotten off were drifting about. Men, women and children were clinging to the wreckage. The fog cleared away and from the lighthouses along the coast lifeboats were sent out to pick up the drowning passengers.

The crests of the waves were filled with wreckage from both ships.

When the first wireless call for help was flashed out in the fog and darkness officers in charge of the company which owns the vessel began to wire back for further directions. For many minutes the calls were sent out. The minutes lengthened into hours. The hours brought back no response. The officers had to admit, with reluctance, that the great vessel had gone out of sight and would not be seen again. Marine agencies sending out queries all along the coast received the same reply of silence which told as eloquently as the roar of cannon that the ship had gone down and could speak no more.

Then came a court of inquiry. Investigation committees tried to learn whether the crew of the Empress of Ireland or the crew of the Storstad was to blame for the disaster. They learned little, but up in the woods of the Rimouski, back as far as Lake Mistigougche, and even in the wilds of New Brunswick they tell how just before the Empress of Ireland sank, a warning star rose above Father Point. The watch heeded not the warning of the star. The ship was piloted without fear. Then the wrath of Manitou was let loose and fogs settled over the St. Lawrence. Two steamers moving swiftly through the fog were crossing trails. In the light they could have seen each other and turned aside. They saw not, for the veil of fog enveloped them. Then the two vessels crashed against each other and the star triumphed again. The new citizens of Father Point laughed at the tale when they heard it.

"'Tis an old superstition," they said. "We cannot be frightened that way. The law of nature is not suspended because some Indian or his descendants think they see a star glittering about our village."

But the simple-minded living in the back country point to the fate of Doctor Crippen and Belle Elmore as further proof of their contention. Didn't the star blaze above Father Point when they sailed down the river on their way to Europe? Didn't the simple-minded shudder and conceal themselves and fail to start on any venture until after the spell of the star was gone?

Didn't Belle Elmore continue on her way with the doctor and didn't she meet death in a mysterious manner in London? The papers then were full of the details of the strange murder. Belle Elmore's body was found in London in the basement of a house which she and her husband, Doctor Crippen, had occupied. Investigations pointed to Doctor Crippen as the slayer. They tried to show that he had an unrighteous attachment for Ethel LeNeve. Spies watched him daily in hopes he would commit some act which would throw suspicion his way. He expressed surprise that the woman should be missing. He expressed surprise that she should have been horribly slain. He kept about, but the simple-minded folk say the spell of the evil star was upon him. The star had allowed Belle Elmore to die in London. It had allowed Wolfe and the French soldiers to die at Quebec, but it wanted Doctor Crippen to meet his fate at the port of Father Point.

When night fell Doctor Crippen could not withstand the spell. He and Ethel LeNeve fled the country. Disguising himself as a Canadian returning home and dressing the LeNeve girl as his son he fled London and crossed the Atlantic, playing right into the hands of fate, the Canadian simple men say.

As the vessel neared the Canadian river, Captain Kendall, who later was to figure as captain of the ill-starred Empress of Ireland, saw the couple. The man looked the part of the respectable Canadian father. The boy, however, looked the part of a girl. Her face was boyish enough, but she had a gait like a girl.

"She is a girl," Captain Kendall said. He watched her closely. Her locks were shorn, but she did not have the boyish features. She had not the adventurous curiosity of a boy. She was always hiding on board the vessel by herself. She did not like the company of others. She was too shy. Then Captain Kendall took a newspaper with photographs of Doctor Crippen. He examined the photograph carefully and compared it detail after detail with the man he had for a passenger. Yes, he was sure the man was Crippen. The wireless telegraph was set to work. The Dominion police were notified and they boarded the vessel before it even landed. They arrested Doctor Crippen and the short-haired Ethel LeNeve. The girl went free. She never had gone against the decrees of the star, but Doctor Crippen was sent back to London, where he paid the penalty according to the rigid English law of those who slay their wives.

HIS PRAYER ANSWERED.

"Ah!" he sighed, "if you only gave me the least hope I—"

"Gracious!" interrupted the hard-hearted belle. "I've been giving you the least I ever gave to any man."

HUMAN UNDERSTANDING.

"I understand that you have written a book?"

"Yes," replied Professor Hibrow. "But that does not imply that I have written a book that you understand."

AN INFLUENCE TOWARD SECLUSION.

"Are you going to keep a diary?"

"No. If you use up all your time writing up a diary nothing happens to you worth telling about."

SOMEWHAT.

Bill—What's your friend's name?

Jill—Robin Albatross.

"What a funny name."

"Why, it's a 'bird' of a name."

(Special cable to "The Chicago Tribune" from a correspondent whose information was obtained from British and French sources.)

Boulogne.—When the history of the tremendous struggle in the neighborhood of Mons and Charleroi—a titanic combat lasting five days—is written the historian will pen perhaps the most glorious chapter which has ever been or ever will be added to the history of British and French arms.

When in the course of time we are able to weigh up all the features of that stupendous combat, in which were locked the vast stern forces of Prussian military autocracy and the pick of British and French military strength, the forces of freedom; when we know the gain and loss the tragedy and heroism of it all, there will shine resplendently forth a stirring story of martial glory which will make it matter but little which way the advantage went.

Gathers Story From Soldiers.

From the lips of those who took part in it, from the wounded out of the battle of giants, from the refugees who fled from their blurred and blackened homesteads and their villages devoured by fire and shattered by shell, I have during the last two days heard enough to be able to piece together the story of a struggle which dwarfs all the decisive battles of the world.

It was a fight against the finest cohorts of the kaiser, endeavoring to crush their way through the allies' lines by sheer weight of numbers, aided by all the strength of the artillery that could be brought into action.

Meets the British Wounded.

It was all so quietly said I could not help casting my eyes again over the trim, khaki-clad figure of the little soldier who had come through that ghastly ordeal, come through it to tell me in a few short hours afterward that he was eager to be with the forces at the front again. "And," he added, "I shall have to go to England without a cap. A shrapnel bullet knocked mine off in the darkness."

I turned to his companion. "Yes," he said, "that's the story. It was the first time the German artillery really got at us. As a rule, their big gun fire was mighty poor, though they did go in for quantity. In the trenches we used to watch the German gunners trying to hit conspicuous parts of Mons, and every time they missed we gave them a cheer which they could hear.

Work of the Artillery.

"They are not shots, either. It was really astounding what they could miss. I think we can beat everybody at marksmanship."

"And the British artillery?" I asked.

"Why, it was magnificent. If there had only been more of it. But there the Germans got us. As it was, it was perhaps a good deal more than they ever expected.

"On one occasion—I think it was late on Monday—we held a position about 500 or 600 yards from the German lines. We could see them quite clearly. They were mostly standing up. Fresh troops, I think they were, being brought up for another attack.

"The order was given us to fix bayonets. It was evidently to be a charge—the thing we especially had been waiting for. In the sunlight our bayonets flashed and we waited for orders.

Hail of Bullets Comes.

"The Germans must have seen our bayonets flashing, for they went down on their faces. If there is one thing they fear it is a bayonet attack. There developed suddenly a hail of bullets and the order to charge did not come.

"We retired a little way after that and before night fell advanced to much the same position again. Just as darkness came we could see the ground well in front of us simply littered with German dead. It cost us a lot, too.

"At one time early next day we got within a couple of hundred yards of their dead. I am sure we must have nearly wiped out those in front of us."

Fight Rages Furiously.

From others I have gathered how furiously for days the fight raged against the French forces on the right of the British. The English soldiers speak in highest praise of the coolness under fire of the French infantry.

In the end, however, the fierceness of the successive onslaughts was too much for the exhausted French troops, against whom the ever-fresh forces of the enemy were hurled. It was here, indeed that the long encounter was really decided. Gradually weight told—weight of regiments and of artillery.

With magnificent heroism the men held their positions. If they gave a yard the enemy bought it at tremendous cost. But they were ready and prepared to pay it, and pay it they did.

The final order to retire came. Slowly the French positions on the right of the British were given up throughout Tuesday.

700 Hold Back 5,000.

London.—A British correspondent from Boulogne writes:

It has taken the British expeditionary force just four days to shatter the illusion which has been drummed into every German that the fighting qualities of British troops are negligible beside the mighty race whose business is war.

The uhlan is at least a wiser man today. He has found that breaking a British line of steel is not such easy work as harassing a countryside shorn by murder of its men folk.

German cavalry, estimated to number 5,000 men, may have overwhelmed a little British force of 700 which was hourly awaiting relief, but not before its own ranks had been sadly thinned, nor yet without having recourse to the base expedient of mounting quick firers in Red Cross wagons.

Supporting Force Fails.

It was not for the 700 to reason why. The supporting force never appeared. They just stood their ground to a man, and it seems that only 300 remain. When all was lost there ensued no sauve qui peut. Calmly harassing their pursuers with a murderous fire, all that was left of them retreated with the wounded of the convoy intact.

It is a simple story, a last stand one, that should thrill every British heart. On Wednesday morning British troops had taken up a position slightly in the rear of the town (censor forbids name of town) upon high ground. On the extreme right of a semi-circular position were two high guns of garrison artillery.

At first these found an excellent range, dealing death by wholesale to the invaders, who were some miles away. Then with the steady German advance the range was lost toward 1 p. m.

Position Becomes Critical.

The fight had begun at 11:30 a. m. The position became critical for the heroic British defenders. As every vital minute slipped by anxious eyes looked back for the promised help that was never to come.

Even at a terrible disadvantage—at least ten to one infantry and artillery—the artillery was holding its own, when hordes of uhlans seemed suddenly to sweep down through the town. They galloped, with amazing disregard for themselves, on to the very muzzles of the enemy's field guns.

There must have been 3,000 of them here alone. A survivor tells me (the correspondent):

"The last I saw was one of our officers holding a revolver in either hand, firing away, screened by the guns. He alone must have accounted for a dozen uhlans. They were falling on all sides of him."

Towards 2 p. m. the 300 gallant survivors, the majority of them wounded, began to fall back. They reached a safe position by nightfall.

Keep Up Continuous Attack.

The uhlans kept up a continuous attack, and at midnight two hostile airmen began dropping bombs on the British camp, but fortunately without causing its destruction. Perhaps I may be permitted to give verbatim the following eloquent summing up from a gunner who was shot in both legs:

"They won't be so cocksure the next time we give them hell."

I have been able to gather details of severe engagements in which British troops were concerned. On Wednesday morning at 6 o'clock detachments 3,000 strong bivouacked after a forced march of 17 miles. Through lack of air scouts (I am asked to emphasize this point) the exact position in the neighborhood of hostile troops in superior numbers was misjudged.

Leave Wall of Dead.

Within an hour with the uhlans leading the way, the Germans swarmed down on our fatigued men, approaching within 50 yards. With the quick firers the British position, however was strong, and the Germans were repulsed, leaving a wall of dead.

By all accounts the German plan of campaign is being carried out regardless of human life. The German artillery fire is spoken of as deadly, but the infantry is beneath contempt.

After repulsing attack after attack and not suffering considerably, the British force was able to select and save a base five miles distant. That the attacking force was more or less crippled is clear, for they made no effort to follow up their opponents.

Lauds Conduct of French.

An Amiens dispatch to the Daily Chronicle says:

"The French retirement before the German horde advancing from Namur down the valley of the Meuse was masterly. The Germans won their way at a cost in human life as great as in defeat; yet they won their way.

"For France that retirement is as glorious a story as anything in her annals.

"It was nearly a fortnight ago that the Germans began concentrating their heaviest forces on Namur, pressing southwards over the Meuse valley. After the battle of Dinant the French army was heavily outnumbered and fell back gradually in order to gain time for re-enforcement to come to its support.

"The French artillery was posted on the heights above the river and swept the advancing Germans with a storm of fire. On the right bank the French infantry was intrenched, supported by field guns and mitrailleuses. The infantry did deadly work, holding the positions with great tenacity and dropping back only to occupy new positions just as doggedly.

"The fighting extended for a considerable distance on both sides of the Meuse, and many side line engagements were fought by the cavalry. There was a memorable encounter near Mezieres which was evacuated last Monday the French taking up magnificent positions commanding the town and bridges."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Entered as Second-class matter August. 3d 905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

Candidates for county office are beginning to hustle for votes now days as they realize that "one shall be taken and the other one left."

St. Paul is pretty sure to get the record of being tail ender in the American Association of Base Ball Clubs, with Minneapolis a close second.

There was certainly some queer laws passed at the last session of the legislature. One of them which we think originated from Pennington County was the act making the term of all county officers four instead of two years. If a county official is O. K. and satisfactory to the people they will re-elect him without much exertion on his part, and if he is not satisfactory to them they had ought to have the right to fire him out of office after two year of unfaithful service.

The State Board of Control are out with an interview from R. W. McClaughry, formerly warden of the federal prison at Leavenworth, in which he gives Minnesota the credit of having the best prison in the world. A large amount of credit is due to warden Wolfer for making this prison what it is. But fellows who make of themselves candidates for a protracted visit to that institution, do a good deal of kicking about going down there to enjoy the pleasures of "The Model Prison," and employ the best legal counsel to try to convince the jury that they should not be allowed to go down there to enjoy the pleasant surroundings of that institution.

The European War is nothing more than murder and butchery by men like Kaiser Wilhelm and the Czar of Russia. The very idea of a monarch of one nation ordering his armies to take the capital of another nation or die in the attempt, then marching them up to be slaughtered by machine guns is a disgrace to our modern civilization. The troops of France who give up their lives in the defense of Paris have something to die for, and the troops of Germany who give up their lives in defense of Berlin have something to die for, but the poor fellows in the invading armies are in the same position of poor sheep being driven to the slaughter house.

In order to make it a little more profitable for ditch contractors our last legislature passed a law to raise the amount of payment to be made to ditch contractors from seventy-five to eighty-five per cent, in certain cases. This law was in line with about all the other drainage laws passed by the last legislature, to favor the contractors against the farmers and tax payers. So distasteful to Beltrami County was this law that their County Auditor (whose name was not A. H. Fasel) refused payment, claiming the law was unconstitutional. Our County Attorney E. M. Stanton was employed by the drainage companies to present their side of the case, and he won out, and the tax payers of Beltrami County had to come across with the eighty-five per cent, which proves that Mr. Fasel knew his business when he made the fight for the election of Mr. Stanton, who is one of our best constitutional lawyers and the attorney for about all the corporations that are doing business in northern Minnesota.

Our farmers learned a lesson from last week's frost, and there will not be much flax sown after June 1st next year.

The Pioneer Press is still nursing its grudge against Wm. E. Lee, because he defeated Eberhart, and they do not like Hammond much better, in fact it looks as if that Pluticratic corporation paper got an opportunity to go way back and sit down in the Primary campaign.

From present indications the new government that they are trying to set up in Mexico will be as bad as the old. General Carranza is now going to confisicate all railroad and turn them over to the government. It is reported that Carranza ordered suspension of train service to Vera Cruz and General Furston threatens reprisal.

It is strange that some of our wise members of the legislature who represent the interest of the farmers did not think to have a law passed denying the right of cities that have independent school districts to vote on the election of County Superintendent of Schools. This just law could have been passed very easily, and the attention of our next legislatur should be called to it, and have it passed.

ADDING MACHINES.

They Are Not New, as Pascal Invented One in the Year 1642.

The adding machine is of modern development, but not a modern invention, a passable one having been invented in 1642 by Pascal (1623-1662), a celebrated French geometrician, philosopher and writer. Later, in 1671, the adding machine was modified to facilitate multiplication by Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz, a German mathematician of great achievement, and his invention was followed by many improvements.

A notable experimenter in this line was Charles Babbage (1792-1871), an English mathematician, many years professor of mathematics at Cambridge university. In order to secure accuracy in tables of logarithms he conceived the idea of doing the work by machinery and was commissioned by the British government to superintend the construction of a machine for the purpose. He spent much time and money in experimenting and attained some remarkable results, but died before perfecting his machine.

All calculating machines contain certain features devised by special reference to the work to be done, including circular metallic disks, wheels with teeth, etc., ingenious, but not more complicated and no more responsive to human intelligence than many other machines. The thinking is all done by the operator.—Philadelphia Press.

Ole Omlid of Erie was transacting business here last Saturday, and improved the opportunity to jog his subscription to THE SUNBEAM ahead.

Hog cholera is still gathering in the hogs in this locality one by one. We have now lost four, and have five more whose chances for recovery seems very doubtful.

The latest war news from the European war is that the English and French have stopped the forward movement of the Germans toward Paris, and now have them on retreat.

A. H. Fasel carries a copy of THE SUNBEAM in his pocket when he goes out campaigning, something that is unnecessary in this locality, as the farmers about all take "the sheet."

There were three Indian canoes passed by here this week with young men from Bemidji who were canoeing from Red Lake to Grand Forks, on a pleasure and sight seeing trip.

The last week's frost entirely ruined some patches of flax. Early sown flax was out of the way, and flax sown on high land did not suffer so bad, but late sown flax on moskeg land will not be worth harvesting.

We understand that Edward Singer has purchased the store and stock of John Lattimore at Erie, and that Mr. Lattimore will now devote all of his attention to his paper, The Eleven Towns.

The new railroad town of Goodridge is certainly booming with business houses going up on every corner, and the prospects are that that will be the largest little city, outside of Thief River Falls that there is in the county.

M. E. Hyland is sowing quite a large amount of winter wheat and rye. He says that his winter rye got the best of the patches of sow thistles and choked them out. This crop yeilds well and is one of the best for cleaning up the land.

Thore T. Lunde left to-day for St. Paul to consult a specialist regarding his health. He has been sick since last spring with some kind of heart trouble. We hope to hear that he will receive treatment that will restore him to health.

W. J. LaBree was up this way Wednesday talking a little politics in addition to doing other business. Jess fixs his fences in very good repair in this end of the county, and proceeded to strengthen them a little by publishing his announcement in THE SUNBEAM.

There was quite a large attendance of candidates for office at the Young Peoples' Society at Eddy Hyland's residence last Sunday, who autoed from Thief River Falls to tell the young people how glad they were to be there, but one of them frankly owned that they would not be there if this was not campaign year and they were running for office.

Bernhard Knudsen gave the young people a very interesting discription at last Sunday's Young Peoples' Meeting, of his visit to Norway this summer, and how the Scandinavians by birth and Americans by adoption celebrated the 4th of July. "Oh, I tell you," said Mr. Knudsen, "that we all felt proud of the flag of the U. S. as it floated over us, and the King of Norway was extending his thanks to us for our visit to the father land." Mr. Knudsen did not mention that he was a candidate for the office of County Treasurer, but the people will remember that on November 3rd.

Even J. Sund is digging a ditch on the town line, on the south side of his farm at his own expense. Who says our farmers are not trying to improve roads and build up the country.

Frank Lundeen, Pete Gustafson, John Radneicki, Torkel Lande and Gunder Anderson thrashed their grain out of the shock last week. The Ed Rustan machine done the work for them in a very satisfactory manner.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof and we will make out your papers free of charge.

A cab was drawn up at the door—for they had arranged their plan down to the last detail—and Charles and I entered, together with the officers, while Magniff betook himself elsewhere. A long ride through the Paris streets terminated at the principal fortresses of the capital. There we were separated; Charles was taken in one direction and I in another, along a branching stone corridor and into a small but fairly well-furnished room, clearly no prison cell, where I was left to my medications.

An hour later I received a visit from a major in uniform, who courteously requested my presence before the examining magistrate. He seemed to regard me as some rare and valuable wild animal, and my youthful appearance evidently astonished him.

"Monsieur Pichon has the reputation of a brute, mademoiselle," he said. "But have no fear. You need confess nothing, and he is merely an adjunct to the military law under which you will be tried. You will have ample time in which to prepare your defense."

"For myself, I need none," I replied. "But where is the chevalier? Shall I see him?"

The major shook his head.

"He has already been examined," he answered, smiling faintly. "I fear it will go hard with him. France has had too many betrayals of late. But have no fear for yourself," he continued, scrutinizing my face. "The utmost penalty for treachery in time of peace is exile upon the Isle du Diable."

The Devil's island! Remembrances of all that I had read about that fearful place rushed through my mind. For the moment I thought that I would faint. The walls reeled round me and I saw the face of the officer through a wavering mist. Then I collected my wits resolutely and, indicating that I was ready, followed him out of the room and down a long corridor, until we entered a small office containing a high desk and a number of chairs. Behind the desk, on a bench, sat a stern-looking, black-bearded magistrate, wearing the gown and cap of his professional office. Seated in the room were Magniff and the officials who had arrested us, with two or three officers in uniform.

The magistrate beckoned insolently to me to approach his desk, and, when I stood before him, fixed his penetrating black eyes full on my face for some half minute. Then, seeing that my own gaze did not falter, he cried in savage tones:

"You will confess everything immediately, to the last iota. Your fellow conspirator has done so already. You will tell me the entire story of your infamous treachery and what power induced your lover to steal the document."

I am not hot tempered. For a moment I was dazed at his brutality. But at this insolent assumption of my guilt, combined, as it was, with the utmost insolence of bearing, I lost all self-control. I took a single step forward and did a thing that I have never done before or since. I boxed his ears—twice!

Before he had recovered speech, the officials of the court rushed forward; they would have manacled me, but suddenly and swiftly the officer who had conducted me to the office interposed.

"Well done, mademoiselle," he cried. "Back, all of you." He turned to the magistrate. "This is a military case," he cried, "and let me remind you that you are an accessory only. The lady shall not be insulted, or I withdraw the case from your hands."

There was a full half minute's silence. Then, swallowing in his throat and muttering angrily the magistrate called upon the banker and began to interrogate him, one side of his face still scarlet with my finger marks.

"Mr. Magniff, you will please place me in possession of sufficient facts to permit of my signing the paper of detention," he stammered.

The banker stepped forward briskly.

"This woman came to me three weeks ago to demand possession of certain bonds which she alleged were in a certain safe in my vaults," he said. "I laughed at her and showed her to the door, but she persisted in her claim, and, after having warned her what the consequences of a fraudulent claim would be I permitted her to proceed."

"Prisoner, you may deny any or all of these statements," shouted the magistrate.

I remained silent, fixing my eyes on Magniff. My direct gaze seemed to disconcert him; he turned his back to me and continued:

"By some means she had obtained knowledge of the combination code. Again I warned her. She persisted in her claim, alleging that she was Anne Ives, a grand-daughter of the Comte d'Yves, and owner of the bonds. My books show that a certain woman of this name actually does own some worthless bonds in the old Panama company, but they have been lost these thirty years and are certainly not in my safe.

"She alleged that she had lost the key. Resolved to bring her to justice, I told her to return today, when a duplicate key would be made and the safe opened. Then, I said, playing upon her greed, I would purchase the bonds from her at an enormous price. Immediately upon her departure I had the safe opened. It was empty."

"Proceed, monsieur," said the magistrate, smiling.

"I immediately investigated this woman's record," Magniff continued. "I found that she had actually come from Canada recently, as one of my woman witnesses will shortly show. In London she became acquainted with the prisoner d'Yves. They flew together in an aeroplane at an aviation meeting. Subsequently the traitor took her into Westminster abbey at the time of the coronation, ostensibly as his wife.

"The most damaging feature, however, in my opinion, is—"

"Pardon, monsieur, you may not draw inferences," interposed the magistrate suavely. "That is my province, though doubtless"—he smiled knowingly—"your inferences and mine will coincide in so clear a case of guilt."

"I furthermore submit," Magniff continued, "that this woman has stayed at Clichy, the home of the male prisoner, during the last two weeks, and is doubtless thoroughly conversant with his plans. On board the ship, and subsequently, while visiting the Louvre, ostensibly for the study of art, she was seen in the company of a certain Greek named Zeuxis, who, as you are aware, is being sought by the Government as being directly implicated in this crime. Undoubtedly the two men and the woman hatched the scheme together and are unitedly responsible for it."

"I thank you, monsieur," said the magistrate. "You have rendered France a service of incalculable value. Please conclude your evidence."

"This morning, or rather soon after noon," concluded Magniff, smiling broadly, "the two prisoners came to my office with the utmost effrontery, for the purpose of recovering the bonds. I knew that at some recent date some forged bonds had been placed in the safe. With them, but so cunningly hidden among the mass of papers that no casual observer would have perceived it, was the stolen document. I knew it was there; I suffered this woman to remove it, and she was immediately arrested. She trembled and betrayed every evidence of guilt."

"You may go, monsieur," said the magistrate, bowing to Magniff. Immediately the two officials were called and gave formal evidence concerning the events of the afternoon.

"Have you any rejoinder to make?" demanded the magistrate, scowling at me.

"I think, monsieur, that I have made you a rejoinder already," I observed mockingly.

"I have no more to say to you. But to this gentleman," I continued, turning to the major, "I beg to announce that I am completely innocent. I do not know," I continued, with increasing agitation which, in spite of all my efforts, I was not able wholly to conceal, "I do not quite know what depths of villainy have been sounded in this infamous conspiracy against the Chevalier d'Yves and myself. But he is innocent, and pursued by that rogue and his scheming son to further their hateful designs against Clichy, which they hope to snatch out of my grandfather's possession—"

"The prisoner, in response, alleges conspiracy to obtain a title to land," murmured the magistrate, jotting down a few words upon his pad.

"My principal female witness will arrive tomorrow morning," interposed Magniff, "when I hope to be able to place you in possession of the remaining facts."

"Remanded in bail of the amount of one hundred thousand francs," said the functionary. "Remove the prisoner." He leaned over his bench, and shook his finger at me. "Once more I counsel you," he roared; "make a clean breast of the whole affair and throw yourself upon the mercy of the court."

The officer of the fortress interposed, turning his back upon M. Pichon contemptuously, and touched me on the arm. I placed my hand in his, and he conducted me from the court room. When we had reached my room he stopped and said, admiringly:

"Mademoiselle, you are so brave I quite believe you guilty."

"You did not before?" I asked smiling.

"Before," he answered, "the charge seemed incredible. Why, you should have been across the frontier instantly, instead of waiting to trick Magniff in such a clumsy fashion as that. Did the Germans pay your lover well?"

"Believe what you like; I am innocent. As innocent as—as the chevalier," I added.

"I can well believe that," said the officer, bowing himself out of the room.

One problem perplexed me greatly: who was the "Principal female witness" of the prosecution?

CHAPTER VIII.

A Turn of the Wheel.

(In which my adversary discovers that he has trumped his ace.)

In spite of my assumed indifference, I spent a miserable night within the prison fortress. I could not help realizing that the case against Charles looked black; I had no strong faith in French justice particularly in a case of alleged espionage, which would send up the nation's anger to the boiling point. When the first streaks of daylight entered my room I arose and dressed with feverish anticipation of the day's developments. The "principal female witness" of whom the banker Magniff had spoken was due to arrive that morning. Whoever she might be, I hoped that her evidence would prove a boomerang for the prosecution. Certainly the climax of the affair must be at hand; this racking, torturing suspense could not endure much longer.

My only joy—but how great a one, how strong a comfort I cannot put into words—was the recollection that Charles and I had publicly pledged our troth; nothing could take away the memory of that or tear from either the possession of the other's heart, no matter what the outcome.

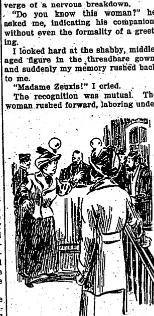
The development was even speedier than I had imagined. After I had breakfasted upon a light meal brought in by the same kindly officer of the preceding day, visitors were announced. The major, who had introduced them, withdrew, muttering something about privacy, and there entered—Magniff himself, followed by a woman whom, though her face seemed familiar, I did not immediately recall. Indeed, I hardly looked at her, so astonished was I at seeing the change which the night had wrought upon the banker. For all his self-confidence was gone; his hair was ruffled, his garments untidy, his face woebegone and haggard; he looked as though he was upon the verge of a nervous breakdown.

"Do you know this woman?" he asked me, indicating his companion, without even the formality of a greeting.

I looked hard at the shabby, middle-aged figure in the threadbare gown, and suddenly my memory rushed back to me.

"Madame Zeuxis!" I cried.

The recognition was mutual. The woman rushed forward, laboring under an emotion more intense than the banker's. She seized my hands in hers and covered them with kisses. This outburst astonished me no less than her companion.



"Now I Will Tell You All," She Cried to Magniff.

"It is Miss Ives!" she cried. "The lady of the ship! I learned your name from the ship steward, lady, for I meant to go to you and kill you. Ah! forgive me. I was mad with jealousy, for my man had made me think he loved you, and all the while he used you as a decoy to divert my suspicion, while he made love to another."

"Now I will tell you all," she cried to Magniff; and there was pathos mingled with tragedy in this revival of ancient fires in the middle-aged Greek; I could imagine how many sorrows, how much jealousy she had suffered since she gave herself into the scoundrel's keeping. Her utterance was intensely dramatic.

"Now, I shall tell all the truth," she declaimed. "When the letter-writer wrote these for me, saying that I would prove the guilt of the Chevalier, I did not know that Miss Ives here was his betrothed. For you are betrothed to him, are you not?" she pleaded. "Yes, so all are saying this morning. Well, my man was to induce me to give false evidence against him, and it was all arranged. But that was a week ago.

"Now everything is changed, for he himself has been deceived, and he wants his revenge. When I left him five days ago, I was to tell the half truth. But I shall tell everything. The Chevalier is innocent—as innocent as this lady of his imprisoned here."

She was becoming incoherent in her statements. I made her sit down and gave her water. Presently she resumed, more calmly:

"Constantinopoulo Zeuxis, my man, he stole the key to the safe from the purse of Miss Ives in London," she continued. "It was arranged long before. He took the key to Paris, removed the bonds, and substituted the forged ones. He also stole the treaty from the Chevalier and handed it to the chief conspirator. He was to have received a thousand pounds for his share in the work."

"Who was his accomplice?" I asked calmly; and I saw a shade of gray pass over the banker's face.

"Leopold Magniff—your son," said Madame Zeuxis contemptuously, spinning round and facing the father.

Magniff, pere, threw up his arms as though to ward off a sudden blow. He sank down into a chair, his face ashen gray, breathing heavily.

"It is impossible!" he muttered, more to himself than us. "Leopold was a good boy—a little wild, but always a good boy. He had all the money he needed. No, he could not have been the traitor."

"Why was the treaty put back in the safe if it was of so much value?" I asked the woman.

"Because Leopold's hatred for the Chevalier was stronger than his desire for revenge," she answered quickly. "He wanted the bonds, because he knew that he could force his father to buy them back from him at any price, by threatening to dispose of them elsewhere. Monsieur Magniff here had to have the bonds; he agreed to sell them to the American government years before; he had sold them, trusting that they would never be found. The holder could have made him pay millions for the possession of them. And there was money in the treaty, too. Germany or Italy would have paid well for it—not so much as M. Magniff would have given for the bonds but still a large sum. Of this my man Constantinopoulo was to have received a thousand pounds."

"Go on," I said.

"Afterwards, when Leopold Magniff discovered that the Chevalier was his bitterest enemy, his desire for revenge proved stronger than his greed. He induced my man to replace the stolen treaty in the safe, knowing that it would be discovered there, and that Miss Ives and the Chevalier would be involved in a common ruin. So the treaty was not sold, and my man gets nothing.

"When he found that he had been cheated he would have murdered his confederate. But Monsieur Leopold set the government upon his track, and he was forced to fly, his vengeance unaccomplished. It was then that my man sent to Monsieur Magniff here to betray his confederate.

"But I shall tell more than that—I shall tell you where Constantinopoulo is hiding, for I have since learned that he has again betrayed me. He has made love to another woman, the woman on the boat, to conceal whom he pretended that he loved Miss Ives. Fool that I was! I should have known that he was not worthy to blacken her shoes. He is hiding with her in the Islands—at Scouto, off Corsica—and all those whom he has betrayed shall soon be on his track."

She ceased, exhausted by the vehemence of her anger. And I looked toward the banker. He had collapsed into his chair and was staring wildly around him. I caught the words he uttered.

"No, no," he was whispering. "Leopold is a good boy. He could not be a thief and a traitor."

I went over and shook him by the arm.

"Monsieur Magniff," I said, "you see now that you have been mistaken. It is your duty to save an innocent man."

"But there is nothing that can be done," he cried, awakening from his lethargy.

"Yes," I replied. "We must get Zeuxis and bring him here to testify. He will tell all, out of his hatred for"—I was going to add "your son," but ended with "his fellow conspirator."

"But my son will suffer imprisonment—he will go to the Devil's Island!" Magniff cried. "He is a good boy—it cannot be true."

"It is true," I answered sternly. "He must be brought back."

"And the bonds, too," cried the woman suddenly.

"He took them with him. He must get the bonds also—your bonds. They are worth millions. He took them to spite your son, Leopold."

"My bonds," muttered Magniff, remembering even then that I had sold them to him. "My bonds. I must have them."

"Will you permit your son to be denounced for the sake of the bonds?" I asked.

"No, no," he cried. "No, he must have promise of immunity. Then he will tell all. But he must not go to the Devil's Island. Leopold is so delicate; the climate would kill him there."

The sight of this querulous old man, reduced to such depths of abjection touched a slight chord of pity in my heart. But at all cost Charles must be set free. That was my first and overwhelming duty.

"Listen, Monsieur Magniff," I said, more gently. "It will be impossible to obtain immunity for both conspirators. For Zeuxis, yes, for he was but a tool. For your son, no. But at least he can have warning, so that he may, if he can, put some distance between himself, and the avengers of the law. That is all that can be done. Now—you must offer your bonds for me to the value of my bail and I will get Zeuxis and bring him back to testify at the trial."

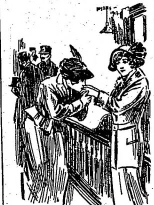
"It cannot be done," he cried. "The trial takes place on the tenth day from today." He pulled a newspaper out of his breast pocket. "See!" he said, tapping it with his fingers triumphantly, "read this demand, to which the government has been forced to accede. In ten days the Chevalier d'Yves must have been tried and condemned and be on his way to the Devil's Island, or there will be a revolution in Paris. All the towns know of it; all France and Europe know. France has harbored too many traitors. Paris is calling for immediate punishment. And the government has yielded. It was announced in the Chamber of Deputies yesterday that a special military court shall convene on Monday week."

I glanced over the article hastily. It was a terrible philippic, one of those furious cries for vengeance such as stirred the hearts of Parisians. That Charles was of the old aristocracy of France had added fuel to the popular flame. He must be tried at once, the writer demanded; otherwise the government would fall. There must be no delay in measuring out condign punishment to the traitor.

"You see," cried Magniff, "you cannot get the man Zeuxis here from the Island of Corsica in less than three weeks. There is but one steamer a week from Marseilles. And in ten days!—Mon Dieu! Nothing except a swift aeroplane could cross those waters and bring him back in time."



The Woman Seized My Hands Again and Kissed Them Passionately.

"It shall be done," I cried. "I shall go to Corsica in the Chevalier's airship. And in ten days I shall return with Zeuxis."

"You are insane, girl," cried the banker, angrily. "The science of flight is in its infancy. Even if you reached Marseilles you would be swamped in the gales of the Mediterranean. "No," he continued craftily, "we can devise some scheme by which the Chevalier shall get off lightly. I will give evidence as to his monetary needs. I will say he needed the money from the sale of the treaty to save Clichy for his father. That will touch the judges' hearts, that filial piety. And you shall be freed. I will withdraw my charge," he went on, watching my face eagerly. "And I will pay you the fifty thousand francs I promised you, even if you do not obtain the bonds. You will be rich, you will—"

I could not feel any sentiment but pity at the aspect of this miserable old man, desperately striving to free himself from the meshes of his own net.

"Monsieur Magniff," I said quietly, "you will go on my bail at once, and I shall depart for the Liparis. Otherwise your son shall be arrested within an hour. Which shall it be?"

He fell to pleading then; he offered me double the reward, fabulous gifts. His love for his son seemed stronger than his cupidity. At last he was compelled to face the issue.

"You swear to give the government no warning about Leopold before your departure?" he asked, cringing before me. "You will allow him the six days in which to flee?"

"He can go to the ends of the earth for all I care," I responded. "I do not want vengeance upon him, miserable scoundrel that he is. Leave him to the future. Some day his evil deeds will recoil on him. Come, you agree?"

Magniff drew in a deep sigh and submitted.

"I accept," he answered. "But mademoiselle, you will remember that the bonds are mine?"

"Assuredly," I answered.

He stumbled weakly from my presence and out of the room. The woman seized my hands again and kissed them passionately.

"At Scouto, off the coast of Corsica," she whispered. "He will go with you eagerly, if he is promised immunity."

"And what is your reward?" I asked curiously.

The woman looked at me strangely.

"Is it not enough that I shall see my man again and win him from that woman who stole his heart from me?" she asked, with pathetic dignity. "You do not understand, lady? Ah, but when you are married—then you will know."

She followed Magniff out of the room.

Within an hour my bail had been formally accepted and I was at liberty. Magniff obtained a hasty interview with the Minister of War, at which immunity for Zeuxis was promised, in case he should offer satisfactory evidence against the principal conspirator, whose name the banker did not divulge. Magniff was a power in France, and his word was ample.

The sun was not yet high when I walked out of my prison doors. I had seen nobody; the magic of Magniff's word had sufficed to set me free. After all, though so much had been done, the government had no special interest in me. They were sure that they had in Charles the real traitor; I was but an accessory, and they shrewdly surmised, I think, that I was to turn state's evidence and bring the rest of the confederates to justice.

The trial had been set for Monday week, at ten o'clock in the forenoon. This was Friday. Each hour now was of incalculable value. The scheme appeared preposterous. But I had flown in Canada, until I was fairly sure of myself, and with Charles I had soared triumphantly in his aeroplane in England, seeking the regions of the sun, high above our competitors, we two together. I knew how staunch and true the winged vessel was; I knew which levers controlled each of her movements; and at Clichy we had made several excursions. I had a confidence now that was almost superstition in the success of my desperate undertaking.

Would that I could have told him! But he was too closely guarded; even Magniff, with all his power, had been denied admission to him.

I caught a train back to Clichy, arriving toward the middle of the afternoon. It was a sad home-coming. A curious crowd watched me descend at the little railroad station, and a newspaper correspondent (I learned afterward that my movements had been watched by a whole corps of newspaper men and government spies since I left the fortress) snapped his camera in my face. But one learns to be tolerant of these things when one's whole mind is set on a single desire.

The crowd followed me to the gates of the chateau. Only there did they leave me.

And then, for the second time, I received an object lesson in the bearing of a French nobleman and noblewoman. The old butler who admitted me stared at me as if I had been a newly risen ghost, and his knees trembled as he ushered me into the room in which my grandfather and Charles' mother sat. She was sewing busily; the old man, at his writing desk, was drafting some form of document, a pitiful, dignified petition, I believe, to the government on behalf of Charles, setting forth the stainless honor of their race throughout five centuries. But when I entered they rose and came forward to greet me as calmly as though Charles was absent upon a personal errand in Paris and were soon to return.

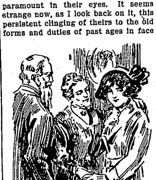
And their first words were of congratulation upon my engagement! The papers had been full of it, it appeared. The notary before whom we had appeared, swelling with self-importance, had run with his evidence to the government.

"You will make Charles a good wife, my dear," said his mother, kissing me. "Would that we could have a fair inheritance for him. Clichy must go—but at least the family will be perpetuated."

"It is fate brought you to us," said the old Comte. He had grown even feebler during the brief interval of my absence, it seemed to me; the shock had told perceptibly upon him. "It is fate brought you to us," he repeated, "to be the consolation of my old age and the hope of the d'Yves."

Then we began talking of Charles, and, as briefly as possible, since there was not time for emotion, I laid bare the story of our arrest, placing special emphasis upon the fact that the conspiracy was breaking down.

And then I laid before them the plan that I had formed, of flying to Scouto, and, to my astonishment, they both fell in with it immediately. But, though I could never doubt their love for me, their eagerness for my safety, the family, as ever in France, ranked paramount in their eyes. It seems strange now, as I look back on it, this persistent clinging of theirs to the old forms and duties of past ages in face of modern change. But it did not seem strange then.



Their First Words Were of Congratulation Upon My Engagement!

"You have flown in England," said the old Comte enthusiastically, "and here the winds are no less favorable. Your act will be no more, in its peculiar way, than other women of our line have done. It is not for Charles alone that you will offer up your life to the gods of the air, Anne, but for the race, for the long line of the d'Yves. And I know that you will succeed. God has not sent you to us in so miraculous a way, and guarded you through such great dangers, that you should fail now. You will return at the appointed time," he continued, his eyes flashing as he paced up and down the room, "and you will save Charles from the hands of his enemies. The battle has been long—but it has been shorter than the wars of the Fronde. We have suffered much—Richelieu persecuted us more harshly, and yet Clichy has never fallen. I almost believe," he ended, "that you will live to inherit Clichy and to restore its fortunes, and hand it down to our descendants."

But when I urged that I should start that night neither would hear of it.

TO TAKE ELABORATE CENSUS

Statistics of the Prevalence and Possible Spreading of Tuberculosis Will Be Ascertained.

A tuberculosis census of thousands of churches in various parts of the country will be taken in September, under the direction of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. The census will be part of the preparation for the fifth annual Tuberculosis day, to be observed during the week of November 29. The ministers of several thousand churches will be asked to report on the number of deaths from tuberculosis in the last year, the number of living cases in their parishes on September 1, the number of deaths from all causes, and the number of members or communicants. These figures will be made the basis of an educational campaign, which will culminate in the Tuberculosis day movement, for which occasion sermon and lecture outlines and other forms of tuberculosis literature will be distributed free to ministers.

Last year nearly 75,000 churches, schools and other bodies took part in the Tuberculosis day observance. The movement had the indorsement of leading church officials of every denomination. More than 1,200 anti-tuberculosis societies, scattered all over the country, will work this year to make Tuberculosis day a success.

FOOD FACTS

What An M. D. Learned.

A prominent Georgia physician went through a food experience which he makes public.

"It was my own experience that first led me to advocate Grape-Nuts food and I also know, from having prescribed it to convalescents and other weak patients, that the food is a wonderful rebuilder and restorer of nerve and brain tissue, as well as muscle. It improves the digestion and sick patients gain very rapidly, just as I did in strength and weight.

"I was in such a low state that I had to give up my work entirely, and went to the mountains of this state, but two months there did not improve me; in fact, I was not quite as well as when I left home.

"My food did not sustain me and it became plain that I must change. Then I began to use Grape-Nuts food and in two weeks I could walk a mile without fatigue, and in five weeks returned to my home and practice, taking up hard work again. Since that time I have felt as well and strong as I ever did in my life.

"As a physician who seeks to help all sufferers, I consider it a duty to make these facts public." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Trial 10 days of Grape-Nuts, when regular food does not seem to sustain the body, works wonders. "There's a Reason."

State News of General Interest

INSANE SON SLAYS MOTHER

Armed Maniac Also Fires at Sister, but Misses Her—Escapes to Woods—May Be Suicide.

Cambridge.—S. Lindbo, a single man 30 years old, shot and killed his aged mother and escaped to adjacent woods. He is insane and the authorities are of the opinion that he has also killed himself and that his body will shortly be found.

Lindbo has been suffering from mental trouble and recently has seemed to grow worse. His parents did not like to call in the authorities believing they could watch him and prevent any violence. They live on a farm near Rush Point in Chisago county, about 10 miles from this place.

Wednesday Lindbo appeared in the yard with a revolver and fired one shot at his sister, but missed her. When the mother, frightened by the screams of the daughter, ran from the house she was confronted by the maniac, who fired a bullet into her breast, and when she ran from him he fired a second time, hitting her in the back. She was carried into the house and soon expired.

Brandishing his gun and yelling at the top of his voice, Lindbo vanished in the woods near by and has not since been seen. The sheriff of Chisago county was notified and search is being made for the fugitive.

The murdered woman was about 65 years of age and was a pioneer of this vicinity. Steps have been taken to guard the Lindbo home until the fate of the slayer is known.

RED RIVER CORN PAST DANGER

Secretary of Development Association Finds Big Crop Assured—All Varieties Reach Maturity.

Crookston.—"We did not want to shout too soon," said N. S. Davies, secretary of the Minnesota Red River Development association, "but as far as our corn crop is concerned we are over the fence."

The ten Minnesota Red river valley counties will husk the greatest corn crop ever raised in this section. Every variety is beyond all danger of frost.

"On such reliable authority as Henry O'Neil and J. N. Stephens and many other successful corn raisers, whose farms I have visited, it can be stated that there will be more seed corn raised in the counties from Clay and Becker north to Kittson and Roseau in any year in the history of this section. On the O'Neil farm I went in six different fields of corn and secured samples of Minnesota 13, Minnesota 23, Silvery King, Northwestern Dent and Smoky Dent, the last named brought from Illinois last year, and all well dented and practically ripe, far beyond any possible danger from frost.

"Minnesota 13, Northwestern Dent, Minnesota 23 and Silvery King were especially fine. The ears are filled to the very tips. At the farm crops show, which we held a year ago, the corn exhibit was a big feature, attracting attention of corn specialists and others throughout the country. This year it will be ten times as great and the prizes will be larger and comprise many more prizes.

RESULT OF WHEAT TESTS

Marquis Imported From Canada Leads on Demonstration Farm Plots.

Fergus Falls.—Several farmers in this locality had tracts of marquis wheat, the seed of which was imported from Canada, and the yield is invariably heavier than that of ordinary grain.

In order to make a test of its yielding qualities, the Fergus Falls high school demonstration farm sowed thrree plots of exactly the same size side by side, on April 30. All three were promising early in the season, but later became badly affected by rust, although the marquis suffered least, as it was earlier than the others.

The three tracts have been threshed, and the yield was as follows: Minnesota No. 163, a fife wheat, yielded 9 1-3 bushels to the acre; Minnesota No. 169, a bluestem, yielded 12 bushels to the acre, and marquis wheat 18 2-3 bushels to the acre.

The test was made under the direction of the state experiment station, and advance reports from similar experiments in other parts of the state indicate similar results.

Mankato.—James H. Austin, a dealer in ice cream and confectionery at Pipestone, has filed in bankruptcy in federal court in this city.

Wright County Band Association.

Annandale.—The brass bands of Annandale, Albion, Clearwater, Buffalo, Monticello, Howard Lake and Waverly, all of Wright county, have formed the Wright County Bands association. There are about 150 instruments. The same music is sent each band and a day is appointed for a meeting when the music is played by all in one monster band. The first meeting was held in Annandale on Aug. 25. The next will be in Buffalo, shortly and the third in Howard Lake Sept. 17 for the county fair.

BETTER SEED CORN IS AIM

College of Agriculture and Other State Organizations Boost Scheme—Week Sept. 14-19.

St. Paul.—The College of Agriculture is promoting a campaign for the selection of good seed corn this fall. Seed Corn Week, Sept. 14 to 19, has been set apart by a proclamation by the governor to impress upon the minds of farmers the desirability of getting in their seed corn before the usual time for killing frost.

The College of Agriculture is using ever possible agency to reach all of the farmers of the state with frequent reminders that the selection of seed corn early from the standing stalks in the field is a paying proposition.

The United States Department of Agriculture has shown that simply by selection of seed corn the yield can be increased an average of more than 12 bushels to the acre. For the five years from 1904 to 1908 the average yield of corn in Minnesota was 29.8 bushels and the succeeding five years it was 35.1 bushels. This grain has been, in a large measure, due to care and attention in the selection of seed corn. This is why the College of Agriculture is urging the observance of Seed Corn Week this year.

The newspapers, agricultural papers, churches and Sunday schools, bankers and business men of the state, farmers' clubs, school teachers and county superintendents, county agents, telephone companies, railroads, and other agencies are all cooperating. Such work should increase the annual output of corn in Minnesota from 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 bushels and will do better than that if persisted in for a few years.

Duluth.—"When is Indian country and why seek to protect 'Poor Lo' when he is not there to protect?"

The mayors of Hibbing, Chisholm and Bemidji, as well as other persons in Northern and North Central Minnesota, want these questions answered by the Department of the Interior.

Through Congressman Miller they have asked for a hearing on the question of the enforcement of the prohibition clause of the treaty of 1855.

A recent decision of the United States Supreme Court held that even if this is true, the prohibitory clause covering the entire district can be abrogated only by an act of Congress. Liquor interests have submitted a brief asking for a re-hearing.

The committee, originally consisting of five members, is to be enlarged to double that number, with representatives from all sections of the territory affected. The latter part of September or the first of October, it will go to Washington to meet the Secretary of the Interior, if a conference can be arranged.

The committee consists of Mayor Victor L. Power, Hibbing; Mayor Joseph Austin, Chisholm; E. E. McDonald, attorney, Bemidji; M. N. Koll, Cass Lake, and H. A. Brown, attorney, Crosby.

GAS EXPLODES, KILLING TWO

Others Narrowly Escape When Attempt Is Made to Save Companions.

Aurora.—In an explosion of gas in a well near the shaft of the Mohawk mine here, Frank Sckornzic, 40 years old, married, a miner, was killed instantly and Andrew Gercher, 32, single, also a miner, died in an effort to rescue the former. Joseph Sckornzic and James Sckornzic, brothers of one of the dead men, and Joseph Stebizh were saved by a pulmotor in the hospital after they had nearly forfeited their lives in an effort at rescue.

Sckornzic was in the well and Gercher was standing at the opening above when the explosion occurred. He called down, and, receiving no response, lowered himself into the opening and was asphyxiated by the fumes.

The two brothers of Sckornzic and Stebizh were quick to respond to the cries of Gercher for help. They were overcome and all five were pulled out by a crowd. Friends obtained a pulmotor from the mine, and after hard work revived three of them.

Brother Blows Head Off.

Killed in Auto Mishap.

Marshall.—Charles Snapp is dead and J. Liliquest probably fatally hurt as the result of an automobile accident Monday. They were returning from Ghent, seven miles west of here, in a car driven by Edward Keller, and turned out to pass a team driven by Henry Houseman, when the front wheel struck a bank of earth and collapsed. The front end fell upon Snapp and he died in a short time. Liliquist sustained a broken leg and internal injuries. Keller was badly bruised.

MINNESOTA GIRL SURVIVOR

Fergus Falls School Teacher Tells of Shipwreck Off Seattle a Few Days Ago.

Fergus Falls.—Miss Claire Buor of this city was a passenger on the Admiral Sampson, which was rammed by the Princess Victoria off Seattle several days ago, and went down with ten of the passengers and members of the crew. She was on her way to Alaska to teach school, and in a letter to her parents says:

"I went aboard at 10 o'clock and went to sleep shortly before 12, but soon awakened. I got up and looked out, but the fog was so dense nothing could be seen. Our foghorn kept blowing and, just before the accident, I heard several answering toots, but still nothing could be seen. I had just gotten back into my berth when the crash came.

"The whole boat quivered and a man rushed along and told us to get out. I slipped on my stocking and slippers, threw a coat over my nightgown, seized my watch and purse and started. When I reached the rail the water was already rushing over the lower deck. A ladder had been lowered from the Princess Victoria and everyone was scrambling for it. I saw there was no hope of reaching it and ran to the upper deck.

"There a man helped me put on a life-preserver. By this time I was standing in water. We climbed on top of the railing, and just as we swung away, the boat settled. I closed my eyes, when I saw a large section of it bearing down in my direction. For a moment I thought I would be crushed to death, but I escaped and was picked up by a lifeboat. Flames were bursting from the Princess Victoria, but we were taken aboard and the fire was soon put out. I was badly bruised, but otherwise am all right."

TO SEND FLOUR FOR POOR

Scandinavians Initiate Nation-Wide Movement to Aid European Sufferers.

Virginia.—Swedes and Norwegians of Virginia held a mass meeting for the purpose of initiating a nation-wide movement to raise funds among their countrymen and others to purchase a cargo of American flour for distribution among the poor of each European country.

Citizens who had recently returned from their fatherlands reported that factories and kindred industries were paralyzed for lack of raw materials and opportunity to export, and also because workers have been mobilized for defense. Families of such workmen and soldiers are in great need of foodstuffs.

The chairman appointed Henning Erickson as chairman of the Swedish committee and Harry Solberg of the Norwegian committee, who in turn will appoint members to solicit subscriptions locally.

It is expected that national societies and newspapers will assist in furthering the movement.

OLMSTED FAIR BIG SUCCESS

Rochester.—The Olmsted county fair opened Tuesday. The spacious fair grounds which three years ago were donated by Dr. C. Graham to the association were transformed into a tented city.

Many features added to the fair make it one of the biggest of its kind in this section of the state. Excellent racing and numerous free attractions the first day were featured by the graduation of 107 students of the rural schools of Olmsted county. W. E. Lee, republican candidate for governor, made the address.

Other features were a baby show in a health contest, which was promoted by the Civic league, and the model farmhouse which was built at a most of $3,500.

AUTO WRECK PURE ACCIDENT

Coroner So Holds After Investigating Killing of Two and Injuring of Three.

Minneapolis.—Following an investigation of an automobile accident near Bush lake in which Mrs. Robert Roberts and Raymond Speaker were killed and three others painfully bruised, Coroner Gilbert Seashore said he did not believe an inquest necessary. The wreck of the auto, which plunged into a swamp, he said, was purely accidental.

Robert Roberts, who was driving the car, his daughter, Hazel Roberts, and Gladys Speaker, sister of Raymond, were all painfully bruised.

Minnesota Mines Half Iron Ore.

St. Paul.—Minnesota is not only the greatest iron producing state in the Union, but it produces more iron ore than all the other states combined, according to figures announced at the office of the state auditor. The figures were taken from the official report of the United States geological survey. These figures, according to J. P. Funk, chief clerk of the land department of the auditor's office, show that Minnesota in 1913 produced 62.37 per cent of all the iron ore mined in the United States.

GOODYEAR TIRES AT ANTE-BELLUM PRICES

"We advanced Goodyear prices, as others did theirs, when the rubber panic came. Almost in a day crude rubber rose in New York from 55 cents per pound to much over a dollar.

"The New York supply was too small to consider. We cabled our London people to buy up the pick of the rubber there. By acting quickly and paying cash they obtained 1,500,000 pounds of the finest rubber.

"That big supply of rubber is now nearly all on the way to the Goodyear factory in Akron. It constitutes the best of the London supply.

"We are using the same grade of rubber and the same amount of it as we always have used in these tires.

"We are running our factory with three shifts of men, twenty-four hours a day. So long as we remain in this fortunate position on rubber, we shall supply tire users at before-war prices to the limit of our capacity."

PIMPLES ON HEAD ITCHED

Tell City, Ind.—"My baby's head was covered with sores and the top was a solid scab. It began with pimples and he would scratch his head until it would bleed and then scab over and keep spreading. He would claw his head and fret, it itched and burned so and I was afraid he would never have any hair on top of his head again.

"A friend recommended Cuticura Soap and Ointment to me. I asked our family doctor and he said, 'Yes, go right ahead and use them.' We got one cake of Cuticura Soap and one box of Cuticura Ointment and they healed him from the first. In a few days his head did not seem to itch or bother him in the least and before we had used one set he was healed and he has a fine growth of hair." (Signed) Mrs. Rosa M. Hanks, Jan. 26, 1914.

Too Dangerous to Overlook

Kidney trouble is too often overlooked and too often neglected. But the kidneys give early signals of distress that should not be mistaken. Backache, headaches, dizzy spells, rheumatic pains, too frequent, scanty or painful urination are all signs of kidney weakness and should not be mistaken.

When these warnings appear, use Doan's Kidney Pills, the reliable, successful, strongly recommended kidney remedy. Help the medicine by drinking water freely, hold to good habits and a serious attack of kidney disease may be avoided. Public testimony is the best proof of merit.

A Minnesota Case.

Mrs. Henry Zumach, Hutchinson, Minn., says: "Terrible, sharp pains caught me in my back and often it seemed as if my back was breaking. I got so dizzy I thought I would faint and was so weak I couldn't lift anything. Two specialists said I had a floating kidney. After using Doan's Kidney Pills, I soon got better and now I can do any kind of work without suffering from pain or swelling."

ROAST BEEF, MEDIUM

A Business Adventure of Emma McChesney

By EDNA FERBER

Copyright by Frederick A. Stokes Company

There is a journey compared to which the travels of Bunyan's hero were a summer evening's stroll. The Pilgrims by whom this forced march is taken belong to a maligned fraternity, and are known as traveling men. Sample case in hand, trunk key in pocket, cigar in mouth, brown derby atilt at an angle of ninety, each young and untried traveler starts on his journey down that road which leads through morasses of chicken a la Creole, over greasy mountains of queen fritters made doubly perilous by slippery glaciers of rum sauce, into formidable jungles of breaded veal chops threaded by sanguine and deadly streams of tomato gravy, past sluggish mires of dreadful things en casserole, over hills of corned beef hash, across shaking quagmires of veal glace, plunging into sloughs of slaw, until, haggard, weary, digestion shattered, complexion gone, he reaches the safe haven of roast beef, medium. Once there, he never again strays, although the pompadoured, white-aproned siren sing-songs in his ear the praises of Irish stew, and pork with apple sauce.

Emma McChesney was eating her solitary supper at the Berger house at Three Rivers, Mich. She had arrived at the roast beef haven many years before. She knew the digestive perils of a small town hotel dining room as a guide on the snow-covered mountain knows each treacherous pitfall and chasm. Ten years on the road had taught her to recognize the deadly snare that lurks in the seemingly calm bosom of minced chicken with cream sauce. Not for her the impenetrable mysteries of a hamburger and onions. It had been a struggle, brief but terrible, from which Emma McChesney had emerged triumphant, her complexion and figure saved.

Emma McChesney.

She had the last number of the Dry Goods Review propped up against the vinegar cruet, and the Worcestershire, and the salt shaker. Between conscientious, but disinterested mouthfuls of medium roast beef, she was reading the snappy ad set forth by her firm's bitterest competitors, the Strauss Sans-silk Skirt company. It was a good reading ad. Emma McChesney, who had forgotten more about petticoats than the average skirt salesman ever knew, presently allowed her luke-warm beef to grow cold and flabby as she read. Somewhere in her subconscious mind she realized that the lanky head waitress had placed some one opposite her at the table. Also, subconsciously, she heard him order liver and bacon, with onions. She told herself that as soon as she reached the bottom of the column she'd look up to see who the fool was. She never arrived at the column's end.

"I just hate to tear you away from that love lyric; but if I might trouble you for the vinegar—"

Emma groped for it back of her paper and shoved it across the table without looking up.

"—and the Worcester—"

One eye on the absorbing column, she passed the tall bottle. But at its removal her prop was gone. The Dry Goods Review was too weighty for the salt shaker alone.

"—and the salt. Thanks. Warm, isn't it?"

There was a double vertical frown between Emma McChesney's eyes as she glanced up over the top of her Dry Goods Review. The frown gave way to a half smile. The glance settled into a stare.

"But then, anybody would have stared. He expected it," she said, afterwards, in telling about it. "I've seen matinee idols, and tailors' supplies salesmen, and Julian Eltinge, but this boy had any male professional beauty I ever saw, looking as handsome and dashing as a bowl of cold oatmeal. And he knew it."

Now, in the ten years that she had been out representing T. A. Buck's featherloom petticoats, Emma McChesney had found it necessary to make a rule or two for herself. In the strict observance of one of these she had become past mistress in the fine art of congealing the warm advances of fresh and friendly salesmen of the opposite sex. But this case was different, she told herself. The man across the table was little more than a boy—an amazingly handsome, astonishingly impudent, cockily confident boy, who was staring with insolent approval at Emma McChesney's trim, shirt-waisted figure, and her fresh, attractive coloring, and her well-cared-for hair beneath the smart summer hat.

"It isn't in human nature to be as good looking as you are," spake Emma McChesney, suddenly, being a person who never trifled with half-way measures. "I'll bet you have bad teeth, or an impediment in your speech."

The gorgeous young man smiled. His teeth were perfect. "Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers," he announced, glibly. "Nothing missing there, is there?"

"Must be your morals then," retorted Emma McChesney. "My! My! And on the road! Why, the trail of bleeding hearts that you must leave all the way from Maine to California would probably make the Red sea turn white with envy."

The fresh young kid speared a piece of liver and looked soulfully up into the adoring eyes of the waitress who was hovering over him.

"Got any nice hot biscuits tonight, girlie?" he inquired.

"I'll get you some; sure," wildly promised his handmaiden, and disappeared kitchenward.

"Brand new to the road, aren't you?" observed Emma McChesney, cruelly.

"What makes you think—"

"Liver and bacon, hot biscuits, Worcestershire," elucidated she. "No old-timer would commit suicide that way. After you've been out for two or three years you'll stick to the Rock of Gibraltar—roast beef, medium. Oh, I get wild now then, and order eggs if the girl says she knows the hen that laid 'em, but plain roast beef, unchloroformed, is the one best bet. You can't go wrong if you stick to it."

The god-like young man leaned forward, forgetting to eat.

"You don't mean to tell me you're on the road!"

"Why not?" demanded Emma McChesney, briskly.

"Oh, fie, fie!" said the handsome youth, throwing her a languishing look. "Any woman as pretty as you are, and with those eyes, and that hair, and figure—Say, little one, what are you going to do tonight?"

Emma McChesney sugared her tea, and stirred it, slowly. Then she looked up. "Tonight, you fresh young kid, you!" she said calmly, "I'm going to dictate two letters, explaining why business was rotten last week, and why it's going to pick up next week, and then I'm going to keep an engagement with a nine-hour beauty sleep."

"Don't get sore at a fellow. You'd take pity on me if you knew how I have to work to kill an evening in one of these town pump burgs. Kill 'em! It can't be done. They die harder than the heroine in a ten, twenty, thirty. From supper to bedtime is twice as long as from breakfast to supper. Honest!"

But Emma McChesney looked inexorable, as women do just before they relent. Said she: "Oh, I don't know. By the time I get through trying to convince a bunch of customers that T. A. Buck's featherloom petticoat has every other skirt in the market looking like a piece of Fourth of July bunting that's been left out in the rain, I'm about ready to turn down the spread and leave a call for six-thirty."

"Be a good fellow," pleaded the unquenchable one. "Let's take in all the nickel shows, and then see if we can't drown our sorrow in—er—"

Emma McChesney slipped a coin under her plate, crumpled her napkin, folded her arms on the table, and regarded the boy across the way with what our best talent calls a long, level look. It was so long and so level that even the airiness of the buoyant youngster at whom it was directed began to lessen perceptibly, long before Emma began to talk.

"Tell me, young 'un, did any one ever refuse you anything? I thought not. I should think that when you realize what you've got to learn it would scare you to look ahead. I don't expect you to believe me when I tell you I never talk to fresh guys like you, but it's true. I don't know why I'm breaking my rule for you, unless it's because you're so unbelievably good looking that I'm anxious to know where the blemish is. The Lord don't make 'em perfect, you know. I'm going to get out those letters and then, if it's just the same to you, we'll take a walk. These nickel shows are getting on my nerves. It seems to me that if I have to look at one more western picture about a fool girl with her hair in a braid riding a show horse in the wilds of Clapham Junction and being rescued from a band of almost-Indians by the handsome, but despised eastern tenderfoot, or if I see one more of those historical pictures, with the women wearing costumes that are a cross between early Egyptian and late State street, I know I'll get hysterics and have to be carried shrieking up the aisle. Let's walk down Main street and look in the store windows, and up as far as the park and back."

"Great!" assented he. "Is there a park?"

"I don't know," replied Emma McChesney, "but there is. And for your own good I'm going to tell you a few things. There's more to this traveling game than just knocking down on expenses, talking to every pretty woman you meet, and learning to ask for fresh white bread heels at the Palmer house in Chicago. I'll meet you in the lobby at eight."

Emma McChesney talked steadily, and evenly, and generously, from eight until eight-thirty. She talked from the great storehouse of practical knowledge which she had accumulated in her ten years on the road. She told the handsome young cub many things for which he should have been undyingly thankful. But when they reached the park—the cool, dim, moon-silvered park, its benches dotted with glimpses of white showing close beside a blur of black, Emma McChesney stopped talking. Not only did she stop talking, but she ceased to think of the boy seated beside her on the bench.

A strong arm encircled her shoulders.

In the band-stand, under the arc light, in the center of the pretty little square, some neighborhood children were playing a noisy game, with many shrill cries, and much shouting and laughing. Suddenly, from one of the houses across the way, a woman's voice was heard, even above the clamor of the children.

And a boy's voice answered, as boys' voices have since Cain was a child playing in the Garden of Eden, and as boys' voices will as long as boys are:

The lanky head waitress had placed some one opposite her at the table.

"Aw, ma, I ain't a bit sleepy. We just begun a new game, an' I'm leader. Can't we just stay out a couple of minutes more?"

"Well, five minutes," agreed the voice. "But don't let me call you again."

Emma McChesney leaned back on the rustic bench and clasped her strong, white hands behind her head, and stared straight ahead into the soft darkness. And if it had been light you could have seen that the bitter lines showing faintly about her mouth were outweighed by the sweet and gracious light which was glowing in her eyes.

"Fred-dee!" came the voice of command again. "May-belle! This minute, now!"

One by one the flying little figures under the arc light melted away in the direction of the commanding voice and home and bed. And Emma McChesney forgot all about fresh young kids and featherloom peticoats and discounts and bills of lading and sample cases and grouchy buyers. After all, it had been her protecting maternal instinct which had been aroused by the boy at supper, although she had not known it then. She did not know it now, for that matter. She was busy remembering just such evenings in her own life—summer evenings, filled with the high, shrill laughter of children at play. She, too, had stood in the doorway, making a funnel of her hands, so that her clear call through the twilight might be heard above the cries of the boys and girls. She had known how loath the little feet had been to leave their play, and how they had lagged up the porch stairs, and into the house. Years, whose memory she had tried to keep behind her, now suddenly loomed before her in the dim quiet of the little flower-scented park.

"Honestly, kid," said the voice, "I could be crazy about you, if you'd let me."

The forgotten figure beside her woke into sudden life. A strong arm encircled her shoulders. A strong hand seized her own, which were clasped behind her head. Two warm, eager lips were pressed upon her lips, checking the little cry of surprise and wrath that rose in her throat.

Emma McChesney wrenched herself free with a violent jerk, and pushed him from her. She did not storm. She did not even rise. She sat very quietly, breathing fast. When she turned at last to look at the boy beside her it seemed that her white profile cut the darkness. The man shrank a little, and would have stammered something, but Emma McChesney checked him.

"You nasty, good-for-nothing, handsome young devil, you!" she said. "So you're married."

He sat up with a jerk. "How did you—what makes you think so?"

"That was a married kiss—a two-year-old married kiss, at least. No boy would get as excited as that about kissing an old stager like me. The chances are you're out of practice. I knew that if it wasn't teeth or impediment it must be morals. And it is."

She moved over on the bench until she was close beside him. "And, listen to me, boy." She leaned forward, impressively. "Are you listening?"

"Yes," answered the handsome young devil, sullenly.

"What I've got to say to you isn't so much for you sake, as for your wife's. I was married when I was eighteen, and stayed married eight years. I've had my divorce ten years, and my boy is seventeen years old. Figure it out. How old is Ann?"

"I don't believe it," he flashed back. "You're not a day over twenty-six—anyway, you don't look it. I—"

"Thanks," drawled Emma. "That's because you're never seen me in negligee. A woman's as old as she looks with her hair on the dresser and bed only a few minutes away. Do you know why I was decent to you in the first place? Because I was foolish enough to think that you reminded me of my own kid. Every fond mamma is gump enough to think that every Greek god she sees looks like her own boy, even if her own happens to squint and have two teeth missing—which mine hasn't, thank the Lord! He's the greatest young—Well, now, look here, young 'un. I'm going to return good for evil. Traveling men and geniuses should never marry. But as long as you've done it, you might as well start right. If you move from this spot till I get through with you, I'll yell police and murder. Are you ready?"

"I'm dead sorry, on the square, I am—"

"Ten minutes late," interrupted Emma McChesney. "I'm dishing up a sermon, hot, for one, and you've got to choke it down. Whenever I hear a traveling man howling about his lonesome evenings, and what a dog's life it is, and no way for a man to live, I always wonder what kind of a summer picnic he thinks it is for his wife. She's really a widow seven months in the year, without any of a widow's privileges. Did you ever stop to think what she's doing evenings? No, you didn't. Well, I'll tell you. She's sitting home, night after night, probably embroidering monograms on your shirt sleeves by way of diversion. And on Saturday night, which is the night when every married woman has the inalienable right to be taken out by her husband, she can listen to the woman in the flat upstairs getting ready to go to the theater. The fact that there's a ceiling between 'em doesn't prevent her from knowing just where they're going, and why he has worked himself into a rage over his white lawn tie, and whether they're taking a taxi or the car and who they're going to meet afterward at supper. Just by listening to them coming downstairs she can tell how much Mrs. Third Flat's silk stockings cost, and if she's wearing her new lavalliere or not. Or maybe you don't. There's so much you've missed."

"Nothing from the side-lines, please," she said. "After they've gone she can go to bed, or she can sit up, pretending to read, but really wondering if that squeaky sound coming from the direction of the kitchen is a loose screw in the storm door, or if it's some one trying to break into the flat. And she'd rather sit there, scared green, than go back through that long hall to find out. And when Tillie comes home with her young man at eleven o'clock, though she promised not to stay out later than ten, she rushes back to the kitchen and falls on her neck, she's so happy to see her. Oh, it's a gay life. You talk about the heroism of the early Pilgrim mothers! I'd like to know what they had on the average traveling man's wife."

"Bess goes to the matinee every Saturday," he began, in feeble defense.

"Matinee!" scoffed Emma McChesney. "Do you think any woman goes to matinee by preference? Nobody goes but girls of sixteen, and confirmed old maids without brothers, and traveling men's wives. Matinee! Say, would you ever hesitate to choose between an all-day train and a sleeper? It's the same idea. What a woman calls going to the theater is something very different. It means taking a nap in the afternoon, so her eyes will be bright at night, and then starting at about five o'clock to dress, and lay her husband's clean things out on the bed. She loves it. She even enjoys getting his bath towels ready, and putting his shaving things where he can lay his hands on 'em, and telling the girl to have dinner ready promptly at six-thirty. It means getting out her good dress that hangs in the closet with a cretonne bag covering it, and her black satin coat, and her hat with the paradise aigrettes that she bought with what she saved out of the housekeeping money. It means her best silk stockings, and her diamond sunburst that he's going to have made over into a lavalliere just as soon as business is better. She loves it all, and her cheeks get pinker and pinker, so that she really doesn't need the little dash of rouge that she puts on 'because everybody does it, don't you know?' She gets ready, all but her dress, and then she puts on a kimono and slips out to the kitchen to make the gravy for the chicken because the girl never can get it as smooth as he likes it. That's part of what she calls going to the theater, and having a husband. And if there are children—"

There came a little, inarticulate sound from the boy. But Emma's quick ear caught it.

"No? Well, then, we'll call that one black mark less for you. But if there are children—and for her sake I hope there will be—she's father and mother to them. She brings them up, single-handed, while he's on the road. And the worst she can do is to say to them, 'Just wait until your father gets home. He'll hear of this.' But shucks! When he comes home he can't whip the kids for what they did seven weeks before, and that they've forgotten all about, and for what he never saw, and can't imagine. Besides, he wants his comfort when he gets home. He says he wants a little rest and peace, and he's darned if he's going to run around evenings. Not much, he isn't! But he doesn't object to her making a special effort to cook all those little things that he's been longing for on the road. Oh, there'll be a seat in heaven for every traveling man's wife—though at that, I'll bet most of 'em will find themselves stuck behind a post."

"You're all right!" exclaimed Emma McChesney's listener, suddenly. "How a woman like you can waste her time on the road is more than I can see. And—I want to thank you. I'm not such a fool—"

"I haven't let you finish a sentence so far, and I'm not going to yet. Wait a minute. There's one more paragraph to this sermon. You remember what I told you about old stagers, and the roast beef diet? Well, that applies right through life. It's all very well to trifle with the little side dishes at first, but there comes a time when you've got to quit fooling with the minced chicken, and the imitation lamb chops of this world, and settle down to plain, everyday roast beef, medium. That other stuff may tickle your palate for a while, but sooner or later it will turn on you, and ruin your moral digestion. You stick to roast beef, medium. It may sound prosaic, and unimaginative and dry, but you'll find that it wears in the long run. You can take me over to the hotel now. I've lost an hour's sleep, but I don't consider it wasted. And you'll oblige me by putting the stopper on any conversation that may occur to you between here and the hotel. I've talked until I'm so low on words that I'll probably have to sell featherlooms in sign language tomorrow."

They walked to the very doors of the Berger house in silence. But at the foot of the stairs that led to the parlor floor he stopped, and looked into Emma McChesney's face. His own was rather white and tense.

"I haven't been so ashamed of myself since I was a kid."

"Look here," he said. "I've got to thank you. That sounds idiotic, but I guess you know what I mean. And I won't ask you to forgive a hound like me. I haven't been so ashamed of myself since I was a kid. Why, if you knew Bess—if you knew—"

"I guess I know Bess, all right. I used to be a Bess myself. Just because I'm a traveling man it doesn't follow that I've forgotten the Bess feeling. As far as that goes, I don't mind telling you that I've got neuralgia from sitting in that park with my feet in the damp grass. I can feel it in my back teeth, and by eleven o'clock it will be camping over my left eye, with its little brothers doing a war dance up the side of my face. And, boy, I'd give last week's commissions if there was some one to whom I had the right to say: 'Henry, will you get up and get me a hot-water bag for my neuralgia? It's something awful. And just open the left-hand lower drawer of the chiffonier and get out one of those gauze vests and then get me a safety pin from the tray on my dresser. I'm going to pin it around my head.'"

HOLDS ROUSSEAU IN HONOR

French Republic, Unlike America, Commemorates the Birthday of One of Its Chief Founders.

It is interesting to note that the French republic is not ungrateful to its founders. On every twenty-eighth day of June, the birthday of Jean Jacques Rousseau is commemorated in Paris and throughout France. Like Paine, the author of "The Social Contract" was hardly respectable, and he is known to Americans not as the friend—one might almost say the father—of liberty, but as the author of those "Confessions," in which he laid bare all his weaknesses, all his vices and all his petty sins, and gave to the world for the first and only time the spectacle of a man who dared to tell the whole truth about himself. But despite these revelations, France does not leave to its ultra radicals and social outcasts the task of perpetuating Rousseau's memory. The foremost statesmen of the republic have joined in the annual tribute of respect to Jean Jacques.

So France honors Rousseau. But of the 100,000,000 people who live under the flag of the American republic which Paine helped to found, only a few hundreds remember his birthday. A few gather in New Rochelle, perhaps a few others meet in Philadelphia and Boston—and for the rest, silence. Why? Because Paine neglected his finger nails—or so his enemies alleged—and because he was supposed to be an atheist—he who began his confession of faith, written in the shadow of death, with the statement: "I believe in one God."—Chicago Journal.

Its Kind.

"Did you see where somewhere lately a judge decided the validity of a marriage by a kiss?"

"Well, I suppose a marriage service like that ought to be ranked as merely lip service."

Chances.

"Does your husband ever gamble?"

"No," replied young Mrs. Torkins. "Sometimes I wish he would gamble a little instead of waiting for those sure things that somehow go wrong."

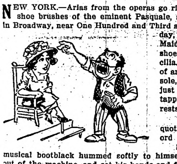
Bootblack Warbles Arias as He Polishes Shoes

NEW YORK.—Arias from the operas go rippling along to the stroke of the shoe brushes of the eminent Pasquale, artist, whose studio for shines is in Broadway, near One Hundred and Third street. He sang blithely the other day, as he invoked the Heavenly Maid. She had come in to have her shoes blacked. Her name was Cecilia. Pasquale knew in the twinkle of an eye that there was music in her sole, the moment that he saw that, just because she could not help it, she tapped a tango tune upon the footrests.



"Ah! and you lova da moosic," quoth Pasquale. "I turn on the record granda."

So while he plied the brushes the musical bootblack hummed softly to himself, while the Brulante simmered out of the machine, and set his hands and feet to hesitating as he toiled.

"You no understanda da woids?" asked he, "and I singa for you alone, Signorina; for your ears alone."

"Cut it out, Wop, cut it out," interjected the gentleman whose oil shine was soaking into the upper register. "Forget it."

But art claimed the voice of Pasquale. He brushed up his music. He sang the tenor from the quartet in "Rigoletto." He was in happiness supreme.

"And you aska me, Signorina," he said, "if I would not rather sing than maka the shoe shine? Ah, it is quite so. I maka the much hap. I sing like the bird."

CHICAGO.—Mike is a black and brown tortoise-colored alley cat with unusual ways. Among the modern and civilized things that Mike does is to take a swim in the bathtub each morning, act as a playfellow to the canary bird, and race with the swiftness of a Nancy Hanks after its owner to work up an appetite for breakfast.

H'AREYA OLD SPORT?
FINE

In the year's brief span of life neither a rat nor a mouse has crossed Mike's path. The alley cat has been so hopelessly lost in civilization that a rat could pass by unrecognized, without arousing the feline instinct for destructiveness.

Mrs. Pauline E. Willison of 128 East Grand avenue found Mike, nine days old, in an alley with many brothers and sisters. She brought Mike up on a bottle, she said.

"When a kitten I threw Mike into the bathtub for a swim," said Mrs. Willison. "Now I cannot leave a basin of water around, for Mike just loves to stand in a basin of water. In warm days the cat swims in the bathtub three times a day. At the bathing beach I tie a string around his neck to keep Mike from going too far out from the shore. Sitting under a hose is the cat's delight.

"Mike never has had any antipathy for Teddy, the canary, either. One of the cat's pastimes is to doze with one eye open while the canary hops about on a pillow or sings on the back of a chair. Sometimes the bird brushes Mike's seven-inch whiskers, but there is no disturbance between the two at all."

Finds Two Stout Hands Where One Was Claimed

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—"Dear Doctor—Before taking your water cure I had only one hand, my heart was weak and I was a victim of several other evils that flesh is heir to. Now I have both my hands and feel so well that I am taking light exercise every day."

He displayed this to passersby while he extended the other hand for alms.

"Help an old railroader," he whined. "My hand was cut off in a wreck."

"Let's see," said Detective Charles Welling, as he grasped Atkinson's arm and turned back the sleeve, disclosing a hand that a "White Hope" might be proud to own.

Atkinson was arrested and arraigned before Judge Fisher. He said he was forty-two years old.

"Why don't you work?" the judge asked.

"Because I am an orphan and have a weak heart," Atkinson replied.

Dr. Henry Steiple, police ambulance surgeon, was ordered to examine Atkinson. He did so, keeping him at arm's length.

"He doesn't need medicine," the doctor reported. "A good hot bath, with plenty of soap, will cure almost any ailment he is suffering from and will make his hand visible. That is not his hand we are looking at, but something on the outside of it. The real hand is underneath."

Now Policemen Will Take Their Meals at Home

DETROIT, MICH.—The Supreme court has ruled that fruit stands in Detriot must go. This is a severe blow to the proprietors of these deciduous and picturesque institutions. It is also a severe blow to invading excursionists, ferry boat patrons, newsboys and policemen.

Years ago, the street fruit stand was considered the policeman's chief friend and ally. Artists on the comic papers used to draw funny pictures of fat officers purloining fruit from the corner stands. That was considered part of the graft. It flourished in Detroit, until one day a policeman with an acute penchant for peanuts, got shot in the vest by a zealous Sicilian, who was trying to save money to bring his folks over from the old country. This sort of discouraged free and unlimited patronage of corner stands by those in authority and many policemen began taking their meals at home.

A year ago the board of health, the common council and the police department started a vigorous campaign against fruit stands and since then there has been a lot of legal work done about the matter. Some of the proprietors folded up their stands and quietly stole away, but a good many of them had a lot of fruit still on hand and decided to fight it out.

Justice Steere handed down a formal statement the other day and this seems to end all dispute. The judge minces no words. He not only calls a fruit stand a public nuisance, but he adds that it is a public offense.

KAISER'S DAUGHTER POPULAR

Duke Ernest August of Brunswick and his duchess, born Princess Victoria Louise of Prussia, were the chief topics of conversation throughout Germany just before the breaking out of the great war. In fact, the then possibility of war was lost sight of in the exhaustive discussions of the daily doings of the kaiser's only daughter and her husband; their comings and goings, their method of living and their plans for the future. Although the youngest of the sovereigns of the minor German states they have become the most interesting and prominent.

Duchess Victoria Louise is an untiring reformer, changer, meddler and molder. Immediately after she and her husband were installed as sovereigns of Brunswick the court and palace life, as conducted since 1907 by the Regent Duke Johann Albrecht of Mecklenburg—was radically changed in a direction opposite to local expectations. Brunswick awaited a reversion to the ceremonial court etiquette which flourished before 1884, when the last duke of Brunswick died. Venerable schloss butlers and maitres d'hotel, who remembered the duke, rejoiced at the impending revival of the famous Brunswick "dinner etiquette," the limit of old German tedium and solemnity. "Wait," was the refrain, "till the young duke comes into his own." Instead, the new sovereigns set to living in the simple way observed by Prussia's court on all except ceremonial occasions.

BRITAIN'S WAR SECRETARY

Many have been the attempts to interview Lord Kitchener. Among these the best story is that of the Yankee who handed his card to the general when he returned from South Africa, with the remark, "Sir, I represent that paper."

Another story comes from Aberdeen. Lord Kitchener was discovered one morning at Aberdeen station, having arrived there on his way to Balmoral by the night express. The youngest reporter of the evening paper was on the platform, and approached the great man, explaining that he represented a local journal. "Glad to meet you," said his lordship. "Now tell me, do you know Aberdeen well?" "Yes," said the youth, delighted to find his victim so complaisant. "Excellent," said Lord Kitchener. "Then you can tell me where I can find a good barber, one who really shaves well." "Oh, yes," replied the newspaper man, and he led his lordship to a barber shop. His lordship thanked him much, but the youth interposed with a request that he might state he had spoken to Lord Kitchener. He hoped for more of an interview.

"Certainly," responded the field marshal heartily, "and you can add that you are the most obliging and intelligent inhabitant of Aberdeen I have ever met!" The lad went back to his editor rather shamefacedly with his tale, but the expert was enthusiastic. "Write every word," he commanded, and himself supplied a string of headings, in which "Lord Kitchener in Aberdeen —Interview With Our Representative This Morning" were the least.

MRS. WILLIAM GRAVES SHARP

"I look forward with intense pleasure to the trip to France," said Mrs. Sharp, wife of William Graves Sharp, whom President Wilson recently appointed as ambassador to the French republic. "I personally deem the post at Paris to be the choice of the entire diplomatic list, because the interests and tastes of the country find great sympathy with those of myself and my husband. The artistic and scientific tendencies of my own nature will rejoice in the congenial surroundings that we shall find in France, and I can say that we are delighted with the prospect of the experience."

The wife of Myron Herrick's successor is cultured and progressive. She is abreast of the leaders in the march of intellect and the advance of learning. Her manner is frank and prepossessing. She speaks with precision. She organizes her thoughts and delivers them rapidly. In appearance she is matronly. Her hair is gray and she wears it in a soft, becoming style. Her eyes are dark and bright and her skin fair and rosy. She is dignified and distinctive in manner and carries herself with an admirable air of composure and poise. Her hobbies are painting and tree study.

JOAQUIN BERNARDO CALVO

© WALDON FAWCETT

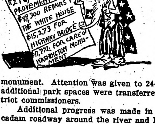
The retirement recently of Don Joaquin Bernardo Calvo as Costa Rican minister to the United States marked the culmination of one of the most remarkable careers in the annals of diplomacy. Senor Calvo was for 23 years the representative of Costa Rica in Washington and for many years dean of the diplomatic corps. He first presented credentials to President Harrison in 1891, and has survived six changes of administration in his own country.

Among his literary works is a history of Costa Rica. He is especially well known, however, for his advocacy of closer relations of the Americas by means of better understanding between the republics. He was active in the establishment of the Bureau of American Republics, since changed to the Pan-American Union; was a large factor in the Central American peace conference in Washington in 1907, at which the Central American court of justice was established at Cartago, Costa Rica, and has actively advocated the establishment of a trans-American railroad to link the continents, and expects to see its completion in the near future.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Nearly Half Million Dollars Spent on Grounds

WASHINGTON.—An expenditure of nearly half a million dollars in the improvement of public buildings and grounds in Washington during the last fiscal year is shown by the report of Col. W. W. Harts, engineer officer in charge, to Chief of Engineers Kingman.



$296,462—IMPROVEMENT OF PARKS
$89,300 REPAIRS TO THE WHITE HOUSE
$15,273 FOR HIGHWAY BRIDGE
$11,772 FOR CARE OF WASHINGTON MONUMENT

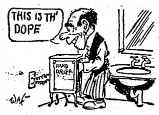
The largest expenditure during the year was $296,462 for the improvement and care of parks and the propagating gardens. A total of $89,300 was expended in repairs to the White House and improvement to the grounds. Other expenditures were $36,940 for the Barry monument; $15,273 for the care and maintenance of the Highway bridge; $11,772 for the maintenance of Washington monument. Attention was given to 244 parks and small reservations. Three additional park spaces were transferred to the chief of engineers by the District commissioners.

Additional progress was made in the construction of a bituminous macadam roadway around the river and harbor sides of the portion of Potomac park east of the railroad embankment. During the two years ended June 30, during which the road has been under construction, 8,320 linear feet of road has been built, leaving 9,240 linear feet yet to be constructed.

Summarizing some of the improvement work done during the year, Colonel Harts' report shows that 25,000 trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants were planted, 2,474 feet of water pipe and 731 feet of watermains laid, 15,000 feet of drain pipe laid, 786 square yards of cement footwalks and 565 square yards of concrete footwalks laid, 19,200 square yards of bituminous-bound macadam road built, 86,000 square yards of macadam roadway surfaced with coal tar, four new park lodges built, and 668,000 plants propagated at the propagating gardens, of which 581,000 were planted in the small parks and reservations.

Sanitary Drier Cheaper Than the Paper Towel

A NEW and sanitary device for drying the hands has been invented by J. M. Ward, superintendent of the District building at Washington, D. C. It has been placed in use in the large public lavatories in that building, where it has given successful as well as economical service.

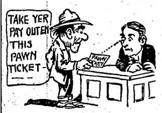


This electric hand-drier consists of a casing measuring 11 by 13 inches square and mounted on a sanitary base, having 12-inch legs. A powerful blower mounted in the casing distributes air through a heating element, thence through ducts and deflectors and finally to an opening in the top, where the hands are held to be dried. The warmed air is equally distributed to all parts of the hands at the same time and absolutely no movement of the hands is required. The device is operated by a foot pedal, pressure on which sets in operation a quick-acting switch by which the blower is started, the stoppage of the device being effected by releasing the foot pedal.

This hand-drier, known as the "air towel," is adapted for use in factories where large forces are employed, in public lavatories, surgical and dental operating rooms and the like where the public health is to be considered by using sanitary methods.

Sam Brown's Way of Paying His Lawyer's Fee

SENATOR HUGHES of New Jersey started his professional life in the town of Paterson. And one of the funniest incidents of his career happened soon after he had hung out his shingle. It seems that there was in the place a man whose lazy habits had given him a bad name, so that pretty much everything that went wrong was laid on this same Sam Brown. One day a wealthy man wearing a handsome diamond pin went into a saloon for refreshments; and as he leaned over the counter he noticed that Sam was standing very close. On leaving the place he at once missed the pin and had Sam arrested.



TAKE YER PAY OUTEN THIS PAWN TICKET
PAWN TICKET

Sam retained Hughes as his attorney. Protesting his innocence, Sam so wrought on Hughes' feeling that the latter went to the complainant and assured the man that Sam was entirely innocent of the theft. But the man was obdurate.

When Hughes returned to Sam with the man's statements, explaining how convincing were the facts against him, Sam with tears in his eyes again swore that he had never seen the pin and wept at Hughes' having ever doubted his innocence.

The trial came off at the set time. Hughes plead the cause of Sam with such sincerity that the client was released as "not guilty." And Hughes patted himself on the back for his knightly deed.

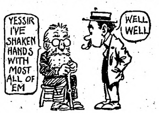
"I haven't got any money to pay you, Mr. Hughes," he said, as he threw a bit of pasteboard on the table, "but take your pay out of that—it's the pawnticket for the pin."

He Has Shaken the Hands of Many Presidents

E. D. DRANE, eighty-six years of age, is one of the oldest of Washington's living residents. He says that he has shaken hands with every president of the United States since the inauguration of Martin Van Buren, in 1838, save one, and that exception is President Hayes. He says that of all the presidents he has known that he liked Grover Cleveland best. Millard Fillmore was his next favorite and Mr. Roosevelt the third. Mr. Drane is now living at the John Dixon Home for Old Men. He says that when he first knew Washington, in 1838, it was nothing more than a mud hole, that it was almost impossible for vehicles to make headway through the streets and stepping stones had to be put down for pedestrians. The John Dixon home, where he lives, has 31 resident members, all past sixty-five years of age. The membership in the home is qualified for by age of sixty-five years, five years resident in the District and of good moral character. It must be known that a man entering the home has no other home. It was endowed by Henry Dixon, who raised it as a memorial for his father, John Dixon.



YESSIR I'VE SHAKEN HANDS WITH MOST ALL OF 'EM
WELL WELL

At the home lives David Dainty, the only known living survivor who lived through "the charge of the 600" at the battle of Balaklava. He is one of the "youngsters," he says—only eighty-four years old. He bears the scars of the famous battle of the Crimean war, and he still tells the story of his experiences when Lord Cardigan, with his gallant charge, "rode into the valley of death" against the Russian forces.

GREAT GENERAL VICTORY CLAIMED BY ALLIES ARMY

INVASION OF FRANCE IS BELIEVED TO HAVE FAILED

Kaiser Reported to Be Making Supreme Effort at Verdun to Defeat Enemy and Retain Advantages Gained—Many Cities Retaken by French and English.

Paris, Sept. 15.—"The allies have won a great general victory. The Germans have been routed everywhere."

May Mean Invasion Failed.

This official communique from the French war office at Bordeaux, which heretofore has been coldly conservative even to the point of advising that the public avoid becoming oversanguine, was accepted generally in Paris as the official announcement that the German invasion of France had failed.

Rout Is Confirmed.

This is the second week of the German retreat. Every official communication tends to confirm the utter rout of the invaders.

Reports from the front told of the evacuation by the Germans of Amiens in the department of Somme and their withdrawal from Pont-a-Mousson, 20 miles north of Nancy, which they had already quit.

Germans Abandon Plan.

This important center on the Moselle river in the department of Ceurthe-et-Moselle, lies between Nancy and Metz. Its evacuation by the Germans indicates the possible abandonment of the reported German plan to maintain this line of communication for supplies with Metz and Thionville, of Diebenhofen as basis. Nomeny, ten miles east of Pont-a-Mousson, also was evacuated.

The troops evacuating Amiens have fallen back towards the east between Soissons and Rheims. The latter place has been reported abandoned by the Germans, but no official confirmation has been received. If it is true, as reported, that the allies have already occupied Rheims, inestimable damage will have resulted to the Germans.

Escape Cutting Off.

The evacuation of Vitry and Sermaize by the fourth German army evidently was for the purpose of preventing being cut off and forcing this body to join in the general "helter-skelter" retreat of the first, second and third armies further to the German right.

The news of the great victory of the French troops was received by Paris with the same dignified calm as had greeted the adverse reports during the French retreat from Belgian frontier at the beginning of the operations.

Praise for Joffre.

All military experts are now freer in the expression of their views. They unanimously praise General Joffre for the magnificently prepared plan which has landed the German troops in the most unfavorable country, exhausted from their superhuman effort of the last six weeks.

The invaders' retreat across the Oise, the Aisne, Champagne and Argonne and in Lorraine, it is predicted, will be disastrous as these regions possess few roads and are otherwise impassable for a retreating army, it is foreseen that the Germans will be obliged to divide their forces into three columns and march back in this order as best they can.

Allies Take Artillery.

Already much of their heavy artillery and equipment has been taken and is in the hands of the allies, who are well fed, fresh, and are pursuing the enemy day and night, giving him no time to rest or sleep.

On the French left the allies have forced the already retreating Germans back to a line 62 miles to the rear of the position they occupied a week ago, when the German invasion reached its high water mark.

Prisoners captured in small squads and in larger sections, invariably betrayed utter exhaustion.

Apparent Aim of Kaiser.

Experts here believe the kaiser has rearranged his campaign settlement to a better series of furious attacks on the right wing at and below Verdun. This is the last chance Germany has of maintaining its broken armies in France. If the kaiser's plan is successful and the great fortress of Verdun is reduced, it will have the immediate result of lessening the pressure of the French right and will deflect the French center, which naturally will be called to its support.

Austrians Are Crushed.

Petrograd, Sept. 15.—The Austrian army on the eastern frontier has been utterly demoralized by the overwhelming defeats administered by the Russians who have captured to date 120,000 Austrians, including 800 officers.

Germany has withdrawn her support from her ally because of her reverses in France. The Germans are again moving their troops from the east to the west.

With these successes already chronicled there now somes a report that two of the Austrian armies are surrounded and their surrender is imminent. Already from these armies 60,000 more prisoners have been taken, including 1,100 officers.

Many Captures Reported.

Of the captures included in the general total the first Austrian army under General Von Auffenberg constituted 300 officers, 28,000 soldiers and 400 guns, while the second Austrian army of 70,000 men and 600 officers were captured.

It is interesting to note that this flood of Russian successes comes during the festival in honor of the memory of Saint Alexander Nevsky, the Russian warrior who first conquered the Germans.

Invading Austrians Imperiled.

The Austrian army invading south Poland has been completely defeated by the Russians as a result of the fighting about Lemberg and its retreat is imperiled by the capture of Tomaszow by the Russians.

As soon as these operations are completed, it is reported, a huge Russian army will take up its march on Germany, according to General Sukhomlinoff, the Russian minister of war.

More Germans in East.

Petrograd, Sept. 14.—German troops brought to east Prussia from the west have concentrated on the Alle. They have begun to advance and large columns have crossed the line of the Mazurian lakes. The Russian advance guard, while delaying the German advance has retired eastward.

Reports Are Conflicting.

London, Sept. 14.—Matters are getting a little more interesting in East Prussia, where for a while Russia is said to have had things virtually her own way. The Germans are reported now to have moved some of their best troops into this section of the theater of the war and the Russians are said to have been compelled to withdraw.

Petrograd says its only retirements have been by its advance guards, who are keeping in touch with the German advance, but the Germans claim to have scored another victory over the Russians, who are said to have received a rather severe check between Aug. 25 and 27.

It is possible the Austrians have kept the Russians busy in Galicia just long enough to enable Germany to get her troops into East Prussia before the Russians were able to dispose of the Austrians and sweep down on Silesia, Posen and Prussia.

Cracow Has Fallen.

Petrograd, Sept. 12.—Cracow, the strongest Austrian post in Galicia, and one which obstructed the advance of the huge Russian center army upon Breslau, its next objective, is reported to have fallen before the furious attack of Russian cavalry and infantry under cover of the disastrous fire of the heavy siege guns.

The forts to the east and north of the city were shelled incessantly until finally the Austrian guns were silenced and the city was occupied by the Russian troops.

Only Obstacle to Breslau.

Cracow is the capital of Austrian Poland and lies on a broad plain on the left bank of the Vistula. It is only 30 miles from the German border and between it and Breslau little fortified resistance is offered.

With Przemyl and Jaroslav invested by the Russians and the way for the advance toward Breslau practically cleared, the investment of the latter city, which is only 190 miles from Berlin, is imminent.

Germans Get Reinforcements.

London.—German reinforcements estimated at 60,000 men are advancing into France in three columns, according to an Ostend dispatch to the Reuter Telegraph company.

Message of George V.

In England where the saying is, "Britain is only just starting," the greatest enthusiasm has been created by the king's message to India, the dominions and the colonies, in which he thanks his over-seas subjects for the promptitude with which they responded to the call from the mother country.

India alone is sending 70,000 troops. Besides this India is to pay the cost of transporting her troops to Europe and the Indian princes are sending fabulous gifts to the war funds being raised in their own country and England.

WAR SEEN IN BRIEF.

Optimists and official French reports declare that the German invasion of France has failed, that the kaiser's armies have been routed all along the line except near Verdun. The allies are following close upon the heels of the retreating Teutons, reoccupying much evacuated territory, capturing quantities of abandoned munitions of war and taking hundreds of prisoners.

* * *

Military experts declare that the kaiser in directing furious attacks against the Verdun fortresses, is doing so in a last desperate effort to maintain his large armies in France. Should this stronghold be crumpled it is figured the French would have to send assistance to their right wing and thus relieve the vigorous pressure now being exerted in the center against the retiring Germans.

A report received by way of Flushing declares that an Anglo-Belgian force numbering 75,000 has reoccupied Brussels, capital of Belgium.

The allies are said to have followed the retreating Germans so closely that the latter's line of communications have been cut. The only alternative now left the kaiser's troops, it is declared, is to retreat through the valley of the Meuse.

The Russians claim to have overwhelmingly defeated the Austrian army on the eastern frontier.. One hundred and twenty thousand Austrians, including 800 officers, have been taken prisoners, says a Petrograd dispatch.

ENGLISH HAVE HIGH HOPES

ALLIES EXPECTED TO COMPLETE ROUTE OF TEUTONS.

No Peace Talk in London—Only Demands That Will Be Made of Kaiser Are Discussed.

London, Sept. 14.—The past week's splendid achievements in France, accompanied by the Russian progress in the eastern theater of the war has aroused great joy and high hopes of the ability of the allies to roll the Prussians back to Germany this week. The elation is made keener because success came almost unexpectedly.

Sunday in all the churches prayers were offered giving thanks for the recent success, and asking for future progress. London does not talk of peace and the rumors from America of some suggestion by Ambassador Von Bernstroff arouse little comment, but as time passes it becomes apparent that there are certain things which Germany must pay if the allies win.

One thing is an enormous indemnity to Belgium. Conversation with high officials here indicate this stands foremost in England's mind at the present moment. Alsace-Lorraine must be returned and it is expected France will also demand the return of the indemnity of 1870. Still another payment if many people have their way, will be the dismantlement of the German fleet.

There is no mistaking that the intention of the allies with England leading is once for all to destroy Prussianism in all its pernicious forms, making it impossible for the kaiser ever to disturb the world's peace again.

One of the most interesting phases of the situation is Prussia's future. In the event of the allies' victory Russia would become the most powerful nation potentially in all the world. Some observers fear her power, but others believe that with Slavism united and the nation emerging from a victorious war, Russia will become liberalized. Russia has already officially promised Polish reforms and liberty and shows every tendency toward fairer treatment of the Jews, many of whom have been given commissions in the army. Thus for the first time in Russian history Jews command Russian soldiers.

14,000 DEFENDERS FELL DURING DEADLY ATTACK

Ostend, Belgium (via London), Sept. 10.—The remnant of the Namur garrison has arrived here, bringing a story which explains to some extent why a stronghold believed so nearly impregnable fell.

Of 26,000 men in the forts in the environs of Namur, 12,000 have returned to Belgian soil, making the Belgian loss at Namur in killed wounded and missing, 14,000.

MAUBEUGE HAS FALLEN TO GERMANS; 40,000 PRISONERS

Berlin, Sept. 11.—(By wireless to the Associated Press by way of Sayville, Long Island.)—Official announcement was made at army headquarters that the French fortress of Maubeuge, on the Sambre river, had fallen.

The Germans took 40,000 prisoners, including four generals. Four hundred guns also were captured.

DIPLOMATS OF U. S. SEEKING EXCHANGE OF PEACE TERMS

WILSON AND BRYAN ALERT FOR SLIGHTEST OPENING

Pointed Out That Willingness of Germany to Arbitrate Might Influence the Allies, Though They Seek Decisive Victory, as Reported.

Washington, Sept. 15.—The knowledge that Emperor William has been considering for several days a message from the United States government inquiring, in effect, if Germany was desirous of discussing peace measures, has set official and diplomatic Washington on the alert for a possible exchange of peace terms between the belligerents.

Seek Kaiser's Attitude.

It had not been a matter of general knowledge that beginning with the dinner in New York a week ago, attended by Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador, and Oscar Straus, American member of The Hague Peace Tribunal, an informal movement has been under way to learn Germany's attitude toward peace.

Diplomatists and officials discussed among themselves the details of the seven days of peace parleying and there was a noticeable absence of the indifference with which talk of peace was regarded several days ago. This was due, it was believed, largely to the apparent turn in the tide of battle in France and the feeling among diplomatists of the allied powers that the German troops soon would be forced back to the borders of France and Belgium.

Might Change Aspect.

Notwithstanding the vigorously phrased statements throughout the news channels last week that Great Britain, France and Russia would not make peace until they had decisively defeated Germany, it was admitted in many quarters here that a favorable answer from Emperor William to the American government's inquiry might change the entire aspect of the situation.

U. S. Officials on Alert.

One thing has become apparent to close observers of the situation—President Wilson and Secretary Bryan are keenly alert for the slightest opening in the diplomatic situation abroad which might encourage them to press the powers for an acceptance of mediation.

It is considered likely now that the president may not wait for the powers to take the initiative and that if an indication arises from an apparently authoritative quarter of a willingness on the part of the belligerents to discuss peace terms, the American government will be quick to take advantage of the opening.

Peace Must Be Permanent.

Both Great Britain and France have stated unequivocally to the American government that they were always willing to talk peace but must know definite terms declaring with emphasis their belief that the peace of Europe obtained through the present war must be permanent and not temporary truce.

The allied powers have informed the American government that owing to Germany's disregard for the treaty which guaranteed the neutrality of Belgium, they would be inclined to doubt the value of effectiveness of whatever treaty of peace might now be signed unless German militarism were totally crushed.

German Soldiers Slept Soundly.

Paris, Sept. 12.—During the third day's fighting in the battle on the Marne a detachment of the French, which had chased the enemy out of a village, was hailed by an old woman, who led them to a barn where there were still 30 Germans, telling them to make no noise as they were asleep. A man crept noiselessly into the barn and found the Germans sleeping so soundly that it took half an hour and a tremendous shaking to wake them. One explained that he had not slept for three days.

German Cruiser Sighted.

Mobile, Ala., Sept. 12.—Captain A. G. Dribbel of the torpedo boat Sommers, which arrived here, reported that en route two days out of Key West he saw the German cruiser Dresden being coaled by merchantmen off Pensacola and so advised the navy department.

Art Treasures in Armor.

Paris, by mail to New York, Sept. 12.—Unique among the protective and defensive measures which Paris has adopted are those by which the city hopes to save some of her most famous art treasures. The Louvre has been completely done over. Great steel plates have been fixed about the ceilings and walls of a room which now shelters the famous Venus de Milo, the "Winged Victory" and La Gioconda. The famous Grecian room, containing priceless statutes by Phidias, is filled with sacks of earth.

AND THEN IT HAD TO RAIN

Simple but Apparently Satisfying Cause for the Postponement of Arranged Marriage.

"So you were not married last June, after all?"

"No."

"But I thought it was all arranged—"

"It was."

"And that all your parents and your parents' parents, and your friends and enemies had agreed to it—"

"They had."

"And that the day was set and the trousseau bought and the invitations issued, the officiating clergyman engaged, and all that—"

"Yes, all that."

"And that, above all, you loved each other!"

"Oh, yes, we loved each other. There was no doubt about that."

"Well, then, why in the world didn't you get married?"

Well, the reason was that it rained." Wasn't it too bad?"

SKIN TROUBLE ON HANDS

Cassville, Mo.—"My hands and feet were affected with a trouble similar to ringworm for a number of years. It first appeared as tiny clear blisters and in places the blisters were so close together that they almost formed one large blister. The skin was rough and cracked open. At times it was so bad that it disabled me; my hands became so sore that I could scarcely use them.

"I used every remedy that I could find but nothing seemed to do any good. Finally I sent for a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and I then got a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment which completely rid me of the trouble." (Signed) Ray Bryant, Mar. 14, 1914.

Cow Followed Compass.

A poor tiller of the soil had owned for a number of years a valuable cow. Of a sudden he began to find that the beast always stood in her stall with her tail toward the south where the manger was, her head toward the north. He tried various means of making the cow stand the other way, her head to the south and her tail to the north, but no matter how many times he set her properly in her stall she always turned around. Finally there was nothing to do but rebuild the stall to suit the cow. Somewhat later war came and the poor tiller of the soil had to join his regiment and go and fight for the fatherland. His wife and children, reduced to dire poverty, were forced to sell the cow to the butcher, who slaughtered her and sold her meat at famine prices to his fellow townsmen. At the same time, however, the mystery of the animal's unaccountable behavior was cleared up. In the body of the cow was found a small compass which the poor man, her owner, had lost some months before from his watch chain. Evidently it had fallen among the hay and been eaten.

Brusque Sympathy.

"Your daughter told me to come and ask your consent to our marriage!" said the nervous young man.

"She did!" responded Mr. Cumrox. "And you came hustling right along, although you knew you'd probably find me in a bad humor. And you knew also that so long as Gladys and her ma had made up their minds, my consent or refusal wouldn't make a particle of difference. Young man, you're being put through your family discipline too early!"

LEARNING THINGS

We Are All in the Apprentice Class.

When a simple change of diet brings back health and happiness the story is briefly told. A lady of Springfield, Ill., says:

"After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I received a shock four years ago that left me in such a condition that my life was despaired of.

"I got no relief from doctors nor from the numberless heart and nerve remedies I tried, because I didn't know that coffee was daily putting me back more than the doctors could put me ahead.

"Finally at the suggestion of a friend I left off coffee and began the use of Postum, and against my expectations I gradually improved in health until for the past 6 or 8 months I have been entirely free from nervousness and those terrible sinking, weakening spells of heart trouble.

"My troubles all came from the use of coffee which I had drunk from childhood and yet they disappeared when I quit coffee and took up the use of Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Many people marvel at the effects of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, but there is nothing marvelous about it—only common sense.

Postum comes in two forms:

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

LOVING CUP GIVEN TO ROSEAU FOR FIRST PLACE THIS YEAR.

TROPHY CARRIES BIG HONOR

Many Districts Compete and a Great Many Counties Scored More than the 800 Points Required to Win $150 or More.

Hamline.—Roseau county won the $250 silver loving cup offered to the county in the northern zone, whose exhibit at the State Fair obtained the first award three or five successive years. Roseau has won three straight and is entitled to the permanent possession of the trophy.

Renville in Southern.

Renville county won in the southern section. There were nine in the competition. Houston and Scott were tied for second place.

In the central section 11 counties competed, and Washington repeated its victory of last year. Morrison and Wright followed, with Todd as fourth.

Fifteen counties competed in the northern section, the biggest representation this part of the state ever has had. Beltrami was Roseau's nearest rival, and seven others succeeded in getting into the 900 class.

Houston Wins Beauty Prize.

Houston county received an extra prize of $40 in the beauty contest. Washington and Douglas counties received $30 and $20 each for second and third places in the beauty competition.

Under the rules of the contest, each county that scores 800 points or more receives $150. Additional prizes were given in each section.

OFFERED $2,000 FOR ROOM

Fergus Falls.—Two thousand dollars premium and the fare he had paid for his stateroom was the offer made to James A. Brown of this city, who, with Mrs. Brown, has just returned from Switzerland, where they spent the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Brown went to Europe on the Olympic and engaged passage for the return at the time they crossed. When the war broke out they managed to make their way across France by the liberal use of the "universal language"—generous tips—but suffered many delays and much inconvenience. They had almost no rest and in seven days and nights took off their shoes only once.

They arrived in England just in time to catch the Olmypic. The pressure to get aboard was terrific. Many wealthy people, finding themselves unable to secure passage, or forced to go with their families to the steerage, were offering almost any sums for staterooms and tickets. Mr. Brown had one offer of $2,000 direct, but he refused to consider it.

Janesville People in Germany.

Janesville.—Two Janesville residents, Mrs. Michael Zell and daughter, Miss Fredie, the wife and daughter of a wealthy retired farmer living in this town, are in the war zone. They left here early in the summer for a visit with relatives in Germany and are southeast of Berlin. They have not been heard from since the opening of the war. Mr. Zell displays no anxiety over their protracted stay or the absence of communications from them as he regards them as safe in Germany as in America.

GIRL TELLS EXCITING TALE

Fosston Teacher Was in Europe and Heard Crash of Artillery—Her Experiences.

Bemidji.—With the crash of cannon still ringing in her ears, Miss Ida Hendrickson, sister of Mrs. Alma Smith of this city, brings an eye witness story of the beginning of hostilities in Europe.

Miss Hendrickson, who is now a teacher in the Fosston public schools, was in Heidelberg when war was declared and was at the Vatican on the day that Pope Pius died. At the outbreak of the war her party made its way to Berne, Switzerland, in the vicinity of which she heard the crack of guns in an engagement between German and French troops.

Miss Hendrickson's escape from Europe finally was made from Naples on the Italian ship Verona, with 1,140 persons crowded on board.

"Italy must join the war," said Miss Hendrickson. "The king might wish to live up to the triple alliance and help Germany, but everywhere in Italy the mobs howl against Austria and Germany and when Italy does take up arms, it will be with the allies.

"We were on the Rhine, with our headquarters at Heidelberg, on the day the war was declared and I know from actual experience and from talking with other American tourists, that the reports that Americans suffered indignities at the hands of the Germans are entirely untrue.

"My heart and sympathy is with Germany, because we were treated with loving kindness by the Germans, who were uniform in their hospitality and sincere in their desire for peace.

"At Naples it was difficult to obtain passage because Italy expects to take part in the war and does not like to let vessels get away. Our party managed to arrange for passage on the Italian liner, Verona. One American paid the captain $700 to be permitted to occupy his quarters coming over. Fifty Americans, mostly American school teachers, were glad to be stowed away in the steerage.

"At Gibraltar we were halted by British torpedo boats. British soldiers came aboard and satisfied themselves that we all were bound for America and that no Germans or contraband of war were on board.",

IMPROVEMENTS FOR CARLTON

College Buys a Farm and Will Furnish Employment to Students "Working Their Way."

Northfield.—Carleton college begins the school year with an enrollment of about 425, or approximately the same number registering last year. Several important improvements have been made. Laird athletic field has been enlarged. An additional piece of ground has been acquired and will be used for a baseball diamond and new tennis courts. A new grand stand will be erected.

Another important addition to the college equipment is the purchase of a college farm. The large farm adjoins the campus and will be conducted by the institution and provide students with employment.

Miss Jessie M. Short, dean of women, will be absent this year, and Professor Mary L. Benton, a graduate of the University of Minnesota, will serve in her place, and also teach Latin. Dr. Franz Exner has returned to take up his work as head of the department of chemistry.

Several new members have been added to the faculty. Dr. Frances Allen Foster, a graduate of Bryn Mawr, will act as instructor in English and Henry H. Carter will be assistant professor in the same department. Wyman R. Green, a graduate of the University of Kansas, will instruct in the department of biology.

SCOTCH CONFIDENT IN WAR

Fergus Falls.—John Barclay has just returned from a trip to his old home in Scotland. He said the people there are not excited over the war, but are ready to support the government to the extent of everything they possess, being absolutely confident of winning in the end.

The Scotch expect to see the war continue for a long time, possibly for years, and believe that Great Britain's control of the sea, together with Russia's inexhaustable supply of land forces, will eventually result in the overthrow of Germany.

"Business in England and Scotland is being carried on as usual," said Mr. Barclay. "Most of the factories have orders enough to run full time, and would be able to do so if they could ship goods freely to foreign countries."

Bemidji Court in Session.

Bemidji.—The September term of district court opened here with Judge C. W. Stanton presiding. Of the few criminal cases, the most interesting is that of Frank Warner, who has been in jail since last winter when the Bemidji lumber mill was burned. Warner, at the time of his arrest, said he was ready to enter a plea of guilty, but was not permitted to do so. The grand jury is hearing evidence in the case. There are 58 civil cases, but as many of them will be continued, the term is expected to be light.

LAST TWO TO DRINK COGNAC

Survivors of Company C, Eighth Minnesota Have Novel Provision Before All Pass.

Stillwater.—Nine of the eleven survivors of Company C, Eighth Minnesota Last Two Men's club, sat around a gaily decorated banquet table to commemorate the tenth annual reunion of the organization. On the table was a bottle of French cognac which has graced each reunion and which will not be opened until all but two members have died.

Each year the membership grows smaller and smaller. The chair where Oscar Van Kuster of Hudson sat at former reunions was draped in black. Frank Johnson and Martin Pauley were unable to attend this year.

Those in attendance were President and Mrs. William Giossi, Secretary and Mrs. William Gallagher, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Voligney, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Giossi, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Secrest, Mr. and Mrs. John Booren, Mr. and Mrs. John Blake, John Goodrich, Bergman Gagne, Mrs. David Carmichael, Mrs. W. S.tipSaes and Mrs. Clark Carey. The club's officers were reelected.

BALL OF FIRE FROM SKY

Explosion Startles People at New York Mills—Very Strange Phenomenon.

New York Mills.—Out of a starlit and apparently cloudless sky a volley of fire came forth as though a bomb had been dropped from a stray European aeroplane. A terrific explosion followed with the sound of a thousand thunder bolts. The phenomenon occurred at 2 o'clock, in the morning when nearly every one in the village was asleep. The crash aroused and terrorize the entire village.

A number of young folks returning from a party, saw the meteor-like object and declared it looked like a huge ball of fire and when the explosion came it resembled a large spider web. The bolt exploded in the H. C. Hanson lawn where many trees were damaged and numerous holes were found where it had gone into the ground. Some thought it was a bolt of lightning, but those who saw the phenomenon say there was not a flash of lightning nor any thunder, only a crash.

HAMMOND ANNOUNCES STAND

Would Follow Wish of Legislature on County Option—For a "Business Administration."

St. Paul.—Firm in the belief that victory for their standard bearer is certain this fall, nearly 200 leading representatives of the state Democracy gathered in St. Paul at a dollar luncheon. The feature was a letter from Congressman Hammond, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate who is now at Washington.

Mr. Hammond's position on county option, the initiative and referendum and other issues were indorsed, and his promise if elected to give the state a business administration and to do all in his power to reduce the burden of taxation was greeted with much cheering.

As to county option, the candidate promised to act in accordance with the wish of the legislature.

VETS CARE NOT FOR WEATHER

Despite Cold and Rain Many Gather and Recount Experiences—Had Enjoyable Time.

Minneapolis.—The rain and cold Thursday may have deterred the younger generation from attending the State Fair, but it had no such effect on the Pioneers and Old Soldiers, who have been used to braving worse things than a fall drizzle during the course of their eventful careers.

The day having been especially dedicated to the men who settled Minnesota and to those who fought for the Union in the sixties, they believed it to be their duty to reciprocate, rain or shine, and they began to gather early at Pioneers' cabin, where Secretary George H. Hazzard of the Territorial association had provided a roaring open fire in the old-fashioned grate.

The survivors of the early days of the state recounted their experiences of half a century ago, renewed old friendships and had a thoroughly enjoyable time despite the weather.

Lake Geneva Gets New Hotel.

Alexandria.—The Geneva beach lake resort hotel destroyed by fire two years ago will be rebuilt by J. L. and H. L. Dickinson of Minneapolis. The contract for the new hotel, to be known as Dickinson's Inn, has been let to S. H. Marshall. The hotel is to be completed by June 1 of next year. The site for the hotel is on Lake Geneva, east of this city.

Transients Apply Torch.

East Grand Forks.—Transients, refused money by Thomas White, manager of a local messenger service sought revenge by applying the torch to his place of business, in the opinion of local police. The effort, however failed, the fire being discovered before it had gained much headway. The fire endangered the DeMers avenue bridge across the Red river, a structure worth $50,000, as well as about $250,000 worth of buildings adjoining the east end of the bridge.

WAR TAX BILL IS COMPLETED

OPPOSITION TO MEASURE PROVES UNSUCCESSFUL.

Bill to Be Called Up Tuesday—Efforts to Eliminate Freight Transportation Is Utterly Disregarded.

Washington, Sept. 14.—Disregarding opposition from some of their colleagues to the proposed tax on freight transportation, Democrats of the ways and means committee completed the war revenue bill without vital changes. The bill will be called up in the house on Tuesday for debate when a special rule to expedite its passage probably will be presented.

Efforts were made to exempt from the freight tax farm products en route to market, but the proposal was rejected on the ground that it would kill the effect of the tax entirely and open it to amendments of all sorts. Administration leaders thought it unlikely the bill would be amended in the house.

"No one wants this bill," said Mr. Underwood. "We don't want any kind of a tax, but we can't help it. We did not want the war in Europe. It is a condition we are dealing with. We will push the bill through as rapidly as possible."

Administration features were added to the bill, providing for a penalty of double the tax on persons who seek to evade and authorizing the secretary of the treasury and commissioner of internal revenue to fix rules and regulations.

Representative Rucker of Missouri introduced a bill to increase the income tax rate one-half per cent, and to reduce the exemption to $2,000 and $3,000, as had been originally provided by the ways and means committee in the revenue bill, but withdrawn at the request of the president.

In further effort to relieve the financial situation the finance committee of the senate continued its readjustment of the rivers and harbors appropriations, planning to reduce it from $53,000,000 to $31,000,000.

FOR EMERGENCY CURRENCY

Washington, Sept. 14.—The emergency currency bill, amending the Vreeland-Aldrich act, so as to make 75 instead of 30 per cent the amount of commercial paper to be accepted from banks as security for emergency currency, passed the senate without a roll call and now goes to the house.

The senate added several amendments to the bill. One amendment adopted by a vote of 32 to 19 provides for the issue of emergency currency through state banks and trust companies to insure wider distribution for the relief extended. Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, proposed the amendment, which was generally supported by southern senators who declare that only by issuing emergency currency to the state banks could the needed circulation be brought to the small farmer and small merchant. They asserted the national banks could not or would not loan emergency currency at reasonable rates to the small producer who most needed it.

Peace Moves of Pope.

Paris, Sept. 14.—A dispatch to the Havas agency from Rome says the Tribuna states that the appeal of Pope Benedict for peace is preliminary to an encyclical to the bishops on the same subjects and to an initiative already in the course of execution, with the different governments asking for a cessation of hostilities and for the opening of an arbitration congress. The Tribuna adds that the apostolic delegate to Washington has been charged with a private mission to President Wilson on the subject of arbitration.

Open Dykes; Save Antwerp.

Antwerp, Sept. 14.—King Albert has gone to the front to direct the Belgian troops, who are assuming the offensive all along the line. The Germans have been compelled to abandon all of their efforts to besiege this city. The opening of the dykes and the flooding of the lowlands was a complete surprise to the Germans. They fled, abandoning their artillery, which was completely mired. At many points the gunners slashed the traces of their horses and used them to escape. Many were drowned.

River Bill Cut $18,500,000.

Washington, Sept. 14.—Republican opposition to the river and harbor bills coupled with the falling customs revenue because of the European war, had the effect of inducing democratic leaders to strike out $18,500,000 of the $52,000,000 originally proposed. It is not yet satisfactory, however, to the republicans. All reductions were made proportionately. Mississippi river appropriation was cut from $8,000,000 to $6,000,000.

Russian-German Sea Fight.

Copenhagen, Sept. 15.—Danish newspapers state that a naval battle has been in progress between German and Russian squadrons off the Aland Islands in the Baltic.

Pope Seeks to End War.

Rome, Sept. 11.—As a prelude to a definite program which the Vatican is about to begin in the interests of peace between the allies and Austria and Germany, Pope Benedict has dispatched notes to the ambassadors of all warring nations to ascertain the sentiments of their respective governments relative to a plan for a papal appeal for peace. It is confidently believed here that Austria's reply will be favorable to Pope Benedict's program, to avoid a complete breaking up of the empire.

WILSON ASKS ALL TO PRAY

President Woodrow Wilson signed the following proclamation calling for a national day of prayer on Oct. 4 to pray for cessation of war in Europe.

"Whereas, great nations of the world have taken up arms against one another and war now draws millions of men into battle whom the counsel of statesmen have not been able to save from the terrible sacrifice;

"And whereas, in this as in all things, it is our privilege and duty to seek counsel and succor of Almighty God, humbling ourselves before Him, confessing our weakness and our lack of any wisdom equal to these things;

"And whereas, it is the especial wish and longing of the people of the United States, in prayer and counsel and all friendliness, to serve the cause of peace;

"Therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, president of the United States of America, do designate Sunday, the fourth day of October, next, a day of prayer and supplication, and do request all God-fearing persons to repair on that day to their places of worship there to unite their petitions to Almighty God that overruling the counsel of men, setting straight the things they cannot govern or alter, taking pity on the nations now in the throes of conflict, in His mercy and goodness showing a way where men can see none, He vouchsafe His children healing peace again and restore once more that concord among men and nations, without which there can be neither happiness nor true friendship nor any wholesome fruit of toil or thought in the world; praying also to this end that He forgive us our sins, or ignorance of His holy will, our wilfulness and many errors, and lead us in the paths of obedience to places of vision and to thoughts and counsels that purge and make wise."

U.S. MAKING PEACE TREATIES

FOUR NATIONS AGREE TO SIGN PACT—OTHERS WILL FOLLOW.

Will Prevent This Country Being Drawn Suddenly Into Conflict—Bryan Has Negotiated 26.

Washington, Sept. 12.—In the midst of the European war, Great Britain, France, Spain and China have agreed to sign peace commission treaties with the United States. One effect of the new conventions will be to prevent the United States from being drawn suddenly into the conflict.

Germany, Russia and Japan have signified their acceptance of the principle of these treaties, though negotiations have not advanced to the point of drafting conventions. Similar agreements with Turkey and Greece are almost ready for signing.

The first four treaties are ready for signature and are regarded by President Wilson and Secretary Bryan as of far-reaching importance. While negotiations were begun before the European war broke out, their consummation practically will safeguard the United States from being drawn in over any question of neutrality or other controversy.

With the signing of treaties with Great Britain, France, Spain and China the number of pacts of this kind negotiated by Secretary Bryan and known as "investigation treaties," will number 26. Nineteen already have been ratified by the senate, comprising the principal countries of Central and South America, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland, Portugal, Italy and The Netherlands. Secretary Bryan hopes to have 30 treaties ratified by Christmas, which he believes will assure the peace of the United States with the entire world.

The treaties with Great Britain, France, Spain and China provide "that all disputes of every nature whatsoever, to the settlement of which previous arbitration treaties or agreements do not apply in their terms, or are not applied in fact, shall, when diplomatic methods of adjustment have failed, be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission and they agree not to declare war or begin hostilities during such investigation and before the report is submitted."

The treaties specify that the report of the commission shall be completed within one year after it shall declare its investigation to have begun.

200,000 Soldiers Across Canada.

Toronto, Sept. 12.—Ninety trainloads of Sikh and Ghoorkha soldiers, numbering 200,000, the flower of the native East Indian army of Great Britain, have been passing through Toronto and North Bay, bound for France. A portion of this army, which is merely the vanguard of further troops from India, sailed from Quebec on the Megantic on Saturday, Aug. 29, and landed in Liverpool last Sunday morning. The remainder proceeded across the Atlantic on special transports.

Germans Evacuate Brussels.

London, Sept. 14.—A dispatch to the London Star, dated at Folkenston, says: "On the arival here of the boat from Flushing passengers stated that a rumor was current at Flushing that Brussels had been reoccupied by an Anglo-Belgian army of 75,000 men. The Germans had already evacuated the capital."

U. S. May Join Protest.

Washington, Sept. 14.—The United States probably will join the protest of the powers against Turkey's abrogation of the capitulations, which granted foreigners extra-territorial rights and otherwise restricted the sovereignty of the Ottoman empire. This was predicted by administration officials, although a definite course of action has not finally been decided upon by President Wilson and Secretary Bryan. The dispositoin of the Washington government was to await the initiative of the European followers.

Work Weakens the Kidneys

Many occupations weaken the kidneys, causing aching backs, urinary disorders and a dull, drowsy, discouraged feeling. Work exposing one to chills, dampness or sudden changes; work in cramped positions; work amid the fumes of turpentine; constant riding on jolting vehicles, is especially hard on the kidneys.

Taken in time kidney trouble isn't hard to stop; neglected it is dangerous. As a kidney tonic, there is no other medicine so well recommended, so widely used and so universally successful as Doan's Kidney Pills.

A Minnesota Case.

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

K. T. Otos, Chautauqua Grounds, Willmar, Minn., says: "For several years my kidneys were disordered. Mornings my back ached terribly and felt as though it was broken. I couldn't turn over in bed, my back was so weak and lame. I had awful dizzy spells, too. When I was told about Doan's Kidney Pills, I used them and they restored me to good health. I have never had a sign of kidney trouble since."

This is an extract from a letter just received from a little southern town: "The post office has been moved, and the boxes have been changed to open with combination locks. This morning, when I was in town, I saw the jeweler trying to file his way into his box—and on Sunday they found Cousin May's old negro, Uncle Zeb, down on his knees on the floor before the combination, hat off, and hands clasped in prayer.

"He was murmuring, 'O Gawd, he'p me ter think! O Gawd, he'p me ter think.'"

I Want Some U. S. Cartridges

U. S. Cartridges have won more Government tests than all other makes combined. World's Championship Rifle Teams habitually use U. S. Cartridges.

The U. S. Primer is different. Instead of being a mechanical mixture of fulminate of mercury and ground glass, the U. S. Primer is a strictly chemical mixture that combines uniformly and makes a uniform explosion—one cartridge acting just like the others—quick, regular and with an unvarying accuracy of bullet flight.

A non-mercuric primer means a hotter primer flame because it contains no heat-absorbing ground glass. A hotter primer flame means quicker powder ignition and more driving power. The U. S. Primer sends no glass to grind the rifling of your gun, and contains no mercury to make the cartridge cases brittle.

All Government-made cartridges are required to have this type of primer.

U. S. Cartridges will improve your marksmanship, at least to the extent of hitting where you aim.

Pettit's Eye Salve QUICK RELIEF EYE TROUBLES

BY W. G. HUNT.

Conceding the nomination at the primaries of his apponent, and pledging to him and to the entire state Republican ticket, his unqualified support for the coming campaign, Henry Rines, of Mora, editor of the Kanabec County Times, has abandoned his recount for the state auditorship, and Jacob A. O. Preus becomes, thereby, the duly accredited nominee of the party for the office.

In dishing up a brown toast to the Bemidji Pioneer because the the Pioneer is not supporting the editor of the Sentinel for State Senator from that district, the Sentinel says: "This is the same dear old jealous Pioneer that jawed away at Representative O'Neil during the crises of the Normal School Bill." Well Mr. Sentinel the Pioneer had certainly no jaw coming against O'Neil on the location of that Normal School, but the poor betrayed people of Pennington County are the ones that have a jaw coming and they will use it on November 3rd, and don't you forget it.

If there is a printing bill, or a proposition to do county printing submitted to the board, A. H. Fasel is always ready to holler "graft." But did you ever hear of him saying anything about a bill that was presented to the county board by the Northern Culvert Company for ditch culverts? But we will have something to say a little later on about how these culverts have been shoved on to the ditch tax payers and scattered promiscuously over the country. You can look in almost any direction up this way and see ditch culverts lying around, that have no place to be put in, and some poor ditch tax paying farmer has got to pay for them. Has anyone ever heard of advertisements for bids for furnishing these culverts? Oh, no The Northern Culvert Company puts them in at just the price they see fit to charge, and the tax payers have to foot the bill, not only for what culverts they need, but a lot of extras to lay around the country, and to be used for well curbs.

President Wilson has designated Sunday October 4th, as a day of prayer for peace in Europe. This is very well and shows that our president is a man of peace, who has faith in a divine Providence. But we fear his efforts will be in vain so far as Europe is concerned. There would be one way to establish lasting peace in those war torn countries, and that would be, if we had the power to do it, to pick about two hundred of the war leaders of all those countries, including the kings, czars and Kaiser Wilhelm, then put them into a pen about two miles square, furnish them with all the latest machinery of warfare, machine guns, the best and latest improved artillary, monoplanes, mines and "jack plains." Then tell them to go to it and fight it out, and we will guarantee that old Kaiser Wilhelm will promptly send word to the other fellows that he was only joking and had no use for any more territory, and the other fellows would send back word that they had concluded to let him have a little more land if he wanted it. But there was no use fighting about it, and the dove of peace would promptly settle over Europe, But as long as those monarchs have the power to send the poor common people up to face the grape and canister, while they keep their precious carcases at a safe disiance, the war will continue and they will tell what great things our army is accomplishing.

No reccommendations of a governor will make a man pledged to support county option vote against it, nor one pledged to oppose vote for it. The voice of the people is mightier than the voice of a governor—when they speak legislators must listen, and the governor as well, and both bow to sovereign authority.

W. S. Hammond.

If candidate W. E. Lee had said the above, every mud slinging sheet in the state would have been out with flaming head lines saying that Lee was trying to side step county option, yet the above statement by Mr. Hammond is absolutely correct, and if a majority of the legislature is for county option, we will have county option.

The Australian Blacks.

It is believed by many persons that the blacks in Australia are dying out. As a matter of fact, says a correspondent of the London Standard, no such thing is happening. The belief, however, is easily explained. As civilization advances, and it is yearly advancing, the blacks recede farther and farther into the back blocks and unknown country, save a few who have acquired the craving for opium or drink. These latter succumb amid the advancing wave of civilization and seldom leave any children. Those who have passed inland, if they do not increase, have certainly not decreased. In some few cases whole tribes have died out when civilization has reached them, but these have usually been small tribes.

W. E. LEE DEFINES CAMPAIGN ISSUES

PLEDGES A BUSINESS MAN'S ADMINISTRATION OF EFFICIENCY WITHOUT EXTRAVAGANCE.

TO URGE COUNTY OPTION BILL

Candidate Would Banish Brewery Control and Declares For Broad Policy of State Development.

Marshall, Minn., September 14th.—Wm. E. Lee, Republican candidate for Governor delivered his key-note speech in this city tonight. More than two thousand enthusiastic followers of the candidate packed the local auditorium to the last seat and hundreds remained standing that they might hear Mr. Lee discuss the issues of the campaign and define the principles upon which he stood.

The address was along constructive lines and every sentence a part of a story that told of a better governed, a more opulent and a more progressive Minnesota. Mr. Lee came out squarely and unequivocally for the passage of a county option bill and the end of brewery control in the state. In promising a business administration the candidate endorsed the work of the efficiency commission, declaring that parsimony was undesirable and that extravagance must end. Mr. Lee pledged himself to work for a lower tax rate; home rule of public utilities; conservation of the State's natural resources, good roads and small town development. He praised the State's school system, declared for free and open markets and the rigid enforcement of the State's law. Mr. Lee said:

In this, my opening speech in this campaign, I can say little that is new. The issues are clear and definite, and my position upon them is well known. The issues enunciated by me nearly three years ago are the issues today, and will be the issues upon which the result of this campaign must be determined.

There are numerous matters of importance which need attention, but which of themselves will make but small advance unless settled in conjunction with other and greater problems. Three momentous questions are demanding solution. They are:

(1) The reorganization of the administrative departments of the state government along modern business lines so as to secure efficiency without extravagance.

(2) Securing to the people their inherent right to determine the laws under which they prefer to live, and providing the machinery to enable them to do so.

(3) Protecting the people and the law making body from the demoralizing effect of the "brewery in politics," to the end that men and measures may be considered upon their merits.

Endorses Efficiency Commission.

My declaration in 1912 that Minnesota had a complicated and antiquated governmental organization and that there was imperative need of a complete overhauling and reorganization of the administrative machinery of the state government, at first discredited, was developed to a point where public opinion demanded some action; and as a result, a Commission was created which has taken up the whole question of reorganization. Its preliminary report shows beyond any question that my contention was right and the alarm was sounded none too soon.

The high personnel of this Commission commands respect for its work. They have been and are working diligently on the problem, and will prepare bills providing for a complete reorganization of the administrative departments of our state government, which bills will be among the most important measures to come before the next legislature. In its preliminary report the Commission recommends a consolidation and unification of the now unrelated boards and administrative offices under responsible departments that will be related to each other and can efficiently and economically carry on the business affairs of our state. The budget and an effective civil service system are also included. All this is in accord with what I have advocated for years, and I shall urge its adoption by the legislature.

Business Administration Needed.

What the condition of Minnesota needs and the people of the state demand, is reforms without frills and government without red tape—just a plain business organization such as you will find in any successful private undertaking. I will ask no man to work harder nor longer hours than I do myself, but I will guarantee there will be no one on the payroll who is not earning his salary.

One of the sources that has contributed to the pernicious system of legislative trading and log-rolling is the multitude of lobbyists who swarm about the state capitol during every session of the legislature. It will be my purpose to put forth every effort to assist the legislature of ridding itself of this incumbrance.

Parsimony Undesirable.

Economy must come chiefly by careful consideration of appropriaton requests, and I shall urge the legislature that the general appropriation bills be reported out of the committee early in the session, so that they may stand on "general orders" long enough to enable the public, as well as every member of the legislature, to become familiar with all their provisions. Parsimony is undesirable, but extravagance must be stopped.

Standing appropriations are the cause of much extravagance. I believe in annual appropriations and fully concur in the recent action of the legislature in discontinuing many standing appropriations. I shall recommend that such elimination be extended. I need not repeat what I have often said about the unwarranted increase in state taxes; all are familiar with the fact. There must be no further increase, and a substantial reduction should be made.

Believes in County Option.

I believe in county option and I believe that a majority of the people of Minnesota believe it to be the next logical step in dealing with the saloon question. This question has been before several legislatures and has been thoroughly discussed by the people of the state. It ought to be disposed of without further delay to enable the legislature to spend its time on other important questions, and I shall urge upon the legislature the importance of enacting a county option law at the earliest possible date of the session. I shall also call the attention of the legislature to the need of a law to prevent the sale of beer or liquor by breweries or wholesale liquor dealers to any but regularly licensed retailers, thus doing away with "blind pigs" and other illicit places whose existence depends upon the illegal sale of liquor. In connection I urge upon the people the necessity of electing to the legislature men who will stand firmly with me in carrying out this program.

Will Urge Law.

It is said that county option is purely a legislative question. In a sense it is—so are all these questions before the people. But a governor or even a candidate for governor has large influence which he can exercise affirmatively or negatively. Silence is negative. For years I have urged the passage of a county option measure and I shall continue to do so until it becomes a law.

Topping all other issues in importance and far reaching consequences is the question of "forcing the brewery out of politics." It is a question of whether this collosus shall longer be permitted to dictate the environment of your wives and mothers, your sons and daughters; dictate your candidates and officers, your legislation, your taxes, and even your right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If I become governor I pledge you that the breweries will be out of politics so far as that part of the government I control is concerned, and I shall exert my utmost strength to kill its influence in every other department.

Would End Brewery Power.

No force has been more persistent than has been the brewery organization in its opposition to me. If a candidate ever earned the support of the friends of clean and efficient government because of the character of the enemies he has made, I am that candidate. The voter who is tired of brewery domination and brewery-made legislation and feels that his duty lies in casting his ballot against this enemy of good government will have no trouble in locating its candidates.

These then, are the issues. They were developed out of my experience of years as a public official, and added years of examination and study of the problems of government, not only in Minnesota, but in many other states and countries.

The success of any program must of necessity depend upon the character, qualifications and affiliations of the men elected to carry that program into action.

The people of Minnesota are about to employ a general manager to look after their public business, and institute certain reforms. If I were applying to any private business establishment for the position of manager I would recite in detail the opportunities I had had to qualify myself for the position. I therefore think it proper that I should refer to the experience I have had in the management of pubic business and make you acquainted with my qualifications to fill the position I am asking you to give me.

I have lived in Minnesota fifty-seven years. Aside from carrying on my private business of merchandising, manufacturing, and banking, which has met with a fair measure of success, I have filled the following public positions: I was Register of Deeds of Todd County for four years. I have served three terms in the legislature, one term as Speaker of the House of Representatives, which enabled me to acquire some knowledge of legislative procedure. I served a term on the State Normal School Board, and through that service became somewhat acquainted with the educational system of the state. I served as Superintendent of the Minnesota State Reformatory, and became acquainted with the management of state institutions; I served six years on the State Fair Board, which enabled me to become better acquainted with the products and the possibilities of our state. I was called by Governor Van Sant to assist in the organization of the first Board of Control, and through that work became acquainted with the administrative department of the state. The system inaugurated by the Board at that time has proved so satisfactory that it has never been changed in any particular.

I invite the closest scrutiny of my qualifications and my record, and comparison with that of other candidates, and I now pledge to the people of Minnesota whatever of ability, experience, and equipment I may possess to the faithful discharge of the public duties incident to the office to which I am now asking them to elect me.

"Tomorrow at dawn," said the practical mother of Charles. "What you would gain in time you would lose in strength. You must conserve your energies. Now we will have supper, and afterward we will discuss our plans."

I had stopped to purchase a map before returning, and after the meal we opened it and pored over it. My first course, on the morrow, we estimated, would pass through Troyes and end at Dijon, where I should replenish my gasoline tank and stay over night. Sunday would see me through Lyon and along the Rhone to Avignon. Thence, on the Monday, I should strike east over the Basses-Alpes and the Alpes Maritimes to Monaco; and on the Tuesday there would be the perilous sea flight of two hundred odd miles to Corsica, and along the coast for fifty miles to Scouto. At best, I could reach Scouto by Tuesday evening; and this would leave me but a single day of four and twenty hours in which to persuade Zeuxis to return with me.

That night I went out to the shed in which the monoplane rested and looked at her. For one moment, as I gazed, a terrible fear overcame me. Next moment something of the brave spirit of the machine entered into my heart and inspired me with its own power. There she floated, as it almost seemed, so strong and yet so graceful, with her enormous spread of wings outstretched beneath the roof of the hangar. I took my seat, and at once the memory of her control came back to me. I placed my hands upon the levers, and to each slightest touch the mechanism responded. I tested the motor; it worked admirably. After I was satisfied I descended and bade the ancient servant fill the tank with gasoline. There was nothing to do now until the morning.

A letter had come for me from Canada, having been forwarded from London. I glanced at the superscription without enthusiasm and tore open the envelope. It was from Mary Jenner, and dated from Winnipeg three weeks before. The weather had been stifling, she wrote, but, thank heaven, the school term was ended. A party of the teachers was going to Europe, including herself and Mr. Spratt, whom she characterized as an "odious little persecutor." Mary intimated that he had transferred his volatile affections from myself to her, and that she detested him. She hoped that I had met my kinsmen and had gone to visit them at the chateau, and hoped to see me soon—perhaps sooner than I expected, were the words she used.

But Mary Jenner, with whom I had cooked so many midnight suppers in our tiny apartment, and sworn undying friendship, was the least of my thoughts just now.

CHAPTER IX.

The Flight to Corsica.

To fly from Paris to an island off the coast of Corsica, there search for an unwilling witness, and bring him home with me within ten days, was not an adventure that could be regarded lightly. It is small wonder, then, that my sleep on that eventful Friday night was a troubled one. In the brief intervals of unconsciousness that I enjoyed I seemed to be perpetually riding through the air, like a witch on a broomstick, while behind me thundered legions of the damned, shrieking in the zest of the chase. And one demon, with the head and leering features of Leopold Magniff, headed me off, forced me out of my course, while below I saw Charles writhing in bonds, crying to me appealingly—and always helplessly. When I awoke for the last time toward dawn it was to find Charles' mother standing beside me in her dressing robe.

"It is time to prepare for your journey, dear," she whispered.

I dressed hastily and joined her and the old Comte below. None of us had much appetite for breakfast. It was an eerie sensation, sitting there in the first rays of the rising sun, in the perfect stillness of a Normandy morning, knowing that the lives of Charles and our grandfather and the future of our historic house hung upon so slender and desperate a chance as that which I was to undertake.

After breakfast we went out to the hangar. The faithful old servant, assisted by the valet, had wheeled the great monoplane out upon the dewy lawn. Charles' mother had prepared a small package containing some food in case of emergency, and I had a handbag with a few of the essentials of a journey. These were stowed away behind the seat. The tank was already filled with gasoline and the motor, when tested, responded admirably. All was in readiness.

My grandfather and Charles' mother embraced me quietly; the undertaking was too serious a one for the display of any surface emotion. I kissed them, and entering the machine took my seat. I looked back. The old chateau, gray and ghostly in the early morning, seemed replete with history, and every single window was, in my imagination, filled with the forms of earlier owners; great lords and fair ladies who had played each his or her part in the history of Clichy and left the scene. Something of the sense of this continuity made my surroundings singularly unreal. The Comte and Charles' mother seemed now hardly more than phantoms upon a ghostly stage in a mysterious setting. But such fancies were morbid. I turned my face resolutely away and started the motor. I felt the wheels revolve and take the soft sod under me; there was a moment of swift gliding, and the ground shot from beneath me.

I pressed the lever that controlled the rudder and flew upward. Now I was cool and calm as though this were the flight of an experienced aeronaut. I was, in thought, again flying with Charles in the English aviation meeting. Right and left the monoplane turned at my insistence, skimming the soft airs lightly as a swallow. I rose above the tops of the old elms and circled the grounds. Once, twice I made this course, and then, rising to two hundred feet, shot straight as a bee eastward toward Paris.

Towns and villages unrolled themselves beneath me as I sped over the fair panorama of northern France. I kept an altitude of about four hundred feet; in this manner I was enabled to travel by the bright ribbons of the railway line, clearly perceptible below me, and, at the same time, to escape any too intimate contact with the denizens of the district; for above all things I wished to avoid awakening curiosity as to my identity and destination. Several times a railroad train, unrolling like a caterpillar out of the ground, swept past me; twice, too, I outraced trains Paris bound. The machine seemed like a sentient thing. I no longer wondered that we had beaten all our competitors in London, for we seemed so to harmonize that we were no longer twain; I was an aerial centaur, and this mechanism of steel and aluminum was part of me.

After an hour and a half a dark blur beginning to spread over the horizon told me that I was approaching Paris. I had resolved not to fly over the capital lest some too adventurous newspaper should send out its aeroplane correspondent in search of me. One thing I longed for greatly—a newspaper, that I might learn how Charles fared, what was the latest news of the trial, and whether the flight that I was to make had yet become public knowledge. But I overcame my longing and, wheeling in a southeasterly direction, mounted to an altitude of a thousand feet and shot over the green tracery of the Bois, which from that height appeared exactly like a field of corn in tassel, set on an indistinguishable brown background. At this height, though it was July, the air was crisp and keen, the wind sang past my ears, every sense tingled with exuberance. I must save Charles! Now it was impossible no longer; no longer dangerous even. I flashed over the poplar-lined roads of the environs, and, gradually descending to a height of four hundred feet again, made my way along the highway in the direction of Troyes, where I descended at noon in a large field to lunch and to inspect my motor.

Everything was satisfactory. I stepped out, a little cramped, and, lying upon a bank of softest turf, snatched a few morsels of bread and cheese, washing them down with a draft of clearest spring water from a rill near by. The sight of the great bird had already aroused the interest of the neighborhood, and I knew that my sojourn must be a brief one. In fact, hardly had I rinsed my hands after my meal when the advance guard of the rustic population came running up in the shape of a farmer's boy, who, seeing me, threw up his hands in dumfounded amazement, stuttering:

"It's a woman! Holy Virgin, a woman!"

Seeing that a little group was moving over the brow of the hill, and not wishing to communicate anything of my purpose or identity, I entered the machine again and started the motor. As the wheels revolved they shouted and ran forward threateningly, their first impulse, after fear, being hate—a phenomenon common everywhere among the unintelligent. For a moment I feared that the long grass would hold my flight; then, just as the first came panting up, the monoplane rose, almost sweeping him from his feet with a whir of its mighty wings. I heard cries of anger beneath me. I looked down and waved my hand. What were these boors to me when Charles' honor and liberty were at stake! Charles! The wind sang his name through the steel stays, the motor hummed it. I was high in air once more, sweeping along the great, white, dusty road toward Dijon.

The sun sank lower, the air grew keener yet; clouds rolling up gave promise of a storm. I planned to pass the town and rest at some wayside village after dusk, leaving my aeroplane in charge of some friendly farmer sufficiently removed from the center of news to prevent the disclosure of my identity. All these plans I carried out well. Night saw me some leagues in advance of Dijon, and resting in a field recently mown, surrounded by gaping but not malignant rustics. A liberal sum sealed the mountains of their perpetual questioning, and by the promise of further reward in the morning I induced my host to drive into the town and bring me back a fresh supply of gasoline, without arousing curiosity. Then I supped, and, turning into a bed of softest down, slept like a log till daybreak.

Sunday was a repetition of the day before. Long before noon I had crossed Lyon and was following the broad valley of the Rhone. Avignon was to be my destination; but here my plans miscarried. For, as I approached the city at a height of three hundred feet, well before dusk, a few misses of my motor warned me that it was clogging, just as it had done in England, and I volplaned swiftly to the ground to avoid misfortune, landing in the exact center of a populous residential square, where in no time I was surrounded by a dense crowd of Provencals, cheering and mobbing me and acclaiming me by name. They climbed into the monoplane, they thrust out their hands toward me, and one held up before my eyes the latest copy of the Petit Journal. There, covering a whole page, I saw an atrociously drawn presentation of myself in the monoplane, and underneath, in large letters of black, the words: "The Woman Spy, Flying Over Dijon."

As I was growing desperate a couple of gendarmes forced their way through the crowd to me.

"Mademoiselle," said one, respectfully, "you may not proceed further. We have orders from the Minister of the Interior to detain you."

For a moment I was stunned with horror. Then an idea came to me. I made no answer, but set to work with all speed in the adjusting of my motor. Whatever might happen, it was essential that the monoplane should be in order, ready for action.

"The instructions are," the gendarme continued, "that mademoiselle shall remain at liberty in Avignon pending further orders. The aeroplane—"

"Yes, monsieur?" I answered carelessly, while my heart throbbed horribly. It seemed too terrible to be true. But at any cost I must appear to acquiesce.

"Understand, mademoiselle, you are not under arrest," he continued. "It is merely that the Minister of the Interior has issued an order forbidding ladies to fly, owing to the dangers."

"You spoke of the monoplane," I answered smiling. "What is to be done with it. For myself," I added, "I am really tired of flying. I shall not continue my journey to Marseilles."

"To Marseilles?" cried the gendarme, scratching his head. "Why mademoiselle, the Petit Journal says—" he hesitated.

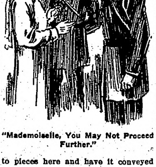
"That you are on your way to join your lover in Italy, there to be married in the clouds," put in the other.

I breathed more freely. Evidently the real purpose of my journey was not yet known.

"The aeroplane—" I persisted.

"Peste! What are we to do with the aeroplane?" said his companion. "There were no instructions."

"Let me make a suggestion," I answered suavely. "Suppose I take it to pieces here and have it conveyed to the police station."



"Mademoiselle, You May Not Proceed Further."

"Excellent," answered the second gendarme heartily. "But," he added, as I climbed into the seat, "You will not fly away, mademoiselle?"

I laughed. "What an idea!" I exclaimed. "But first I must fill up the tank with gasoline; otherwise it would be liable to explode. The conflict between centripetal and centrifugal force, caused by the expansion of gases, would annihilate the mechanism and cause serious tangental paribolas," I continued gravely.

The gendarme scratched his head. "Undoubtedly, mademoiselle," he answered. "There is a motor-car repair shop across the square. Certainly gasoline can be procured there."

A man in the crowd volunteered to obtain it and disappeared, shortly returning with a companion, both bearing two huge tanks, with which my own was speedily repleted. I took my seat in the machine.

"Now, gentlemen," I said, "pray make room while I unscrew the sustaining bar of the wings."

They cleared a space of several yards around me, these good Avignonese. I touched the lever and the motor hummed and throbbed. I pressed the flight indicator. The wheels turned, spun, lifted—

A gasp of astonishment broke from the crowd as I soared over them, and they ducked and ran in all directions to escape injury. My course was wild; I missed the steeple of an old church by several inches, scraped against the pediment of an ancient Roman edifice, and sped up to the sky. I looked back as I cleared the housetops. The two gendarmes were waving their hands at me imploringly. I hated to leave them, but the memory of my mission came to me to spur me on, and I flew like the wind. Soon Avignon was but a blot in the distance.

That night I slept under a tree in the wild mountain region of the Basses-Alpes. At dawn I continued my course directly eastward. Now no sign of human habitation was to be seen. There was nothing but ranges of lofty mountains. The cold became intense and the air currents treacherous. Time and again I was caught in gusts of icy wind, beaten, buffeted out of my path. Over me the sky was of intensest blue; round and beneath me lay the icy summits of the Alps. My teeth chattered and my hands grew so cold that I could scarcely feel the levers. Nothing but the intensity of my purpose could have enabled me to face that bitter wind.

At last, toward afternoon, just as I began to think that I had missed my path, when I felt that I could hold out no longer, I perceived, very far southward, a long, blue, monotonous line on the horizon. My heart leaped, a new and feverish determination entered into me. It was the sea, the blue water of the Mediterranean, that lay before my eyes. Now the last stage was approaching. So far I had conquered!

I wheeled southward and began to descend the long valleys of the Maritime Alps.

The air grew warmer, the descent more precipitous; I glided downward on the rushing winds exultingly, and ever nearer I saw the distant sea, until the narrowing horizon shut it once more from view. But when I left the last of the snow-capped ranges behind me the sun suddenly sank and I entered a region of twilight. It had been dark for an hour upon the lowlands while I was battling in the sunlight. The night was moonless; I must alight before it grew entirely dark or run the risk of falling into the sea. Out of the mountainside I saw the white road, the great highway between France and Italy, centuries old, debouched upon its way to Nice, whence it wound through the Principality of Monaco. Clearly I must descend there, where French laws did not run, and where the Minister of the Interior, actuated, I did not doubt, by interests inimical to mine, could not arrest my journey. In the falling light I saw of a sudden the little square topped building of the French customs house on the Monaco border, and the Monaco customs, not a dozen meters distant. I made for the latter, shut off my motor and careened earthward. As I descended, like a great soaring eagle, I saw men run from either building, shouting and waving their arms at me—their cries reached me with surprising clearness. I dropped to earth, hit the ground on the French side of the line, and rolled half into Monaco, to tumble exhausted from my aeroplane.

It was easy to see that I was squarely upon the international boundary. But my apprehensions were groundless, for nothing could have exceeded the kindness with which I was treated by the officials from either customs. Their first surprise over, they placed the quarters of the French officer at my disposal, and thither I adjourned for a hasty toilet, leaving the monoplane the center of interest. Seeing my weariness, they scarcely pressed a question upon me, and when, thinking always of the future, I pointed out the deficiency in the gasoline, the French officials promptly filled the tank with confiscated petrol from their contraband stores. Afterward I was the guest at an informal supper, to which the men from either side of the border invited themselves.

"Without doubt mademoiselle is on her way to Turin to compete in the international meeting there," suggested the French official.

I acknowledged the false presumption with a bow.

"Mademoiselle will remain here and rest tomorrow?" he continued hopefully. "It is not often that ladies honor us with their presence, and those few which we see here are, unfortunately, much prejudiced against us."

"Against you, monsieur?" I asked. "Impossible!"

He smiled and twirled his mustache jauntily. "Unfortunately," he murmured, "it is too often our painful duty to detain their baggage."

"They show poor taste," I answered. "But now, monsieur, I shall withdraw, having traveled all the way from Avignon since morning."

He started and stared at me in unbelief. "From Avignon?" he exclaimed. "Then mademoiselle must have crossed the Alps in her machine. No, no, impossible. None but Chavez has done it—and his fate was horrible!"

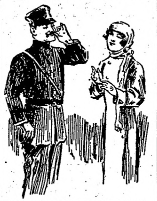
I saw at once the falseness of the move I had made in mentioning Avignon. If he should send a telegram to that city my cause was lost. Mortified, I muttered some excuses and withdrew to toss uneasily upon my bed for hours until I slept heavily from exhaustion.

When I awoke in the morning a presentiment of evil to come oppressed my spirits. From the window of my room I glanced out upon the surrounding country. The guardhouse was placed on a high hill, though it had appeared a level plain to me the night before, in comparison with those mountainous heights. Far under me I could see the fertile, thickly populated valleys of the coast; in the distance gleamed the magnificent building of the Monte Carlo gambling hall; and in front of it, beating against a curbing shore, were the sky-blue waters of the Mediterranean. Seeing it I took courage again. Let me but once get free, as I had freed myself from greater dangers, and nothing could stop me till I reached Corsica.

Yet the presentiment of evil remained with me and sprang into new life when, after a hasty breakfast, consisting of coffee and rolls, which was brought to me by the wife of one of the men, I met the French officer, looking glum and fluttering a telegraphic dispatch in his hand.

"Mademoiselle d'Yves," he began, after the most formal greeting, "I regret to say that I have received instructions from the minister of the interior to detain—"

I did not wait for him to conclude his speech, but skipped lightly across the Monaco boundary line, two meters away. The Monaco officials came out of their buildings and clapped their hands enthusiastically. It was evident that they had heard the news and looked for a pretty comedy, in which their part would be the rescue of a distressed maiden.



He Smiled and Twirled His Mustache Jauntily.

"Yes, monsieur?" I continued demurely.

"On what charge?" I asked icily.

"There is no charge," he answered, shrugging his shoulders. "It is the order."

"Hm!" I said. "Monsieur le capitaine, I begin to understand why the ladies dislike you."

"But what can I do?" he demanded, coming toward me with a deprecating action of the hands.

"Why, monsieur, being in Monaco, I demand the protection of this gentleman," I said, pointing to the other captain, who advanced instinctively, his arm outspread as though to ward from me some threatening violence.

"But you are not threatened, mademoiselle," said the French captain. "It is merely a temporary detention of the aeroplane. A little adjustment, if you like. I do not know what motive influences the minister. If you had denied your name—"

That touched my pride. He winced under the words that flowed spontaneously from my tongue, derogatory as they were toward the gallantry of the French nation.

"And in any event," I added, "the monoplane, being half in the territory of Monaco, does not come under your supervision."

The mask of politeness fell from his manner. He answered roughly:

"That part that is here stays, mademoiselle."

"And your part?" I said, turning to the Monaco officer.

"It goes, mademoiselle," he answered readily.

"In that case," I said, "you will permit me to take my seat on the part of the mechanism which is in your country?"

"By all means, mademoiselle," he answered.

"You cannot divide an aeroplane," cried the Frenchman rudely. "If you do, it shall be with an axe."

"If you will permit one of your men to draw a line between the two boundary pillars—" I hazarded to the Monaco captain.

He caught at the idea. He ran forward and, with his toe, drew a fairly straight line in the dust. "The machine lies more than half across the border," he cried.

"And the motor wholly," I whispered.

He was intelligent, this Monaco officer. He fairly beamed on me as I seated myself. The French captain, beside himself with anger, ran forward and placed his hands firmly around the girders that covered French territory. "Stir at your peril!" he shouted.

"O, monsieur," I said reproachfully, "this is an unpleasant ending to your hospitality. And after what you said last night!"

"Pray descend, mademoiselle," he entreated. "It is an order. Do not hold me responsible."

I started the motor and the wheels shot forward. Next moment the Frenchman was rolling down the steep bank of the ditch, while his confreres held their sides, helpless with laughter. Another instant and I was rising, hovering—and over French territory. I circled the guardhouse, and then, with a sudden access of speed, shot forward. I turned and waved my hand, narrowly escaping a somersault through the air as I did so.

"Adieu, mademoiselle," shouted the Monaco officer, and then I saw the Frenchman rise painfully from the ditch and heard him give utterance to the most exuberantly free flow of language that I have ever heard upon a Frenchman's lips. Positively I could not stay to listen to it. So I turned on the speed to the full extent, shot like an arrow upward, spun over the gambling hills, to the intense astonishment of the pigmies beneath me, and a moment later heard the splash of the Mediterranean billows upon the rocky shore of Monte Carlo.

Straight out to sea I flew, guiding my course by the new eastern sun, until the land was only a low line behind me. And presently even that failed. Now nothing was visible but the broad expanse of the ocean. Here and there, rising and falling like a cork upon the waters, I saw a tiny steamship, no bigger than a toy boat. And even these disappeared at last, leaving me alone with the sun and the sea and the wheeling gulls.

Hour after hour went by. Upon a favoring wind I sped, ever southward, while behind me the busy motor hummed and sang. "Charles! Charles!" That was its refrain. I thought of the incredible dangers that I had passed. Now the journey was almost ended, and there was little more to overcome. I swooped lower, until I almost skimmed the surface of the waters, taking sheer pleasure in the splash of the spray and the undulating waves that rose and fell as far as the eye could stretch in every direction. As the sun neared the zenith I changed my course, little by little, until I flew immediately toward it. In the midst of my exultation, however, suddenly an awful thought occurred to me.

"What if I should miss Corsica!"

It sobered me. Heaven help me then, for I should fly straight southward until I reached Africa, or fell into the sea. And after night a straight, an even comparatively straight, course would be impossible.

The sun crossed the zenith and blazed in the west. Now I changed my course little by little, until the sun was on my right hand. By four o'clock I should have sighted Corsica; by six I must reach Scouto, for twilight would then be approaching. The sun began perceptibly to decline. It was half way down in the sky. And still no sight of land!

Another thought now came to mind for the first time and added to my fears. What if Zeuxis should, after all, refuse to return with me? And, further, what if the added weight impeded the aeroplane!

But I forced these thoughts from me and strove desperately forward, as though by sheer effort of mentality I could add to the speed of the insensate mechanism. It must be four o'clock. Another half hour passed—an hour. The sea was changing from blue to black; in the northeast heavy thunderclouds were looming up. I did not dare think now. My brain whirled, the heavens appeared to spin; the sun, like a fiery Cyclopean eye, drew near to the horizon. That eye would close; and then—good night to life and all my hopes for Charles.

For my own life I cared nothing, but the thought of what would befall him was a torment. It sent the blood coursing furiously through my veins and my heart hammered like a hammer of doom. Six o'clock!—for the sun dipped and its fiery edge touched the water-line. There, immeasurably expanded in apparent size, it hid itself behind the murky clouds and seemed to leer horribly at me on its passage into the depths of ocean. I was hopelessly lost now. I could only shape my course mechanically southward. But where was I? I stared out over the pitch-black waters, stirring restlessly beneath the rising wind. One hour more, perhaps a little longer, and then—

My hands ached, my body ached, and an insurmountable lassitude weighed down my eyelids. Involuntarily I closed them for an instant. Then opening them, I cried out with joy.

For far in the distance I saw the tiniest blur of brown upon the face of the sea. It was so far to port that, had I not closed my eyes and so relieved them from the strain of gazing over the sea, I should never have seen it.

But as the sun's rim dipped under the sea I coursed over a high and rock-bound shore toward a white little town set on a hill. I dropped into the market square, and from the houses men came running up, shouting in some unintelligible speech. When the machine rested they ventured near and formed a circle round me at a respectful distance, crossing themselves and staring in amazement.

"Where am I?" I demanded in almost all that I knew of Italian.

One hero strutted toward me, tossing back his long cloak, and answered:

"Scouto."

I had flown all along the coast of Corsica, to land, by some most fortunate coincidence of fate, at the precise locality of my destination!

He knew me too, and began tremb-than that alone. For, as I stared into the man's face I recognized—Zeuxis!

But the coincidence was greater ling at the knees. Then, with a wild cry, he fell face down upon the stones. Small wonder when, deeming himself secure, he saw me swoop out of the skies to drag him from his living-plane.

Crop Was Lasting Well.

The discovery of a carpenter, whose father, grandfather and great-grandfather practised the same craft has been commented upon in several newspapers, and at Lamberhurst, in Kent, there is a family who have been innkeepers for four centuries. In countries where the caste system prevails such a record would be thought utterly insignificant, says the London Chronicle. Grant Duff notes in his diary the answer made by a punkah-puller in Madras to an English lady who suggested that he might improve his position. "Mem-sahib, my father pulled a punkah, my grandfather pulled a punkah, all my ancestors for four million ages pulled punkahs; and before that the god who founded our caste pulled a punkah for Vishnu."

ADVANCE OF GERMANS LIKE MOVING FORWARD OF NATION

By PHILIP GIBBS.

Paris.—When I escaped from Amiens, before the tunnel was broken up, and the Germans entered into possession of the town on August 28, the front of the allied armies was in a crescent from Abbeville, south of Amiens on wooded heights, and thence in a irregular line to south of Mezieres.

A Million on the Move.

On Sunday afternoon fighting was resumed along the whole line. The German vanguard by this time had been supported by a fresh army corps, which had been brought from Belgium.

At least 1,000,000 men were on the move, pressing upon the allied forces with a ferocity of attack which has never before been equaled. Their cavalry swept across a great tract of country, squadron by squadron, like the mounted hordes of Attila, but armed with the dreadful weapons of modern warfare.

Their artillery was in enormous numbers and their columns advanced under cover of it, not like an army, but rather like a moving nation—I do not think, however, with equal pressure at all parts of the line. It formed itself into a battering ram with a pointed end and this was thrust at the heart of the English wing.

Impossible to Resist.

It was impossible to resist this onslaught. If the British forces had stood against it they would have been crushed and broken. Our gunners were magnificent and shelled the advancing German columns so that the dead lay heaped up along the way which was leading down to Paris; but, as one of them told me:

"It made no manner of difference. As soon as we had smashed one lot, another followed, column after column, and by sheer weight of numbers. We could do nothing to check them."

After this the British forces fell back, fighting all the time. The line of the allies was in the shape of a "V"; the Germans thrust their main attack deep into the angle. This position remained the same until Monday, or rather had completed itself by that date, the retirement of the troops being maintained with masterly skill and without undue haste.

River Choked With Dead.

Meanwhile General Pau was sustaining a terrific attack on the French center by the German left center, which culminated on (date omitted). The River Oise, which runs between beautiful meadows, was choked with corpses and red with blood.

From an eye witness of this great battle, an officer of an infantry regiment who escaped with a slight wound, I learned that the German onslaught had been repelled by a series of brilliant bayonet and cavalry charges.

"The Germans," he said, "had the elite of their army engaged against us, including the Tenth army corps and the Imperial guard, but the heroism of our troops was sublime. Every man knew that the safety of France depended upon him and was ready to sacrifice his life, if need be, with joyful enthusiasm.

Gave Great Punishment.

"They not only resisted the enemy's attack, but took the offensive, and, in spite of their overpowering numbers, gave them tremendous punishment. They had to recoil before our guns.

"Hundreds of them were bayoneted and hundreds were hurled into the river. The whole field of battle was outlined by dead and dying men whom they had to abandon. Certainly their losses were enormous, and I felt that the German retreat was in full swing and that we could claim a real victory for the time being."

Pau Compelled to Yield.

Nevertheless the inevitable happened, owing to the vast reserves of the enemy, who brought up four divisions, and General Pau was compelled to give ground.

On Tuesday German skirmishers with light artillery were coming southward, and the sound of their field guns greeted my ears. Presently I saw the figure of a French dragoon, with his carbine slung behind his back. He was standing by the side of a number of gunpowder bags. A little farther away were little groups of soldiers at work by two bridges, one over a stream and one over a road. They were working very calmly and I could see what they were doing. They were mining the bridges to blow them up at a given signal.

As I went farther I saw the streets were strewn with broken bottles and littered with wire entanglements, artfully and carefully made.

Trap for German Army.

It was obvious that there was very grim business being done and that the soldiers were waiting for something to happen. At the railway station I quickly learned the truth. The Germans were only a few miles away in great force. At any moment they might come down, smashing everything in their way.

The station master, a brave old type, and one or two porters, had demanded to stay on to the last.

"We are here," he said, as though the Germans would have to reckon with him, but he was emphatic in his request for me to leave at once if another train could be got away, which was very uncertain.

As a matter of fact, after a bad quarter of an hour I was put on the last train to escape from this threatened town, and left it with the sound of German guns in my ears, followed by a dull explosion when the bridge behind me was blown up.

Escape Narrowly.

My train, in which there were only four other men, skirted the German army and by a twist in the line almost ran into the enemy's country, but we rushed through the night, and the engine driver laughed and put his oily hand up to salute when I stepped out to the platform of an unknown station.

"The Germans won't get us, after all," he said. "It was a little risky, all the same."

The station was crowded with French soldiers, and they were soon telling me their experiences of the hard fighting in which they had been engaged. They were dirty, unshaven, dusty from head to foot, scorched by the August sun, in tattered uniforms and broken boots; but they were beautiful men for all their dirt, and the laughing courage, quiet confidence and unbragging simplicity with which they assured me that the Germans would soon be caught in a death trap and sent to their destruction filled me with admiration which I cannot express in words.

All the odds were against them. They had fought the hardest of all actions—the retirement from the fighting line—but they had absolute faith in the ultimate success of the allied arms.

Germans Are Reckless.

London.—A Chronicle correspondent writing from an unarmed town says:

"The Germans are displaying extraordinary recklessness, flinging away thousands of lives in the hope of ultimately gaining their end. No doubt the rapid advance of the Russians in eastern Prussia has something to do with this, and is responsible for the frantic and insane haste which characterizes the German attempt in northern France to smash the thin khaki line which so valiantly bars the road toward Compeigne, Soissons and Paris.

"That stories of German atrocities are not one whit exaggerated may be gathered from the story told me by a sergeant who was wounded in the action near Mons Sunday a week ago.

"As he lay helpless on the ground and the German infantry swept by he could hear, from the imploring cries of the wounded in his front, that they were being ruthlessly put to death by their foes.

Ordeal Is Terrible.

"Closing his eyes and simulating death, the wounded sergeant lay perfectly still. As the Germans passed him he received a violent blow in the chest from the butt end of a rifle which broke one of his ribs. He bore the pain unflinchingly and never moved a muscle. Another Prussian stabbed a wounded man with his bayonet as he went past.

"The sergeant's ordeal was a terrible one and he expected every moment to be his last. Ultimately the German advance was broken and their infantry came rolling back, shattered and disordered, leaving behind a trail of dead and wounded. The wounded sergeant was picked up by British stretcher bearers and conveyed to the base hospital, where he is now fast recovering.

English Are Cheerful.

"Freshly arrived troops from England, who had been pushed forward, arrived in time to participate in the battle. These British re-enforcements had been carrying out strategic movements in troops trains for several days, and in the expressive phraseology of Tommy Atkins, 'they were fed up with the whole thing' and were all eagerness for a brush with the enemy.

"Their chance came yesterday. Many were reserves with South African experience, and they marched to the front cheering the French and growling for 'William the Weed,' somehow confusing the emperor with William (of Wied) of Albania. French and English flags were borne at the head of each company.

"They were in fine fettle, 'Are we downhearted?' would shout some one from the ranks, 'no, but William the Weed will be down-hearted by the time we finish with him.'"

French Kind, Says Dying German.

Paris.—The American embassy here is daily in receipt of letters written by dying soldiers, forwarded to it by the French government for transmission to Germany.

One is from a German aviator, who had fallen into the hands of the French. The man wrote:

"Good-by dear father and mother; my leg has been crushed. The French officers are very kind."

A postscript to this letter, added by a French officer, reads:

"At this point the brave fellow died; please forward this to his parents."

Man Germany Honored a Hostage.

Paris.—The Petit Parisien points out the irony in the case of M. Ernst Solvay, who with Baron Lambert de Rothschild was taken as a hostage at Brussels. The paper says that Solvay, who is well known for his invention of a process by which soda can be bought at an extremely cheap price, was recently highly honored by European nations. Germany conferred on Solvay one of its highest honors, the gold medal of the Academy of Sciences of Berlin.

THE NEW MINISTER

By MILDRED CAROLINE GOODRIDGE.

"Oh, I don't think that," immediately dissented Rhoda Evans. "He is certainly shy, but you must remember what strangers we are to him. He certainly makes up for his reticence and youth with those beautiful sermons he preaches."

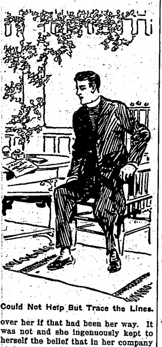
Myrtle gave Rhoda a quizzing look in her usual shrewd, suspicious way, but her pretty friend, quiet, smiling as ever, evinced no indication by blush or eye quiver of any particular interest in the Rev. Arnold Joyce.

Myrtle voiced the sentiment of a goodly portion of her set. A new minister was a new source of animation for the village, especially an eligible marriageable one. They had come of all sorts in the past and had lent variation and new ideas to the common life. There had been the sporting type, the tea drinking, the perfect ladies' man, even the bluff, intensely human, political, smoking and boxing species. They had come and gone rapidly, falling into the matrimonial net set for them and fading away into broader fields of labor through the needs of married life and the results of family influence.

"Why, this Mr. Joyce doesn't seem to even notice us young ladies—bolts off with the men whenever there is an entertainment."

"I think that is only natural bashfulness," said Rhoda.

She smiled to herself gently as Myrtle left her. Rhoda could have exulted over her if that had been her way. It was not and she ingenuously kept to herself the belief that in her company at least, when alone with her, Mr. Joyce was a different person to what he was amid a group of vain, admiration seeking young ladies.



Could Not Help But Trace the Lines.

Rhoda was in charge of a charity committee and she had spent some delightful hours telling her hopes and troubles to an ardent listener and sympathizer, Mr. Joyce himself. They were in perfect harmony. She had noted his shyness disappearing and his face brighten when they were together.

Then, too, as they grew more friendly and confidential, the finer features of the new minister's qualities had come out. There was no silly romance between them. He evidently craved her company and she was never happier than when they were together.

Then, one day when she accidentally dropped a rose from her corsage and saw him furtively secure and hide it, her senses thrilled and she wondered if in the depths of that retiring nature there was a secret chamber that cherished her solely.

The Rev. Mr. Joyce took a solitary stroll one beautiful afternoon. He was lost in sober reflection all the protracted tramp. Then suddenly he arrived at a conclusion.

"She seems to enjoy my company," he soliloquized, "and I—ah! I must not go on loving her if it is to only meet with final disappointment."

Then, after further deliberate cogitation, he murmured:

"Yes, I will know my fate today."

Mr. Joyce proceeded straight to the vine enbowered cottage with its pretty garden grounds that sheltered the idol of his soul. A servant told him that Miss Evans had run over to a neighbor's, offered to go for her and led the caller to a little summer house where there was shade and coolness.

Mr. Joyce sat in a comfortable rustic chair, though decidedly uncomfortable himself. He was trying to formulate his first appearance in a vital and unfamiliar line. The prospective proposal of marriage fairly upset his usual serenity.

Then casually he noted writing utensils on the little table at his side. Rhoda had evidently brought her correspondence to this choice retreat to attend to.

And then his eyes became fixed, despite his will, upon a single page of a letter that lay outspread and held flat under an ink stand. He could not help but trace the lines:

"—glad to believe this Mr. Joyce is a splendid man in your estimation, but, oh! I cannot help but think all of the time of my true fiance. You must keep our engagement secret, for it is not to be known for a year and—"

Mr. Joyce arose from his seat, suddenly realizing that he was viewing disclosures he had no right to surreptitiously scan. He was white to the lips. He staggered where he stood. His trembling hand for a moment crossed his closed eyes as if to shut out some sudden scene of blight to all his fondest hopes.

"Already engaged—she is writing to a friend!" he groaned and then quickly he made for a side hedge, got through it, hurried to his home and shut himself up in his darkened study.

Rhoda, advised by the servant, came tripping towards the summer house in a quiver of pure delight. She was dismayed at the inexplicable disappearance of her visitor. She did not see him all the rest of that week. Sunday morning a substitute took his place in the pulpit.

"Have you heard the news?" inquired Myrtle, with her usual gossiping buoyancy meeting Rhoda on the street.

"Concerning what?" inquired Rhoda.

"Mr. Joyce. He is ill, they say, and Deacon Brown says he is talking of resigning his charge."

"Oh, surely not!" burst forth Rhoda irrepressibly.

"What! so far gone as that?" derided her tormentor. "I hope they send a more impressible successor."

Rhoda went home with a strange pain at heart. She never realized how much she thought of Arnold Joyce until that moment. Somehow a suggestion of mystery, of trouble for the man she respected and believed in crossed her mind.

"He is ill, he needs friends surely now, if ever," reasoned Rhoda and within an hour was at the rectory. Its door was open, no servant appeared. She penetrated to the corridor beyond and glanced into the study.

There sat Arnold Joyce at a reading table. He held something in his hand, his eyes fixedly regarding it. She saw what it was—a rose, the one she had seen him secrete.

Suddenly, sadly he crushed its brittle leaves to powder and murmured the words,

"Rhoda—good-by!"

"Oh, Mr. Joyce! cried Rhoda impulsively, her heart full to overflowing, "you are ill? You are going away?"

"I am being punished," he said gravely.

"Punished—for what?" she inquired.

"For reading a written page telling of the fiance I never suspected. I could not help it. And since then—"

"Oh, a letter I had received from my cousin."

"Then—"

"Then you have misunderstood," said Rhoda and turned her blushing face away.

Arnold Joyce did not leave Millville. Why should he—when there, always by his side, was his helper, his wife?

LEARN HOW TO READ WELL

Absorption of Thought, Not the Hurried Glancing Over Printed Pages, Is to Be Desired.

When Bacon wrote, "Reade not to contradict and refute, nor to believe and to take for granted, nor to finde talke and discourse, but to weigh and consider," he uttered sage counsel which most of us might well take to heart. In this century of ours, when speed is such an important element in the daily round, this statement, with all its force and philosophy, is likely to fall on deaf ears; for the reading public of the present day, while having a taste in general for learning, is not prone to regard it as an art or a matter for serious contemplation. Yet this state of things is to be deplored; for what greater pleasure is there in the whole field of education than to read a book critically, with the object not only of getting out of it all that its author would convey, but to ponder his reasoning? The advantages of a course of reading such as this may not at the moment be apparent, but it will surely lead the reader into realms of which hitherto he has been oblivious.

Thoreau write: "To read well—that is, to read true books in a true spirit—is a noble exercise and one that will task the reader more than any exercise which the customs of the day esteem. It requires a training such as the athletes underwent, the steady intention almost of the whole life to this object. Books must be read as deliberately and reservedly as they were written."—Exchange.

Sailing for Women.

Every year the number increases of women who can not only handle a boat but who own their neat little craft, enjoying this latest invasion into manly sports.

A group of New York women whose husbands are members of the Bayside Yacht club own a quaint little fleet of sailboats known as the "Butterfly Fleet," each boat being named after a butterfly, beginning with the "Vanessa" of Mrs. Willard McGregor, whose husband designed the style of boat for his wife's pleasure after she had learned to handle his catboat. They are just large enough to hold the skipper and one passenger, and it is a pretty sight to see the miniature fleet assemble for a race.

Sidelights on the Ball.

"Madame, the musicians want something more to drink."

"Certainly not. Do they think they are paid to make the bottles dance?"—Le Rire (Paris).

5 Women Avoid Operations

For years we have been stating in the newspapers of the country that a great many women have escaped serious operations by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it is true.

We are permitted to publish in this announcement extracts from the letters of five women. All have been recently received unsolicited. Could any evidence be more convincing?

1. Hodgdon, Me.—"I had pains in both sides and such a soreness I could scarcely straighten up at times. My back ached and I was so nervous I could not sleep, and I thought I never would be any better until I submitted to an operation, but I commenced taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and soon felt like a new woman."—Mrs. Hayward Sowers, Hodgdon, Me.

2. Charlotte, N. C.—"I was in bad health for two years, with pains in both sides and was very nervous. I had a growth which the doctor said was a tumor, and I never would get well unless I had an operation. A friend advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I gladly say that I am now enjoying fine health."—Mrs. Rosa Sims, 16 Winona St., Charlotte, N. C.

3. Hanover, Pa.—"The doctor advised a severe operation, but my husband got me Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I experienced great relief in a short time. Now I feel like a new person and can do a hard day's work and not mind it."—Mrs. Ada Wilt, 196 Stock St., Hanover, Pa.

4. Decatur, Ill.—"I was sick in bed and three of the best physicians said I would have to be taken to the hospital for an operation as I had something growing in my left side. I refused to submit to the operation and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound—and it worked a miracle in my case, and I tell other women what it has done for me."—Mrs. Laura A. Griswold, 2300 Blk. East William Street, Decatur, Ill.

5. Cleveland, Ohio.—"I was very irregular and for several years my side pained me so that I expected to have to undergo an operation. Doctors said they knew of nothing that would help me. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I became regular and free from pain. I am thankful for such a good medicine and will always give it the highest praise."—Mrs. C. H. Griffith, 7305 Madison Av., Cleveland, O.

Wide Sympathies.

Out in the world of talk one hears many conflicting opinions. A great saint once said, "Who hears the eternal voice is delivered of many an opinion." You do not need to hear all the talk, all the various opinions of many men, to know true wisdom. Your own hushed spirit will teach you wisdom if you will listen. But in these lonely hours teach yourself to be ready to love all the vast variety of life that the world may offer you at any turning. Encourage big thoughts and wide sympathies. Remember to sympathize even in the silence with the people you read of and hear of, who are quite different from yourself. Try to understand motives and meanings in alien lives, and if you do this well enough your loneliness will be turned into the very best education there is. And when life calls you some day, your lamp will be shining and bright and will shed a lovely radiance all about you. For you will be able to hand on to others the wisdom that comes with dove's feet.

The New Reading.

Nat C. Goodwin, the famous actor, complained at a dinner at the Players in New York, about the facility and the levity of divorce.

"Why," said Mr. Goodwin hotly, "the way some people divorce and remarry is terrible.

"On a roof garden the other evening a young lady said to me:

"'Congratulate me, Mr. Goodwin. Today is my silver wedding day.'

"'Oh, nonsense,' said I. 'You are too young and pretty to have been married 25 years.'

"'Oh,' she laughed, 'you don't understand. Today I was married for the twenty-fifth time.'"

Difficulties.

"I suppose your education was a matter of great care to your parents."

"Yes," replied Miss Cayenne. "I recall that they had great difficulty teaching me to play the piano. And then they had still more persuading me not to."

Of Course Not.

"If you're fishing for trade—"

By EDNA FERBER

Emma McChesney, Mrs. (I place it in the background because she generally did) swung off the 2:15, crossed the depot platform, and dived into the hotel 'bus. She had to climb over the feet of a fat man in brown and a lean man in black, to do it. Long practice had made her perfect in the art. She knew that the fat man and the thin man were hogging the end seats so that they could be the first to register and get a choice of rooms when the 'bus reached the hotel. The vehicle smelled of straw, and mold, and stables, and dampness, and tobacco, as 'buses have from old Jonas Chuzzlewit's time to this. Nine years on the road had accustomed Emma McChesney's nostrils to 'bus smells. She gazed stolidly out of the window, crossed one leg over the other, remembered that her snug suit-skirt wasn't built for that attitude, uncrossed them again, and caught the delighted and understanding eye of the fat traveling man, who was a symphony in brown—brown suit, brown oxfords, brown scarf, brown hat, brown-bordered handkerchief just peeping over the edge of his pocket. He looked like a colossal chocolate fudge.

"Red-faced, grinning, and a naughty wink—I'll bet he sells coffins and undertakers' supplies," mused Emma McChesney. "And the other one—the tall, lank, funereal affair in black—I suppose his line would be sheet music, or maybe phonographs. Or perhaps he's a lyceum bureau reader, scheduled to give an evening of humorous readings for the Young Men's Sunday Evening club course at the First M. E. church."

During those nine years on the road for the Featherloom Skirt company Emma McChesney had picked up a side line or two on human nature.

She was not surprised to see the fat man in brown and the thin man in black leap out of the 'bus and into the hotel before she had had time to straighten her hat after the wheels had bumped up against the curbing. By the time she reached the desk the two were disappearing in the wake of a bellboy.

The sartorial triumph behind the desk, languidly read her signature upside down, took a disinterested look at her, and yelled:

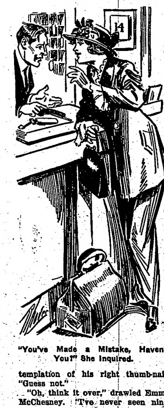
"Front! Show the lady up to nineteen."

Emma McChesney took three steps in the direction of the stairway toward which the boy was headed with her bags. Then she stopped.

"Wait a minute, boy," she said, pleasantly enough; and walked back to the desk. She eyed the clerk, a half-smile on her lips, one arm, in its neat tailored sleeve, resting on the marble, while her right forefinger, trimly gloved, tapped an imperative little tattoo. (Perhaps you think that last descriptive sentence is as unnecessary as it is garbled. But don't you get a little picture of her—trim, taut, tailored, mannish-booted, flat-heeled, linen-collared, sailor-hatted?)

"You've made a mistake, haven't you?" she inquired.

"Mistake?" repeated the clerk, removing his eyes from their loving contemplation of his right thumb-nail. "Guess not."



"You've Made a Mistake, Haven't You?" She Inquired.

"Oh, think it over," drawled Emma McChesney. "I've never seen nineteen, but I can describe it with both eyes shut, and one hand tied behind me. It's an inside room, isn't it, over the kitchen, and just next to the water butt where the maids come to draw water for the scrubbing at 5 a. m.? And the boiler room gets in its best bumps for nineteen, and the patent ventilators work just next door, and there's a pet rat that makes his headquarters in the wall between eighteen and nineteen, and the housekeeper whose room is across the hall is afflicted with a bronchial cough, nights. I'm wise to the brand of welcome that you fellows hand out to us women on the road. This is new territory for me—my first trip West. Think it over. Don't—er—say, sixty-five strike you as being nearer my size?"

The clerk stared at Emma McChesney, and Emma McChesney coolly stared back at the clerk.

"Our aim," he began loftily, "is to make our guests as comfortable as possible on all occasions. But the last lady drummer who—"

"That's all right," interrupted Emma McChesney, "but I'm not the kind that steals the towels, and I don't carry an electric iron with me, either. Also I don't get chummy with the housekeeper and the dining-room girls half an hour after I move in. Most women drummers are living up to their reputations, but some of us are living 'em down. I'm for revision downward. You haven't got my number, that's all."

A slow gleam of unwilling admiration illuminated the clerk's chill eye. He turned and extracted another key with its jangling metal tag, from one of the many pigeonholes behind him.

"You win," he said. He leaned over the desk and lowered his voice discreetly. "Say, girlie, go into the cafe and have a drink on me."

"Wrong again," answered Emma McChesney. "Never use it. Bad for the complexion. Thanks just the same. Nice little hotel you've got here."

In the corridor leading to sixty-five there was a great litter of pails, and mops, and brooms, and damp rags, and one heard the sigh of a vacuum cleaner.

"Spring house-cleaning," explained the bellboy, hurdling a pail.

Emma McChesney picked her way over a little heap of dust cloths and a ladder or so.

"House-cleaning," she repeated dreamily; "spring house-cleaning." And there came a troubled, yearning light into her eyes. It lingered there after the boy had unlocked and thrown open the door of sixty-five, pocketed his dime, and departed.

Sixty-five was—well, you know what sixty-five generally is in a small middle western town. Iron bed—tan wall-paper—pine table—pine dresser—pine chair—red carpet—stuffy smell—fly buzzing at window—sun beating in from the west. Emma McChesney saw it all in one accustomed glance.

"Lordy, I hate to think what nineteen must be," she told herself, and unclasped her bag. Out came the first aid to the travel-stained—a jar of cold cream. It was followed by powder, chamois, brush, comb, tooth-brush. Emma McChesney dug four fingers into the cold cream jar, slapped the stuff on her face, rubbed it in a bit, wiped it off with a dry towel, straightened her hat, dusted the chamois over her face, glanced at her watch and hurriedly whisked downstairs.

"After all," she mused, "that thin guy might not be out for a music house. Maybe his line is skirts, too. You never can tell. Anyway, I'll beat him to it."

Saturday afternoon and springtime in a small town! Do you know it? Main street—on the right side—all a-bustle; farmers' wagons drawn up at the curbing; farmers' wives in the inevitably rusty black with dowdy hats furbished up with a red muslin rose in honor of spring; grand opening at the new five-and-ten-cent store, with women streaming in and streaming out again, each with a souvenir pink carnation pinned to her coat; every one carrying bundles and yellow paper bags that might contain bananas or hats or grass seed; the thirty-two automobiles that the town boasts all dashing up and down the street, driven by hatless youths in careful college clothes; a crowd of at least eleven waiting at Jenson's drug store corner for the next interurban car.

Emma McChesney found herself strolling when she should have been hustling in the direction of the Novelty Cloak and Suit store. She was aware of a vague, strangely restless feeling in the region of her heart—or was it her liver?—or her lungs?

Reluctantly she turned in at the entrance of the Novelty Cloak and Suit store and asked for the buyer. (Here we might introduce one of those side-splitting little business deal scenes. But there can be paid no finer compliment to Emma McChesney's salesmanship than to state that she landed her man on a busy Saturday afternoon, with a store full of customers and the head woman clerk dead against her from the start.)

As she was leaving:

"Generally it's the other way around," smiled the boss, regarding Emma's trim comeliness, "but seeing you're a lady, why, it'll be on me." He reached for his hat. "Let's go and have—ah—a little something."

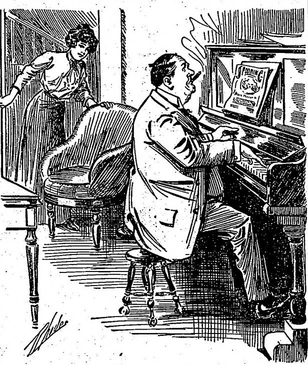
"Not any, thanks," Emma McChesney replied, a little wearily.

On her way back to the hotel she frankly loitered. Just to look at her made you certain that she was not of our town. Now, that doesn't imply that the women of our town do not dress well, because they do. But there was something about her—a flirt of chiffon at the throat, or her hat quill stuck in a certain way, or the stitching on her gloves, or the vamp of her shoe—that was of a style which had not reached us yet.

As Emma McChesney loitered, looking in at the shop windows and watching the women hurrying by, intent on the purchase of their Sunday dinners, that vaguely restless feeling seized her again. There were rows of plump fowls in the butcher shop windows, and juicy roasts. The cunning hand of the butcher had enhanced the redness of the meat by trimmings of curly parsley. Salad things and new vegetables glowed behind the grocers' plate-glass. There were the tender green of lettuces, the coral of tomatoes, the brown-green of stout asparagus stalks, bins of spring peas and beans, and carrots, and bunches of greens for soup. There came over the businesslike soul of Emma McChesney a wild longing to go in and select a ten-pound roast, taking care that there should be just the right proportion of creamy fat and red meat. She wanted to go in and poke her fingers into the ribs of a broiler. She wanted to order wildly of sweet potatoes and vegetables, and soup bones, and apples for pies. She ached to turn back her sleeves and don a blue-and-white checked apron and roll out noodles.

She still was fighting that wild impulse as she walked back to the hotel, went up to her stuffy room, and, without removing hat or coat, seated herself on the edge of the bed and stared long and hard at the tan wall-paper.

There is this peculiarity about tan wall-paper. If you stare at it long enough you begin to see things. Emma McChesney, who pulled down something over thirty-two hundred a year selling Featherloom petticoats, saw this:



A Man Was Seated at the Piano, Playing.

A kitchen, very bright and clean, with a cluttered kind of cleanliness that bespeaks many housewifely tasks under way. There were mixing bowls, and saucepans, and a kettle or so, and from the oven there came the sounds of spluttering and hissing. About the room there hung the divinely delectable scent of freshly baked cookies. Emma McChesney saw herself in an all-enveloping checked gingham apron, her sleeves rolled up, her hair somewhat wild, and one lock powdered with white where she had pushed it back with a floury hand. Her cheeks were surprisingly pink, and her eyes were very bright, and she was scraping a baking board and rolling pin, and trimming the edges of pie tins, and turning with a whirl to open the oven door, stooping to dip up spoonfuls of gravy only to pour the rich brown liquid over the meat again. There were things on top of the stove that required sticking into with a fork, and other things that demanded tasting and stirring with a spoon. A neighbor came in to borrow a cup of molasses, and Emma urged upon her one of her freshly baked cookies. And there was a ring at the front door bell, and she had to rush away to do battle with a persistent book agent. . . .

The buzzing fly alighted on Emma McChesney's left eyebrow. She swatted it with a hand that was not quick enough, spoiled the picture, and slowly rose from her perch at the bedside.

"Oh, damn!" she remarked, wearily, and went over to the dresser. Then she pulled down her shirtwaist all around and went down to supper.

The dining-room was very warm, and there came a smell of lardy things from the kitchen. Those supping were doing so languidly.

"I'm dying for something cool, and green, and fresh," remarked Emma to the girl who filled her glass with iced water; "something springish and tempting."

"Well," sing-songed she of the ruffled, starched skirt, "we have ham'n-aigs, mutton chops, cold veal, cold roast—"

Supper over she passed through the lobby on her way upstairs. The place was filled with men. They were lolling in the big leather chairs at the window, or standing about, smoking and talking. There was a rattle of dice from the cigar counter, and a burst of laughter from the men gathered about it. It all looked very bright and cheery, and sociable. Emma McChesney, turning to ascend the stairs to her room, felt that she, too, would like to sit in one of the big leather chairs in the window and talk to some one.

Some one was playing the piano in the parlor. The doors were open. Emma McChesney glanced in. Then she stopped. It was not the appearance of the room that held her. You may have heard of the wilds of an African jungle—the trackless wastes of the desert—the solitude of the forest—the limitless stretch of the storm-tossed ocean; they are cozy and snug when compared to the utter and soul-searing dreariness of a small town hotel parlor. You know what it is—red carpet, red plush and brocade furniture, full-length walnut mirror, battered piano on which reposes a sheet of music given away with the Sunday supplement of a city paper.

A man was seated at the piano, playing. He was not playing the Sunday supplement sheet music. His brown hat was pushed back on his head and there was a fat cigar in his pursy mouth, and as he played he squinted up through the smoke. He was playing Mendelssohn's "Spring Song." Not as you have heard it played by sweet young things; not as you have heard it rendered by the Appollo string quartette. Under his fingers it was a fragrant, trembling, laughing, sobbing exquisite thing. He was playing it in a way to make you stare straight ahead and swallow hard.

Emma McChesney leaned her head against the door. The man at the piano did not turn. So she tip-toed in, found a chair in a corner, and noiselessly slipped into it. She sat very still, listening, and the past-that-might-have-been and the future-that-was-to-be, stretched behind and before her, as is strangely often the case when we are listening to music. She stared ahead with eyes that were very wide open and bright. Something in the attitude of the man sitting hunched there over the piano keys, and something in the beauty and pathos of the music brought a hot haze of tears to her eyes. She leaned her head against the back of the chair, and shut her eyes and wept quietly and heart-brokenly. The tears slid down her cheeks, and dropped on her tailored waist and her Irish lace jabot, and she didn't care a bit.

The last lovely note died away. The fat man's hands dropped limply to his sides. Emma McChesney stared at them, fascinated. They were quite marvelous hands; not at all the sort of hands one would expect to see attached to the wrists of a fat man. They were slim, nervous, sensitive hands, pink-tipped, tapering, blue-veined, delicate. As Emma McChesney stared at them the man turned slowly on the revolving stool. His plump, pink face was dolorous, sagging, wan-eyed.

He watched Emma McChesney as she sat up and dried her eyes. A satisfied light dawned in his face.

"Thanks," he said, and mopped his forehead and chin and neck with the brown-edged handkerchief.

"You—you can't be Paderewski. He's thin. But if he plays any better than that, then I don't want to hear him. You've upset me for the rest of the week. You've started me thinking about things—about things that—that—"

"About things that you're trying to forget. It starts me that way, too. That's why sometimes I don't touch the keys for weeks. Say, what do you think of a man who can play like that, and who is out on the road for a living just because he knows it's a sure thing? Music! That's my gift. And I've buried it. Why? Because the public won't take a fat man seriously. When he sits down at the piano they begin to howl for Italian rag. Why, I'd rather play the piano in a five-cent moving picture house than do what I'm doing now. But the old man wanted his son to be a business man, not a crazy, piano-playing galoot. That's the way he put it. And I was darn fool enough to think he was right. Why can't people stand up and do the things they're out to do! Not one person in a thousand does. Why, take you—I don't know you from Eve, but just from the way you shed the briny I know you're busy regretting."

"Regretting?" repeated Emma McChesney, in a wail. "Do you know what I am? I'm a lady drummer. And do you know what I want to do this minute? I want to clean house. I want to wind a towel around my head, and pin up my skirt, and slosh around with a pail of hot, soapy water. I want to pound a couple of mattresses in the back yard, and eat a cold dinner off the kitchen table. That's what I want to do."

"Well, go on and do it," said the fat man.

"Do it? I haven't any house to clean. I got my divorce ten years ago, and I've been on the road ever since. I don't know why I stick. I'm pulling down a good, fat salary and commissions, but it's no life for a woman, and I know it, but I'm not big enough to quit. It's different with a man on the road. He can spend his evenings taking in two or three nickel shows, or he can stand on the drug store corner and watch the pretty girls go by, or he can have a game of billiards, or maybe cards. Or he can have a nice, quiet time just going up to his room, and smoking a cigar and writing to his wife or his girl. D'you know what I do?"

"Evenings I go up to my room and sew or read. Sew! Every hook and eye and button on my clothes is moored so tight that even the hand laundry can't tear 'em off. You couldn't pry those fastenings away with dynamite. When I find a hole in my stockings I'm tickled to death, because it's something to mend. And read? Everything from the rules of the house tacked up on the door to spelling out the French short story in the back of the Swell Set magazine. It's getting on my nerves. Do you know what I do Sunday mornings? No, you don't. Well, I go to church, that's what I do. And I get green with envy watching the other women there getting nervous about 11:45 or so, when the minister is still in knee-deep, and I know they're wondering if Lizzie has basted the chicken often enough, and if she has put the celery in cold water, and the ice cream is packed in burlap in the cellar, and if she has forgotten to mix in a tablespoon of flour to make it smooth. You can tell by the look on their faces that there's company for dinner. And you know that after dinner they'll sit around, and the men will smoke, and the women folks will go upstairs, and she'll show the other woman her new scalloped, monogrammed, hand-embroidered guest towels, and the waist that her cousin Ethel brought from Paris. And maybe they'll slip off their skirts and lie down on the spare room bed for a ten minutes' nap. And you can hear the hired girl rattling the dishes in the kitchen, and talking to her lady friend who is helping her wipe up so they can get out early. You can hear the two of them laughing above the clatter of the dishes—"

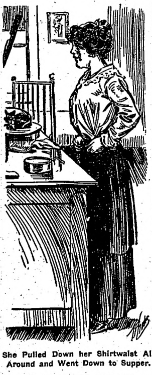
"I'm through," he said. "I quit tonight. I've got my own life to live. Here, will you shake on it? I'll quit if you will. You're a born housekeeper. You don't belong on the road any more than I do. It's now or never.



She Pulled Down her Shirtwaist All Around and Went Down to Supper.

And it's going to be now with me. When I strike the pearly gates I'm not going to have Saint Peter say to me, 'Ed, old kid, what have you done with your talents?'"

"You're right," sobbed Emma McChesney, her face glowing.

"By the way," interrupted the fat man, "what's your line?"

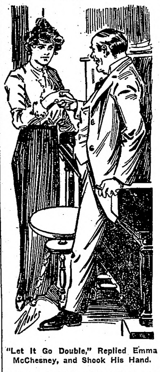
"Petticoats. I'm out for T. A. Buck's Featherloom skirts. What's yours?"

"Suffering cats!" shouted the fat man. "D' you mean to tell me that you're the fellow who sold that bill to Blum, of the Novelty Cloak and Suit concern, and spoiled a sale for me?"

"You! Are you—"

"You bet I am. I sell the best little skirt in the world. Strauss's Sans-silk Petticoat, warranted not to crack, rip, or fall into holes. Greatest little skirt in the country."

Emma McChesney straightened her collar and jabot with a jerk, and sat up.



"Let It Go Double," Replied Emma McChesney, and Shook His Hand.

"Oh, now, don't give me that bunk. You've got a good little seller, all right, but that guaranty don't hold water any more than the petticoat contains silk. I know that stuff. It looms up big in the window displays, but it's got a filler of glucose, or starch or mucilage or something, and two days after you wear it it's as limp as a cheesecloth rag. It's showy, but you take a line like mine, for instance, why—"

"My customers swear by me. I make De Kalb tomorrow, and there's Nussbaum of the Paris emporium, the biggest store there, who just—"

"I make De Kalb, too," remarked Emma McChesney, the light of battle in her eye.

"You mean," gently insinuated the fat man, "that you were going to, but that's all over now."

"Huh?" said Emma.

"Our agreement, you know," the fat man reminded her, sweetly. "You aren't going back on that. The cottage and the Sunday dinner for you, remember."

"Of course," agreed Emma listlessly. "I think I'll go up and get some sleep now. Didn't get much last night on the road."

"Won't you—er—come down and have a little something moist? Or we could have it sent up here," suggested the fat man.

"You're the third man that's asked me that today," snapped Emma McChesney, somewhat crossly. "Say, what do I look like, anyway? I guess I'll have to pin a white ribbon on my coat lapel."

"No offense," put in the fat man, with haste. "I just thought it would bind our bargain. I hope you'll be happy, and contented, and all that, you know."

"Guess I'll run down and get a smoke," remarked he.

He ran down the stairs in a manner wonderfully airy for one so stout. Emma watched until he vanished around a bend in the stairs. Then she walked hastily in the direction of 65.

Down in the lobby the fat man, cigar in mouth, was cautioning the clerk, and emphasizing his remarks with one forefinger.

"I want to leave a call for 6:30," he was saying. "Not a minute later. I've got to get out of here on that 7:35 for De Kalb. Got a Sunday customer there."

As he turned away a telephone bell tinkled at the desk. The clerk bent his stately head.

"Clerk. Yes, ma'am. No, ma'am, there's no train out of here tonight for DeKalb. Tomorrow morning, 7:35 a. m. I sure will. At 6:30? Surest thing you know."

Worm Breaks Itself to Pieces.

There is a flat worm about half an inch long called Planaria velata which reproduces itself in a most extraordinary manner. According to an article in the Biological Bulletin when it grows old it loses its appetite, its colors fade and its movements become slow. It drops a tiny fragment of its tail, then another, still another and so on until it has left about half of its body in scattered pieces. Each detached piece curls up, secretes a mucus that soon dries and forms a hard shell.

In this condition the fragments remain throughout the summer, fall and winter. In the spring the shells burst and liberate many minute worms, which eat voraciously and soon grow to adult size. The fore part of the worm, after it has shed all these bits, either dies or encysts itself in its turn.

THE SUNBEAM.

VOL. XIV. SUNBEAM, PENNINGTON COUNTY, MINNESOTA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1914. NO. 28.

MINNESOTA HISTORICAL SOCIETY

GLASS VS. BULLETS

By FRANK FILSON.

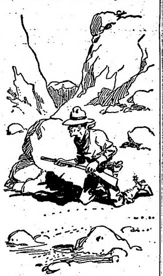
The sheriff had known all along that the half-breed girl was tricking him. But "Big Tom" Bagley had meant to be tricked. He wanted to set eyes upon "Kid" Long, not to follow a dubious trail that might lead nowhere. And he had been certain that, at some time or other, the "Kid" would show up at Naida's shack.

Naida lived alone, save for the old crone who was said to be her mother and looked like her great-grandmother, twelve miles out in the Painted Desert. It is the cruelest of all deserts. It breeds scorpions and gilas and venomous things, and those who take to it, whether perforce or from natural affinity, share the same nature.

Half Spanish, half Indian, Naida, at seventeen, was a fit mate for the "Kid," the most bloodthirsty, and at the same time cowardly, of the bad men of Parthenon county. The list of deaths which he had checked off in notches on the barrel of his Winchester had all been of inoffensive men, and nearly all had been killed unarmed or unawares. "Big Tom" Bagley had laughed when he was warned of the outlaw's reputation. James Penney, the sheep owner, a man universally esteemed for his quiet, law-abiding nature, had been shot in the back by "Kid" Long, on account of some grudge the outlaw bore, and Bagley had just taken down his rifle, saddled his mare and ridden out to Naida's cabin.

At first the Indian girl tried an affectation of ignorance, then cajolery, then threats. None of these moved "Big Tom." "I reckon if your man ain't here he'll be along soon," he said, and took up his quarters in the cabin.

Naida began to be in deadly fear of the big, quiet man who treated her with such deference. She planned to ride out to the "Kid" and give him warning. The "Kid" was lying up among the hills, fearing a posse, and it was cold there. He longed for the comfort of the cabin. But if he had known that only "Big Tom" was there he would not have hesitated for a moment. The coyote is always a match for the lion in guile.



Creeping Cautiously Through the Boulders.

As soon as Naida, at dawn, had leaped upon the back of her mustang she saw Bagley standing in the doorway.

"Going riding, Miss Naida?" drawled the sheriff. "I reckon I'll go along with you, to see you don't come to no harm."

For answer Naida dug her heels into the pony's flanks, and the desert-bred steed was away like the wind. But, half an hour later, when it pulled up, breathless, with heaving flanks, the sheriff was at Naida's side, and his mare, though blown, was still unwinded.

"Best be getting home for breakfast, hadn't we?" he asked with a touch of humor in his gruff voice.

Naida rode back five paces in front of him. She knew that she was beaten.

Not altogether, though. Sheriff Bagley had the instinct of a cat when the mouse was out. The next morning at five that instinct made him crawl from his mattress in the little room above the kitchen, which he had occupied unasked. He saw a streak of sunlight dancing upon a rock about two miles distant. There would have been nothing strange about that, only the sunlight was round.

Backward and forward it jumped, and the sheriff stood grimly watching it. Then, looking downward, he saw the edge of Naida's skirt in the doorway.

The sheriff went back to bed, turned over, and had a short sleep. Then he got up and went downstairs in a leisurely manner. Neither the girl nor the old crone was to be seen.

The sheriff hunted about until he found the mirror—a small, round one, which the "Kid" had probably brought her from one of his jaunts in town. The sheriff slipped it up his big sleeve, took his Winchester, and lay down under a tree, facing in the direction of the distant hills. His rifle he snuggled up against his side, keeping his finger conveniently near the trigger. Since it was hot, the sheriff enjoyed a brief siesta.

Half an hour later, lazily opening one eye, he perceived a figure creeping cautiously through the boulders of the dry gulch about three hundred yards distant. In its hand was a rifle. The sheriff edged a little, so that the tree covered him.

Bang! The "Kid's" first shot came uncommonly near. The "Kid" thought the sheriff asleep, but he thought that he could put a bullet through him at that distance, so that it was unnecessary to take any chances.

The sheriff did not reply, because it is difficult to hit an inch of eyebrow at three hundred yards. He pulled the mirror out of his sleeve and dandled it in his fingers. The second shot went wild.

The sheriff rose quietly to his feet, and he did not seem to be particularly interested in the man in the arroyo, for he strolled toward him in quite a casual manner. He still held the mirror in his fingers, and he advanced so steadily, and apparently disinterested and quiet in his mind, that the reflection played always upon that inch of eyebrow and the left eye underneath it. And, try hard as he might, the "Kid" could never get his eye clear of that circle of light, unless he ducked behind the stone. And whenever he did so he always looked up to see the sheriff a good deal nearer. Yet the sheriff was strolling toward him at the same even gait.

Bang! Bang! Bang! went the "Kid's" rifle, and the sheriff smiled happily as he heard the bullets go whistling by, far to the right and left of him. The fingers that held the mirror did not waver an inch. The "Kid" was becoming panic-struck as well as light-struck. It seemed like the inexorable approach of doom, that quiet, even advent of his enemy. The figure came near and ever nearer, out of a sort of luminosity that framed the dazzling light-beam like a sheath.

The "Kid's" head ducked and came up on the other side of the stone. And he leveled his rifle once again into that beam of light, and his bullet plowed up the sand some twenty feet distant.

Suddenly his chance came. The sheriff, advancing with his eyes fixed on the man in the gulley, tripped over a stone. With shaking fingers the "Kid" drew a bead on the prostrate man and fired. The bullet went wild. The "Kid" had lost his nerve as well as his clear vision. He jammed a cartridge into the breech and aimed once more—into the same sunbeam.

He flung his rifle down and, springing to his feet, held up his hands.

"Don't shoot!" he yelled. "You've got me!"

"Big Tom" grinned in his amiable way as he came up to him. "You can put your hands down 'Kid,'" he said, and the "Kid" lowered them.

"Who in thunder gave you that glass?" began the "Kid" bitterly, as they approached the empty house.

"That? Oh, I just borrowed it from Miss Naida," the sheriff answered. "You see, I found that I'd come out without any cartridges."

POTATO JUICE AS MEDICINE

London Scientist Gives Out a New Idea, Which He Claims to Have Discovered.

Again science comes to the support of old wives' medicine. Everybody who has lived in the country knows that a slice of potato is "the sovereign'st thing" for a wound, a bite or a bruise, or even that dread malady of the farmer, rheumatism. And now the London Lancet publishes an article advocating, from the results of some years' experience, the introduction of potato juice into medical practice. The author, Dr. Howard of Clapham, squeezes the juice out of raw potatoes by hydraulic pressure, evaporates off a fifth of the water and adds a little glycerin. He finds its application to inflamed joints gives prompt relief from pain and rapid absorption of fluid. He also uses it hot for gout in the toe. If, now, any doctor calls it superstitious to follow the good old custom of mashing up a raw potato and binding it on a bee-sting or rheumatic limb he may be respectfully referred to the Lancet. Very likely he himself will in a few years be writing "ext. solani liq." on a prescription blank and the druggist will charge a dollar for it. But so far science has afforded no confirmation of the popular belief that carrying a potato around in the pocket will cure rheumatism.

KRAFT CASE DISTURBS BASEBALL WORLD

Clarence Kraft, Over Whom Trouble Arose.

Regardless of what it was that brought about the declaring off of the threatened strike of the ball players, it is for the best interests of the game that no strike was taken. Baseball has withstood numerous abuses since its birth and has lived and prospered under them, but there is danger of the public becoming disgusted with the methods now in vogue, says the Washington Star. The advent of the Federal league, which caused players to jump their contracts, has already had a detrimental effect on the interest in the sport, the attendance this season having fallen off materially as a result. Had the players gone into a strike, as they threatened the game would have been dealt a blow from which it might never have recovered. It is being intimated that there was something more behind the threatened strike than the Kraft case. It may have been a Federal league scheme, for if there had been a strike, the chances are that many of the players would have deserted organized baseball and gone to the Feds. In this way the independent organization would have been made a major league proposition in a single night. Ball players should not forget that they owe something to the game. No other profession has been so kind to those engaged in it as has baseball. The players' salaries have gone upward by bounds, and yet they fall again to where they started if public interest in the game is marred.

After releasing Kraft to the Boston Nationals this spring and later recalling him, according to officials of the Nashville club, President Ebbets of Brooklyn agreed to release the players to Nashville under an optional agreement only.

The Nashville club accepted the proposition, but later formally withdrew their acceptance when the Brooklyn club delayed in complying.

The Nashville club later heard that Kraft had been released to Newark of the International league.

President Shropshire of the Nashville club immediately filed a protest with the national commission and later was notified by President Herrmann that Kraft had been awarded to Nashville.

CAREER OF ROBERT H. VEACH

Robert H. Veach, left fielder of the Detroit American league club, was born in St. Charles, Ky., on June 29, 1888. He started playing professional ball with the Peoria club of the I. I. I. league in 1910. When Veach joined Peoria he was a pitcher and would probably have still been pitching in some minor league, had it not been for an injury to a regular outfielder that gave him a chance to start in at left field. During the 1911 season Veach did great work in the outfield and also pitched well when called upon. After joining Indianapolis Veach gave up pitching and concentrated himself upon learning to play the outfield. Three months after he joined Indianapolis Veach's release was purchased by the Tigers in 1912, and he has been with Jennings' team ever since. Lack of ginger in the only noticeable drawback to Veach's work. He is a hard hitter, fast fielder and possesses an excellent throwing arm. He bats and throws left-handed.

CHEAP POULTRY FEED

SUBURBAN POULTRYMAN HAS ADVANTAGES OVER FARMER.

Much Waste in Cities in Form of Garbage, Stale Bread, Buttermilk and Skim Milk Available at Very Low Prices.

(By ISAAC MOTES.)

While the farmer-poultryman at a distance from the city has some advantages over the near-city poultryman, the latter is not as badly handicapped on his home acre as you might think.

The farmer can, of course, raise most of his feed, and his chickens have plenty of room to rustle their foods in the fields, orchards, pasture and barnyard, but on the other hand the suburban poltryman is much closer to market and can take advantage of rush orders from merchants either for eggs or dressed poultry, and he is thus in position to get top market prices for the product of his flocks.

Blue Orpington Hen.

And the near-city poultryman can get cheap feed if he knows how, for there is so much waste in cities in the form of garbage, stale bread, buttermilk and skim milk. In a city containing a number of bakeries a poultryman can get large quanities of stale bread merely for hauling it away, or if he pays for it, it will be only a nominal sum.

I have in mind now a woman in my city who owns a restaurant, not a very large one, either. She also has a chicken farm about 12 miles from the city, and she sends out to the farm once a week from six to ten potato sacks of waste bread for her chickens—bread which but for utilizing it thus would be thrown away. The result is that she makes a big profit on the chickens and eggs she sells.

This bread is exceedingly fine for chickens, especially when soaked in warm skim milk, slightly sweetened. And it is as good for fattening chickens as for brood hens and young chickens. It is also fine for hogs.

Another kind of chicken feed which the near-city poultryman can get in large quantities is fresh buttermilk in cities where there are creameries or butter companies.

Such companies sell a great deal of buttermilk, but nothing like as much as they could sell, and a great deal of it is turned into the sewer, so if a poultryman with 200 or 300 chickens wished to buy it in say five-gallon lots he would be able to get it very cheaply—perhaps for five cents a gallon, for the buttermaker would surely prefer selling it even at this price to throwing it away.

This buttermilk is especially good for chickens cooped up to fatten for market, for the acid in the milk is good for their digestion in the winter when they cannot get green stuff, and also while they are cooped up where they cannot take exercise.

Very few things are as fattening as slightly sour milk curds, sweetened, heated to blood heat and with some refuse grease or meat drippings from the kitchen added. Such fat-making food is better for fattening chickens, however, than for hens with broods.

Another advantage the small poultryman has near the city is that he is accessible to dairies where he can get skim milk from separators, which is also exceedingly good for fattening chickens, in making up mashes of different kinds. The butter companies have a great deal of it for sale, and the price is low, while in country neighborhoods there is little or none of it for sale.

PICKED UP IN THE ORCHARD

Dressing of Wood Ashes Beneficial to All Fruit Trees—Bones Promote Growth and Vigor.

A dressing of wood ashes around the fruit trees and grape vines is a benefit. It supplies the loss of the alkalis, which are largely consumed by fruit, destroys the acidity in the soil and tends to sweeten all kinds of fruit.

Bones, old leather, refuse plaster and soap suds, all constitute good fertilizer for the fruit trees.

Bones appear to be the best of all to promote permanent growth and vigor in a tree.

A handful of bone dust mixed with the soil at the roots of a tree or grape vine will show its beneficial effects for a number of years.

When grapes or berries are too tender and will not stand up in first class condition to pick and market, it shows that the soil on which they grow is deficient in potash.

The custom of summer pruning of young trees so as to ripen the fruit early is not approved by the most skillful fruit growers and is only allowable when the intention is to throw the whole force of the sap into those particular branches that it is desired to train in some particular direction.

No fruit ripens so well nor has so fine a flavor when the foliage is injured by summer pruning. This fact is observable in our apple, peach, and pear orchards when the worms have consumed the leaves on a limb. You will always find the fruit on such a branch of poor quality and inferior flavor.

The leaves are the lungs of a plant and are required to perform an important function in ripening the fruit.

Taking Care of Orchard Trees.

Appearances Count.

Put some of the good fruit and vegetables on top of the package. It is expected. That is true to the letter. If you put medium or small fruit on the top, the people will expect it all the way down. If you see ever so good a man on the streets in a miserable suit of clothes and shoes run down at the heel, you will take him for a tramp. It is appearances that count nowadays, in the apple barrel as elsewhere.

Piggery Sanitation.

The sanitation of the piggery should be guarded as carefully as the sanitation of a hospital. Damp and ill ventilated sleeping quarters are fatal to pigs and unless the owner will see to it that hogs always have a dry and well ventilated place to sleep he had much better keep out of the business.

Soil for Crimson Clover.

Crimson clover is best adapted to light, well-drained land. To obtain an early and heavy growth, the ground must be heavily dressed with rich, rotted manure.

Preferred Fertilizers.

Commercial fertilizers should always be bought on a guarantee of analysis, so the percentages of the various elements may be known, and so the grower may know what forms the plant foods are in. Preference should be given to fertilizers where the composition is definitely stated, because intelligent plant feeding is not possible without knowing the source of the various components of the fertilizer.

To Keep Silage.

A good way to make the ensilage keep at the top of a silo when it is filled, is to put part of a load of straw through the silo filler just before it is through the job. Then sow a pail or two of oats on the straw covering and dampen them. This covering does away with about half of the spoiled ensilage, to be thrown out after the ensilage settles.

No Place for Scrubs.

No matter whether cows are pure breds or scrubs, if they are not profitable they should have no place in the practical dairy herd

FIERCIEST BATTLE OF ALL TIME IS STILL UNDECIDED

SLIGHT ADVANTAGES GAINED FIRST ON ONE SIDE AND THEN ON THE OTHER, WITH NO DECISIVE RESULTS.

FIGHTING FRONT REACHES FROM THE OISE TO MEUSE

Skirmishing Line Also Extends Southeast Along Franco-German Frontier—Artillery Duels, Such as Never Seen Before, Are Being Carried On.

London, Sept. 22.—One of the fiercest battles of all times, which has been raging across northern France for several days past, with first a slight advantage one one side and then on the other, remains undecided. The great armies which have been fighting for a month with few, if any intermissions, have dug themselves into entrenchments on rivers and mountain ranges on a front reaching from the Oise to the Meuse, and thence southeastward along the Franco-German frontier.

Terrible Artillery Duels.

Artillery duels such as never have been seen before are being carried on with the hope of compelling the evacuation of the strongly held positions, with occasional successes to the opposing sides, while the infantry, in the face of a galling fire, have charged right up to the guns, only to make their opponents give way slightly, or to be repulsed with great losses.

Fighting has been the fiercest on the allies' left, which lies on the right bank of the Oise river in the vicinity of Rheims, the famous cathedral of which was set afire by German shells, and between that town and the Argonne ridge is has been give and take all the time.

French Claim Progress.

The French official report, however, again claims slight progress on the French left and that the allies have again repulsed strong frontal attacks between Craonne and Rheims.

Around Rheims itself matters have been about equalized, as the Germans have recaptured the heights of Brimont, while the French have taken the defences of La Pompelle. The French also have scored a success between Rheims and the Argonne, where they have taken the village of Souain and have captured numerous prisoners.

Germans Retire in Lorraine.

In addition, the French report progress on the western slopes of the Argonne, where the crown prince's army is opposed to them, while the Germans have retired beyond the frontier in Lorraine, evacuating Avricourt.

In all cases these are separate attacks and counter attacks by the armies lying in the trenches waiting for their artillery to compel the other side to slacken its fire. The losses in these attacks must be enormous, for the men cannot move a foot without being made the targets of the heavy guns posted on the hills above them.

The German cavalry has been showing considerable daring and has been trying to cut the communications of the allies between the Oise and the coast.

"No Change," Is Berlin Report.

Berlin, Sept. 22, via Rotterdam and London.—The following official statement was issued by the German headquarters staff:

"The situation in the western campaign is unchanged along the entire front. The Franco-British forces have been obliged to take the defensive in entrenched positions, the attacks upon which are slow in results."

Official Russian Report.

Petrograd, Sept. 22. — The official statement from the chief of general staff says the Russians are bombarding the fortress of Przemysl, whose artillery has opened fire. The statement follows:

Austrian Check Fails.

"The Austrian troops which attempted to check our advance in front of Baranow and Rainchow (in Galicia) were repulsed with heavy losses.

"Siege artillery is now bombarding the fortifications of Jaroslau.

"Fighting is going on against the garrison at Przemysl, who have replied with artillery fire.

Austrians Lose 35 Per Cent.

London, Sept. 22.—"It is estimated that the Austrian losses in the great battle of Galicia are as high as 35 per cent," says the Petrograd correspondent of the Times. His dispatch continues:

"There is no reliable data regarding the Russian losses, but it is believed thta they are not one-tenth of those sustained by the Austrians. This disparity is due in a great measure to the superiority of the Russian gunners. All eye-witnesses agree that the Russian regiments are admirably trained in the difficult art of controlling their fire and taking shelter."

German Defeat Reported.

In a dispatch to the Times a correspondent at Petrograd says:

"The Saxon cavalry division which recently arrived in East Prussia from France has suffered heavy losses.

"Near Sandomir, Russian Poland, the Russians again have defeated the broken remnants of the second German landwehr corps under General Woirsch. Here, evidently, the Austrians had prepared to cross the Vistula river.

Russians Approach Jaroslau.

"Javoroy, where the Russians captured 5,000 prisoners and 30 guns, is 15 miles east of Jaroslau. Thus the Russians are approaching Jaroslau also from the east and threaten to emerge at the rear of the fortress after crossing at Krsheshov.

"The relentless pursuit of the Austrians continues. The Russians are forging an iron ring around the Galician strongholds where the remnants of the Austrian armies are seeking shelter."

Army Is Cut Off.

"The Russians have cut off completely General Dankl's army, which forms the extreme left of the new battle front from Przemsyl to Cracow (Galicia) and prevented his junction with the forces under the command of General von Auffenberg. While General Dankl is retreating in a desperate attempt to reach the Crocow fortifications, the Russians are advancing from Sandomis in and endeavor to cut off that retreat as well."

Germans Are Confident.

New York, Sept. 21.—A report from the German army headquarters, made public in Berlin, announces German and Austrian successes. It is declared that in France a decisive attack is being made north of Noyon; Beaumont has been stormed and 2,500 French have been captured; while counter attacks of the allies along the entire front have been repulsed.

Unofficial advices from the German capital say that members of the general staff manifest implicit confidence in a favorable outcome of the fighting in France. Their armies are being reinforced and their lines of communication re-formed, it is stated.

Paris Is Optimistic.

Dispatches from Paris report a continued optimism there and at Bordeaux. Many who deserted Paris upon the paproach of the Germans are returning to that city.

London regards the present battle as the supreme conflict of the campaign in France.

Some observers estimate that the total casualties of the Germans and allies to date are in the neighborhood of 150,000.

Austrians Still Pursued.

London, Sept. 21.—Reports received from Petrograd say that the Russian pursuit of the Austrians continues and that the Russians have gained important successes over the Austrians' rear guard. Convoys of two army corps with 30 guns and ammunition and 5,000 prisoners are said to have been captured.

Overrun by Cossacks.

The whole of the Austrian-Russian border between Yusevoff and Annapol is reported to be overrun by Cossacks who are leading the Russian advance.

The Russian army now in Galicia will be left there to complete its work for, according to a Rome dispatch, an army of 900,000 Russians is marching into central Poland followed by another army, aggregating 2,000,000 is coming from more distant regions and will reach the front in October.

Will Soon Have 7,000,000.

There already are said to be a million Russians in Galicia and a half-million in East Prussia. While these numbers are enormous they are considered probably a fair estimate of what Russia soon will have available for her war. It is said she will soon have 7,000,000 men on the move.

Vienna Withholds News.

Vienna, via Paris, Sept. 21.—In the complete absence of satisfactory details regarding the progress of the campaign in Galicia, and along the Servian frontier, the Austrian public is awaiting some definite news as to what really is happening.

Ever since it became known that Russia was making great headway in Galicia, the comment in Vienna newspapers has been guarded, the editorials dealing chiefly with the German campaign in western Europe. The presence of 70,000 Polish refugees from Galicia, added to the constant arrival of trainloads of wounded tends to offset this reticence.

Suppress Unfavorable News.

The police recently issued a decree warning persons against spreading unfavorable war news under threats of the severest penalties. Spies are found everywhere, in cafes and on the streets, trying to overhear private conversations and then hastening to the police and denouncing suspected persons. Hundreds of arrests already have been made and many persons have been placed under more or less strict police surveillance.

HISTORIC RHEIMS IN RUINS

FAMOUS OLD CATHEDRAL AMONG BUILDINGS DESTROYED.

French Addressing Note of Protest to All Powers as Result of "So-Called Odious Vandalism."

Bordeaux, Sept. 21.—The minister of the interior, Louis J. Malvy, announces that the famous cathedral of Rheims was destroyed and all the other historic and public buildings either laid in ruins or seriously damaged during the bombardment of Rheims by the German artillery. Coupled with this announcement was a statement that the government has decided to address to all the powers a note of indignant protest against "This act of odious vandalism."

The structures which the minister said had been destroyed or ruined, included, in addition to the cathedral, the twelfth century church of St. Jacques, the fifteenth century archbishop's palace, and the city hall, dating from the seventeenth century. M. Malvy said the official reports revealed that the cathedral was in flames Sunday, the burning having begun Saturday as a result of the ceaseless bombardment.

It was officially stated that the destruction of these historic buildings was accepted as indicating that the Germans considered their situation desperate.

It is declared the greatest loss from an historical and artistic sense of the present war. Begun on the site of an earlier church, erected by Robert De Courcey in 1212, and continued at intervals down to the Fifteenth century, it has been described as "the most perfect example in grandeur and grace of gothic style in existence."

It was in the cathedral at Rheims that the successive kings of France, from Philip II to Charles X, were crowned, and it was there that the Maid of Orleans, after her victorious career, stood, banner in hand, before the great altar and saw the coronation of Charles VII, which marked the fulfillment of her vision. After kneeling before the monarch whom she had placed on the throne, "She begged the gentle king to allow her to return to her flocks."

WAR SEEN IN BRIEF.

Stubborn fighting continues to characterize the battle now extending along the entire front in France. Terrific artillery duals are going on day and night with the infantry and cavalry engaging in repeated attacks and counter attacks without, however, appreciable alteration in the positions of the opposing armies.

* * *

French reports of the battle of Aisne admit that on their left the allies were repulsed yesterday, but immediately recovered the lost ground in a desperate counter attack. Another slight gain is claimed near Rheims while the Berlin statements maintain that the allies are continuing their defensive movement.

* * *

Italy, according to reports from Rome, now has more than 500,000 men under arms.

* * *

Allies make the claim that even if defeated in the present battle it will not materially affect their fortunes, but that it is of vital importance to the Germans.

* * *

The Cathedral of Rheims, the oldest and finest in France, is reported destroyed by the German cannon.

* * *

Ten thousand German prisoners are said to be at Paris now. The daily average since the German retreat commenced is placed as between 1,000 and 1,500.

* * *

The Russian chief of staff has issued a statement claiming the repulse of the Austrian troops which attempted to check the Russian advances in front of Baronour and Ranichau, in Galicia.

* * *

Fighting is going on against the fortress of Przemsyl. The Austrians have replied with artillery fire.

Liner Carmania sinks a German liner, converted into a cruiser, off the South American coast. The cruiser Pegasus is disabled by the German cruiser Konigsberg in Zanzibar harbor.

An army of 900,000 Russians is reported as marching into central Poland, and it is said a second army of 2,000,000 will soon follow. A third army of 2,000,000 Muscovites is being gathered in distant regions and will be at the front by October.

* * *

An official communication of the German general staff, dated Berlin, Aug. 30, accuses the citizens of Louvain of a spontaneous rising after the city had surrendered.

* * *

The French and German governments are arranging through Washington for the exchange of prisoners of war, according to Paris advices.

* * *

The French people are confident of victory over the Germans in the great battle now raging along the upper reaches of the Aisne river.

* * *

A Petrograd correspondent of a London newspaper describes the awful scenes on the battlefield abandoned and along the flight of the Austrians in Galicia. Streams, he says, are choked full with slain Austrian soldiers, and thousands of bodies are piled high, awaiting burial or burning.

* * *

It is officially reported from Berlin, according to despatches from Amsterdam, that the Germans have evacuated Liege, which is no longer considered of strategic value and the troops at that point are needed to strengthen the German left.

STREAMS DAMMED WITH SLAIN

London, Sept. 19.—"The newspaper correspondents describe horrible scenes on the battlefields abandoned by the Austro-German forces last week," says the Morning Post's Petrograd correspondent.

"Streams, they say, were choked full with slain men, trodden down in the headlong flight till the waters dammed and overflowed the banks. Piles of dead are awaiting burial or burning.

Germans Claim Great Victory.

Berlin, Sept. 17.—(By wireless to New York, via Sayville, L. I.)—It was officially announced in Berlin that General von Hindenberg had telegraphed Emperor William that the Russian army of Vilna, composed of the Second, Third, Fourth and Twentieth army corps, two reserve divisions and five divisions of cavalry have been completely defeated by the Germans. The Russian casualties were heavy.

ALL NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS OF COUNTRY TO SUBSCRIBE

Plan of Apportionment Only Point of Difference at Conference—Gold Will Be Deposited in Ottawa Branch of Bank of England.

Washington, Sept. 21.—After a long conference between the federal reserve board and a committee of bankers, it was finally agreed by the board to approve the bankers' proposal for the raising of a $100,000,000 gold fund to be used in meeting American obligations to Europe. This fund will be in addition to the $80,000,000 to be raised by the New York bankers' syndicate to meet New York city's obligations across the Atlantic.

No Final Action Taken.

Final action was not taken by the board. The plan has been presented in writing, but its adoption may not come up before Tuesday in the absence of several members over the week-end.

Probably $25,000,000 of the total amount will be asked for at once and members of the board were confident that such a sum will prove sufficient to meet all demands.

National banks throughout the country will be asked to subscribe to the fund as in the original plan of the bankers.

To Be Deposited in Canada.

The gold will be deposited in the Ottawa branch of the Bank of England. In virtually all respects the proposal of the bankers agreed with those made several weeks ago before the New York syndicate which underwrote the New York debts.

Members of the board and bankers were agreed that while possibly only a small part of the fund will be actually needed or transferred to foreign creditors, the moral effect upon the business world will be marked. They were in accord that the world should be given notice that the United States is able and willing to pay its obligations in gold. The effect, not only in Europe, but in the United States, in the opinion of those in conferences, may be decidedly good and probably will lead to a betterment in financial conditions.

No List of Obligations.

No actual list of the obligations to Europe of American bankers and merchants have been obtained to date, although committees of clearing house associations throughout the country are at work to secure this information. Reports from national banks showing the exact amount of gold in their hands also are expected within a short time.

About the only point of difference between the bankers and the board was as to how the banks shall be asked to make their contributions. The bankers asked that the board apportion the amounts to be contributed. Members of the board pointed out, however, that it had no authority for such action and merely could approve the bankers' plan. It was suggested that the bankers themselves make the apportionment, but the matter was left undecided.

MEMPHIS CARS CRASH; 9 DIE

Memphis, Tenn., Sept. 19.—Nine persons are known to have been killed and more than 15 injured when an Illinois Central freight train crashed into a street car containing about 35 passengers near Binghamton, a suburb of Memphis.

The wrecked car, a trailer, was hurled over an embankment and the foremost freight cars toppled over on it. The motor car was not struck.

The dead are all residents of Memphis and its suburb.

Movements of Jap Forces.

Tokio, Sept. 21.—The Japanese imperial troops, co-operating with the Japanese fleet, landed at Laoshan Bay, Sept. 18, according to official announcement. The cavalry on Sept. 17 captured Kiao-chow station and seized a train. Among the passengers was the president of the Shan-tung railway, who was made a prisoner. The Shan-tung railway is German-owned and was opened in 1904. The main line extends from Tsing-tau west to Teinan.

Colon Naval Battle Denied.

Colon, Sept. 18.—There is no truth in the report published in the United States that there has been a naval engagement off Colon. The report that there had been a battle at sea arose from the fact that the big guns on Toro point were being fired for testing purposes. Toro point is on Margarita island, the fortifications of which constitute the chief part of the Colon end of the canal defenses. It is not believed here that there are any British or German warships near the isthmus.

NO NEW PEACE DEVELOPMENTS

BELIEVED PRESIDENT WILL ABANDON EFFORTS FOR TIME.

Great Britain Has Nothing to Say, Intimating Proposals Must Come From Austria or Germany.

Washington, Sept. 21.—Great Brittain has received no proposal for peace, either direct or indirect, from Germany or Austria, and, therefore, has nothing to say on the subject.

This was the substance of a message received by Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, the British ambassador here, from Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign secretary. The ambassador had inquired whether any proposal of peace was before his government in view of the persistent rumors from Berlin that peace proposals were being exchanged.

Coincident with the receipt of this information from Great Britain it was learned authoritatively that President Wilson had not pursued either with Great Britain, France or Russia, the informal suggestion of the imperial German chancellor that "It was up to the United States to obtain a statement of peace terms from the allies."

At the White House the view was expressed that the president had practically abandoned the idea of carrying further the informal peace movement begun 10 days ago in a conversation between Oscar Strauss and Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador. He has decided to await a definite expression of terms from some one of the belligerents, feeling that it would be inconsistent with American neutrality to press any of the belligerents to make overtures to the others.

Austrian Denial Commented On.

Rome, via Paris, Sept. 19.—An Austrian official denial from Vienna that any initiative toward peace has been taken by Austria is causing much comment here because it contains no assurance that peace would be concluded with Germany. The Austro-German treaty originally contained a clause specifying that the two countries should act reciprocally.

WOULD TIRE DISSENTERS OUT

Final Effort Made to Break Filibuster Against Rivers Appropriation Bill.

Washington, Sept. 21.—In a final effort to break the determined filibuster against the river and harbor appropriation bill, senate leaders had the sergeant-at-arms sent to round up absentees for an all-night session.

A proposed compromise, contemplating a $20,000,000 lump sum appropriation for rivers and harbors improvements as a substitute for the pending bill, evoked little enthusiasm from river and harbor advocates, who decided that a continuous session should be held in the hope of tiring out the members trying to talk the bill to death.

War Worries Apple Growers.

Washington, Sept. 19.—Present indications are that the commercial apple crop of the United States this year will be far in excess of that of last year, but less than that of 1912 by several million barrels, according to announcement made by the department of agriculture. Department officials say the problem of distribution will be somewhat complex, owing to conditions resulting from the European war. Attention, however, is called to the fact that in normal times Europe takes less than two million barrels.

$2,689 a Minute for War.

London, Sept. 18.—The cost of the war up to Wednesday, including the losses resulting from commercial paralysis, has been $11,265,000,000, according to figures compiled here. The cost to England alone, based on figures covering 43 days from Aug. 1, has been $166,500,000. This is at the rate of $3,872,093 a day, $161,337 an hour and $2,689 a minute.

Give Tea to Allies.

Petrograd, Sept. 19.—Japanese tea merchants of the Russian capital have presented the Russian army with 100,000 pounds of tea. Two hundred thousand pounds were given to the English and French armies, and 20,000 pounds to the Belgian army.

Lusitania As Troop Transport.

New York, Sept. 19.—The Cunard liner Lusitania, from Liverpool, reached its pier here under wireless orders received as it was nearing port, according to passengers, ordering it to make all possible speed, unload its passengers and be ready to sail for Halifax to act as a transport for Canadian troops.

Exchange of Prisoners Sought.

Paris, Sept. 21.—The French and German governments are arranging through Washington for the exchange of prisoners of war. It is understood that James W. Gerard, the American ambassador to Germany, has cabled Germany's approval of the plan.

U. S. Socks Prevent "Cold Feet."

London, Sept. 19.—Socks patterned after the design of the American flag are on sale here. They are guaranteed to prevent "cold feet." One purveyor asserted that the "Uncle Sam" socks were meant to establish the identity of Americans going on continental missions. Stripes run from top to bottom of the socks with the exception of three rows of stars on a blue field just above the angle. It was argued by one merchant that no passport would be needed for the wearer of such creations.

FARMER'S WIFE TOO ILL TO WORK

A Weak, Nervous Sufferer Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Kasota, Minn.—"I am glad to say that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done more for me than anything else, and I had the best physician here. I was so weak and nervous that I could not do my work and suffered with pains low down in my right side for a year or more. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and now I feel like a different person. I believe there is nothing like Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for weak women and young girls, and I would be glad if I could influence anyone to try the medicine, for I know it will do all and much more than it is claimed to do."—Mrs. CLARA FRANKS, R. F. D. No. 1, Maplecrest Farm, Kasota, Minn.

Women who suffer from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should be convinced of the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health by the many genuine and truthful testimonials we are constantly publishing in the newspapers.

If you have the slightest doubt that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will help you, write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, and held in strict confidence.

WILL BE EXPENDED WISELY

For the benefit of the numerous organizations who helped to sell nearly forty-five million Red Cross seals last year and for the general public, the American Red Cross and the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis have framed a definition of anti-tuberculosis work showing how the proceeds from these holiday stickers are to be used. The definition limits the expenditure of money only for the year ending April 30, 1915.

The definition was framed at a recent meeting of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis and states that the term "anti-tuberculosis work" as it relates to the expenditure of Red Cross seal money shall include the following activities:

1. The construction of hospitals or sanatoria for the care of the tuberculous.
2. The maintenance of the tuberculous.
3. The provision of day or night camps for the tuberculous; the provision and maintenance of dispensaries, visiting nurses, open air schools, fresh air classes, or preventoria for the care or treatment of tuberculosis cases or for the prevention of the spread of tuberculosis.
4. The maintenance of educational or legislative activities which have for their object the prevention of infection with tuberculosis.

It Ought to Be.

"What are you going to call the new baby?"

"Reginald Claude," replied Mr. Bliggins.

"Isn't Reginald Claude a rather affected name?"

"Yes, I want him to grow up to be a fighter, and I fancy that Reginald Claude will start something every time he goes to a new school."—London Opinion.

SICK DOCTOR
Proper Food Put Him Right.

The food experience of a physician in his own case when worn and weak from sickness and when needing nourishment the worst way, is valuable:

"An attack of grip, so severe it came near making an end of me, left my stomach in such condition I could not retain any ordinary food. I knew of course that I must have food nourishment or I could never recover.

"I began to take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day and for 2 weeks this was almost my only food. It tasted so delicious that I enjoyed it immensely and my stomach handled it perfectly from the first mouthful. It was so nourishing I was quickly built back to normal health and strength.

"Grape-Nuts is of great value as food to sustain life during serious attacks in which the stomach is so deranged it cannot digest and assimilate other foods.

"I am convinced that were Grape-Nuts more widely used by physicians, it would save many lives that are otherwise lost from lack of nourishment." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The most perfect food in the world. Trial of Grape-Nuts and cream 10 days proves. "There's a Reason."

State News of General Interest

RIVER COMMERCE BOOSTERS MEET

PUBLICLY-OWNED DOCKS AND TERMINALS HELD PRESENT NEED OF CITIES.

OPPORTUNITY NOW AT HAND

Opening of Panama Canal and Impetus Given by European War Declared to Be Causes for Immediate Action for Best Results.

Stillwater.—The thirteenth annual convention of the Upper Mississippi River Improvement association was held in this city. J. G. Armson of the Minnesota tax commission called the meeting to order Wednesday and the address of welcome on the part of the state was delivered by Governor A. O. Eberhart and for the city of Stillwater by E. D. Buffington. The response on behalf of the association was made by L. A. Hamill, vice president for Iowa.

Keynote of Speeches.

With the six-foot channel assured and modern barge lines coming into operation, the speakers pointed out that all that is now needed to create great river commerce is publicly-owned docks and terminals. The opening of the Panama canal and the impetus given by the European war to new trade with South America were cited to show imperative need for immediate building of modern terminals by all cities that would share in the new trade.

Governor Points Out Need.

Governor Eberhart touched on this idea in his address of welcome. He also showed the great need of the Northwest for greater shipping facilities which only the waterways can supply.

The report of President Wilkinson dealt with what is being done in securing a six-foot channel in the Mississippi river between New Orleans and Minneapolis.

The governor pointed out the necessity of improved waterways and spoke of the entire new system of transportation throughout this country that must inevitably result from the opening of the Panama canal. He told of the necessity for work on the part of the northwest, which will be handicapped unless both rail and water transportation facilities can be had.

Sullivan Explains Canal Project.

Senator George H. Sullivan, who is deeply interested in a canal project between Lake Superior and the Mississippi river, delivered an address on "The Story of the Canal," dealing with the proprosed project since its beginning. Mr. Sullivan demonstrated by facts and figures that the canal is feasible from an engineering standpoint, and that it would be a great boon to the business interests of the northwest by reason of cheapened transportation.

REMEMBERS HIS HOME TOWN

Dr. H. S. Wellcome Also Will Present Library Park and Playground to Garden City.

Mankato.—Garden City, a small village of this county, is to have a public library park and playgrounds as the gift of Dr. Henry S. Wellcome, of London, England, a former resident of Garden City, in memory of his parents, who were pioneer residents. It is understood that he will spare no expense in making the park an elaborate beauty spot.

Dr. Wellcome is a manufacturer of chemicals. He is at the present conducting scientific explorations in the Soudan, Africa. For some years he was at the head of the American society in London. Before going to England he had large laboratories at Philadelphia. He is a graduate of the Mankato state normal school.

Fight Over Girl Fatal.

Fairmont.—William Ryan quarreled with Claus Greis at the farm of the latter's brother north of Gruver, Iowa, over a sister-in-law of the farmer, with whom both were infatuated, and in the fight Greis was fatally stabbed with a butcher knife. Ryan gave himself up to the sheriff near here and was taken to the jail at Estherville. He contends that he struck Greis while defending himself.

Cornered, Bandit Kills Self.

Marshall. — An unidentified man, about 25 years old, held up two working men at a Great Northern crossing here, ran through the outskirts of the city and pulled a gun on former Mayor Davis. Then he dashed through the river into a cornfield, with a deputy sheriff and a posse in hot pursuit. Routed from the cornfield, he ran through some plowing and fired at a man on horseback. When the posse closed in, the bandit shot himself with a revolver. He had been seen about town, but was not known to anyone here.

TO FURNISH SPECIAL TRAIN

Democrats in Ninth Plan Whirlwind Campaign for Hammond—Trip to Be Taken in October.

St. Paul.—The Democrats of the Ninth congressional district have promised to furnish the state committee with a special train to take W. S. Hammond, candidate for governor, and other party nominees through that section on a campaign tour.

This announcement was made by Senator Samuel D. Works, treasurer of the state organization, on his return from Crookston. The trip will be taken late in October.

The special will start at Crookston and run through to Warroad on the Great Northern, stopping at all towns. Returning to Thief River Falls, a night meeting will be held, and the following day the train will be switched to the Soo line running north through Karlstad and at St. Vincent the Great Northern main line south will be used through Hallock to Crookston, where a big night meeting is planned.

From there it is hoped that arrangements can be made to continue over the Great Northern east across the state to Grand Rapids, stopping at Erskine, McIntosh, Fosston, Bagley, Bemidji, Cass Lake, Bena, Deer River and Cohasset.

From Grand Rapids the tour through the Iron Range will begin, and twenty-two towns in this district will be visited.

STATE W. C. T. U. AT RED WING

Annual Convention Program of Unusual Interest Arranged for Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Red Wing.—The Minnesota members of the Woman's Christian Temperance union will be the guests of Red Wing. The annual convention of the state organization will open in this city on Wednesday morning and continue over Friday. It is expected that at least 200 W. C. T. U. workers will be in attendance.

The program arranged for the event is one of especial interest, prominent local as well as out-of-town speakers having been secured to make addresses. Mrs. Florence D. Richards of Columbus, Ohio, one of the most prominent temperance workers in the country, will be the guest of the state convention and will give a number of addresses on Thursday.

The chairmen of the convention committees are as follows: General, Mrs. Susia W. Stageberg; entertainment, Mrs. Ella Edstrom; decoration, Mrs. Lizzie Anderson; advertising, Mrs. Julia B. Nelson; music, Miss Alma Woodcock; reception, Mrs. Sarah Hasler.

OPPOSED TAX ON FREIGHT

Winona.—Congressman Sidney Anderson was among those who opposed the freight rate tax considered by congress. In response to a remonstrance to the enactment of the tax sent to him by the Manufacturers' and Jobbers' bureau of the Winona Association of Commerce, he replied:

"I have been opposed to the freight tax from the first. Am glad to say it will not be included in the revenue bill now contemplated. Letter follows."

A similar remonstrance was sent by the Winona association to Congressman Hammond, and he has replied:

"Telegram received. There will be no tax on freight."

BOOST TEACHERS' PENSIONS

Vigorous and Systematic Campaign Will Be Waged During Coming Months.

Winona.—A vigorous and systematic campaign will be waged in Minnesota during the coming few months in the interests of state-wide teachers' pension legislation.

Miss Frances Smith of Winona chairman of a committee, reports that inquiry among teachers shows a great majority indorses the movement. Of 65 candidates for the legislature, 46 express approval of the measure, 5 were opposed, and the rest were noncommittal.

Miss Smith's reports will be presented at the October annual meeting of the State Educational association.

Think Hunters Spread Cholera.

Mankato.—The Riverside Farmers' club, north of this city, has posted thirty-five square miles, forbidding shooting or trespass of any kind. One object is to protect the farmers from hog cholera, which, it is contended, is spread by the running of hunting dogs.

Fell On Fork Handle; Dies.

Minot.—Tosten Tostenson, aged 52 years, a well known farmer living near Voltaire, who was fatally injured when he fell on a pitchfork, died at St. John's hospital as a result of the accident. The body was shipped to St. Peter, Minn., his old home, for burial. Mr. Tostenson was brought here from Velva. He was oiling a machine in preparation for farm work and was standing on one of the wheels when he lost his balance. He fell directly on the handle of a fork.

NORMALS COST $399,322.82

St. Cloud.—Financial statements for the five state normal schools, presented to the state normal board, in session at St. Cloud, show that this branch of Minnesota's school system cost $399,322.81 during the school year of 1913-14 exclusive of the new buildings and that there will be available for the current school year $486,967.56. This amount includes $80,000 for a dormitory at St. Cloud and $70,000 for a new building at Duluth.

The legislative appropriation for the year was $280,000 and in addition the normal school received $5,061 from the swamp land fund, $23,297 from miscellaneous sources and had a balance of $1,388 from the previous year.

The appropriations available for the current year, not including miscellaneous receipts are summarized as follows:

	Balance Aug. 1, 1914	1915 Appropriation	Total
Winona ..	$2,901.37	$68,450	$71,351.37
Moorhead	3,365.10	70,850	74,215.10

The principal business of the state board was to prepare the budget for the years 1915-16 and 1916-17 for presentation to the legislature.

RYE FEARS SET AT REST

Government Says Not Enough Ergot in Minnesota Grain to Bar It From Market, as Feared.

Fergus Falls.—Circular letters from commission houses have been received here advising dealers against the purchase of rye on the ground that almost the entire crop is affected with ergot, a dangerous poison and is subject to confiscation in transit by the United States government. As a result, some of the elevators here and in other parts of the Northwest have been refusing to buy rye.

A letter received from H. P. Bjorge of the state board of grain appeals, announces that there is little or no basis for the scare. He advises dealers to buy rye as heretofore, but suggests that farmers clean out as much of the ergot as possible before bringing the rye to market.

The federal department has informed Mr. Bjorge the rye samples sent by him contain a trifle less than two-tenth of 1 per cent.

"You can readily see that this is scarcely enough to be harmful," the letter says, "although the continued use of rye of this character might lead to bad results. Poultry and herbivorous animals withstand much larger quantities of ergot than man or carnivorous animals."

CELEBRATE HILL'S BIRTHDAY

Veteran Employes of Great Northern Observe Seventy-sixth Anniversary of Empire Builder.

St. Paul.—Celebrating the 76th birthday anniversary of J. J. Hill, more than 400 veteran employes of the Great Northern railroad met Wednesday in the Masonic Temple for a reception, banquet and the annual meeting of the Great Northern Veterans' association.

A bouquet of seventy-six American beauty roses was presented to the empire builder at the reception. This custom has been followed for several years. The guests of honor at the reception included Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Slade, Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Hill and Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Hill.

Following the banquet the annual election of officers and other business was transacted. Of the 530 members of the veterans' association, more than four hundred men from all states, from Minnesota to the Pacific coast, attended.

GET NO NEW DORMITORIES

Mankato and Winona Pleas for Normal Fall on Deaf Ears This Year.

St. Cloud.—President Shoemaker of the local normal school and Contractor Hirt went to St. Paul to consult with state officials in an effort to shave $10,000 from the cost of the new dormitory planned for St. Cloud. The contract price was close to $90,000.

At a meeting of the normal board here the budget for the state schools were discussed. An increase of nearly $150,000 is requested.

The board rejected the applications of Mankato and Winona for new dormitories, deciding that the present ones would have to do for a while. The increase in the budget provides for no new buildings, only for running expenses.

Sugar Agent Swindles Farmers.

St. Cloud.—Sheriff Ben Schroener has been notified that the "sugar man" who has been operating in other parts of the state was in the vicinity of Paynesville last week where he procured much money from the farmers by representing that he can sell sugar at five dollars a sack, the buyer to pay half the amount down and the balance on delivery. The amount paid down, it is said, is appropriated by the agent, the sugar fails to arrive and the purchaser finally awakes to the fact he has been "stung."

KING ASSENTS TO HOME RULE

SUCCESS OF IRISH BILL CAUSES ENTHUSIASM.

Welsh Church and Emergency Measures Also Become Laws—All Sing "God Save the King."

London, Sept. 21.—Enthusiasm unusual in the staid legislative chambers of Westminster palace was displayed when the two houses of parliament were prorogued.

While King George was absent inspecting the troops his speech was read in the house of lords by Viscount Haldane, the lord high chancellor, and in the house of commons by John H. Whitley, the deputy speaker.

When the announcement was made in the house of lords that the royal assent had been given to the Irish home rule and the Welsh church disestablishment suspensory bill and to a number of emergency measures, cheers were given for the passing of the Irish and Welsh bills.

On the announcement of the passing of the Irish home rule bill in the house of commons the nationalists and liberals broke into loud cheers which were repeated again and again.

Will Crooks, the labor leader, asked if it was in order to sing "God Save the King." Without waiting for permission he started the first verse himself and then broke down with emotion. The anthem was taken up by the spectators in the gallery as well as by the members, and the singing was heard in the palace yard.

As the members filed out of the chamber, Mr. Crooks called out: "God save Ireland."

Parliament will sit again Oct. 27.

Mr. Redmond, who was the recipient of many warm congratulations in the lobbies of the house after adjournment, left later in the day for Ireland, where he will take part in the recruiting campaign.

SUGGEST U. S.-JAP ALLIANCE

Tokio, Sept. 19.—A notable demonstration of friendship toward the United States was made at a dinner given by the Japanese association, which was attended by Takaaki Kato, the Japanese foreign minister, and George W. Guthrie, the United States ambassador.

Viscount Kentaro Kaneko, president of the association, in a speech scored those persons who, he said, were trying to estrange the United States and Japan.

"Japan not only will not attack the Philippines," said Viscount Kaneko, "but she never had any idea of disturbing the tranquillity of the territorial waters of the Philippines. Our friendship will be as firm and immovable as historic Plymouth Rock.

Other speakers suggested an alliance between the United States and Japan for the preservation of peace in the Pacific.

MRS. FRANK LESLIE PASSES

Woman, Long Known as Publisher and Writer, Succumbs to Heart Disease.

New York, Sept. 21.—Mrs. Frank Leslie (the Baroness de Bazus) died in apartments in an uptown hotel here. She was the widow of Frank Leslie, the publisher, who died in 1880, and has herself since been prominent in the publishing world.

An acute attack of heart trouble was the cause of Mrs. Leslie's death.

After the death of her husband, in 1880, she succeeded to his business, straightened out the affairs of the Leslie publications, and made them financial successes.

In 1902 she sold her publishing interests and resumed the family name of the Baroness de Bazus, a French title which belonged to her ancestors for many generations.

Another German Prince Shot.

London, Sept. 21.—An Exchange Telegraph dispatch from The Hague says a message received from Berlin states that Prince August William, the fourth son of Emperor William, was shot in the left arm during the battle of the Marne, and that Emperor William has bestowed the Iron Cross of the first class on him.

Prussian Guard Obliterated.

London, Sept. 21.—The Paris correspondent of the Exchange Telegraph company says: "All accounts received in Paris agree that the famous Prussian Guards corps, the elite of the empire and the especial pride of the German emperor, has been practically blotted out in the battles which have been waged along the Meuse, Marne and the Aisne rivers."

Visits Razed Belgian City.

London, Sept. 18.—The Antwerp correspondent of the Post who visited Termonde, one of the razed cities of Belgium, found that out of 1,500 houses not 100 remained. Hospitals and churches were all burned. Termonde, adds the correspondent, was burned for much the same reason as Louvain. On Sept. 4 a German force came back from the field after having been severely handled by the Belgians, and the German commander exclaimed: "It is our duty to burn them down!"

BY W. G. HUNT.

Congressman Steenerson has returned from his trip to Europe on a peace mission, as there is plenty of peace (?) over there now to satisfy the most blood thirsty monarchs of those nations.

If the European war continues for six months more the high cost of living will surely be reduced, for there will only be widows and children left to eat, for all the able bodied men will be killed off.

We see that O'Neil is calling himself "Dad." We suppose he means "Dad" of the Normal School at Bemidji, or maybe he means "Dad" of some of those drainage laws that he fathered in the last legislature.

There is a good deal of talk about getting after those people who make the war an excuse for artificially raising prices. It may seem a little impatient, but what the public would like to see is a little more action and not quite so much talk of what is intended. So far the inflation continues unimpeded, and it works a hardship on the man of limited salary.—The McIntosh Times.

It is amusing to read some of the praise given Congressman Hammond for sticking to his job, by some of the sore head Eberhart supporters. If it was right for Eberhart to leave his job to go galivating around the country on lecturing tours, it had ought to be proper for Hammond to leave his duties long enough at Washington to tell the people of Minnesota how he stands on some of the vital issues of this campaign. Perhaps he does not dare to tread on Minnesota soil, at this time for fear of putting his foot "in it."

It is with considerable local pride that we call attention to our candidate for the state senate, to be sure Mr. Hansen is now one of the first business men of Thief River Falls, but we can never forget that he was for many years a resident of St. Hilaire, one of us, and though identified with larger business interests in the city up the river, still retains his interest in our community. Mr. Hansen is so well known to our people that he needs no introduction and no remarks of ours could give him a higher place in the esteem of our people than he possesses at present. It will be a matter of satisfaction when the election is over to know that we have a man to represent us in the state senate who so thoroughly understands the needs of the community as Mr. Hansen and whose interests are so bound up with our own that in serving us he also serves himself.—St. Hilaire Spectator.

President Wilson last Friday recommended the appointment of John Morgan as postmaster for Thief River Falls. Mr. Morgan is one of the pioneer residents of the city and has always been a staunch Democrat and the appointment will undoubtedly receive the approval of the local Democrats. The recommendation will have to go thru the formalty of being considered by the Senate before Mr. Morgan will enter upon his duties.—Thief River Falls Times.

This appointment will meet with the approval of a majority of the citizens of Thief River Falls, and is certainly due Mr. Morgan, as he has always been a staunch Democrat and a man of good moral character, and we hope. The Times will not say that he should not have been appointed because he was a Democrat, which is given as their strongest reason for their opposition to Kjomme for county attorney, But they don't mention the fact that their candidate for this office is a Socialist.

The Thief River Falls News-Press devotes at least two columns of editorial space to an article entitled, "Should Return Fasel." A little later on we will show why he should not be returned to office by the votes of the ditch tax paying farmers However "go to it" Mr. Cutter, we are pleased to note that A. H. begins to appreciate newspaper space. We will undoubtedly comment on the article a little later on, and show how easy it would be to get along without Fasel if we had a better man in his place, one that would occasionally consider a ditch tax paying farmer somewhere equal to a ditch contractor and a bonding company.

Quite Musical.

"Is your daughter fond of music?" "Terribly fond of it," replied Mr. Cumrox. "No matter how it sounds she seems to like it."—Washington Star.

There seems to be more September plowing being done this year than in former years, as the farmers are greatly encouraged by the arrival of a nearer market by the Electric Line, and the prospect of good prices next year.

Oscar Swanson of Rudell was up this way yesterday looking after thrashing jobs, as he has completed all the work he has to do down that way, except flax thrashing. The farmers up here have not completed their flax cutting and stacking yet, and do not want to thrash until they can do all of their thrashing at one time.

Owing to our being busy with other work, and the late arrival of that wonderful write up of Fasel in the News-Press, we can not answer this week, but next week we will show up some of the wonderful qualifications of Mr. Fasel's, and ask him how he came to make so many errors in the delinquint tax list that it had to be republished at the expense of the tax payers.

Returned From Vacation.

Miss Theoline B. Goodwin, candidate for County Superintendent of Schools, returned Tuesday from her vacation spent in different parts of northern Minnesota. Miss Goodwin now intends to get into the campaign in earnest and will make a "get acquainted" canvas of the county. Her success as an instructor in our city schools makes her feel justified in seeking the office and gives her confidence in the out-come of the election. Miss Goodwin is quite grieved at the unfair tactics that have been used by her opponents, notably the statement that she had turned from her Lutheran faith and become a Catholic. Miss Goodwin is a very staunch believer in religious tolerance and does not think that it would be a very terrible thing to be a Catholic as long as a person is a good Catholic. She is, however, a member of the Norwegian Lutheran church but feels so kindly toward other denominations that her face has often been seen in other congregations. Miss Goodwin is entitled to fair play and we should all look with disfavor upon any unfair methods of campaign that might be used against her.—Thief River Falls Times.

An Infallible Sign.

Whenever Robert's mother went away on a visit the little fellow was so badly spoiled by a doting father and grandmother that upon her return it took several applications of the rod to mend his ways.

One day when she had been absent for a week a neighbor asked Robert when his mother was coming home.

"Oh, she'll be back very soon now," he replied. "I'm beginning to get pretty bad."—New York Post.

Porfirio Diaz's Poetic Prophecy.

President Porfirio Diaz, who ruled over Mexico for more than a quarter of a century as an absolute dictator, believed that only such iron rule could bring peace and progress to the half civilized millions of that country. Several years ago, when his power was still unbroken, an American who was on intimate terms with him ventured to suggest that the Mexicans were now prepared for a more liberal form of government and hinted that his rule was too severe. The stern old man stiffened his gaunt figure and ran his fingers through his locks, now white with years.

"When these snows melt," he said prophetically, "the mud will be deep in Mexico."—Youth's Companion.

CHAPTER X.

Mine Enemy Intervenes.

(A war of wits, in which I learn that I am very much married indeed.)

I stepped briskly out of my aeroplane and walked over to Zeuxis, who still crouched abjectly before me. As I advanced the superstitious Corsicans gave way again and retreated before me, running in all directions in fear of my supernatural descent from the realms of the heavens. Small wonder; this was the first aeroplane that had ever entered the island. To them I must have appeared none other than some saint, made manifest out of the clouds.

The sight of Zeuxis unnerved me, but for a moment only. At all costs I must keep the dominance that I had won. But six and thirty hours remained at most before I must begin my return flight to France; and during that brief time I must obtain the bonds from him, and then, by hook or crook, so work upon his mind that he would consent to brave the perils of the return flight with me, to give that evidence which would save Charles from the ignominious fate of a traitor.

I stepped toward him and touched him on the shoulder. "Get up!" I said. Then, as he obeyed, like a man dazed, I added in louder tones so that the listening Corsicans might hear:

"Have you not hospitality enough to offer shelter to such an old friend as I?"

"Yes, yes, mademoiselle," he stammered. "Permit me to conduct you to my house. It is but a poor one—not such as you have been used to—but, if you will condescend, lady—"

"Lead the way!" I answered, stifling a desperate inclination to burst into hysterical laughter. As Zeuxis dragged himself along the straggling road, I at his elbow, and the villagers following at a respectful distance, I cast a glance backward to the aeroplane. I did not like to leave it there. But where else could I take it? I felt confident that superstition would restrain any of the inhabitants of Scouto from laying hands upon it, and then perforce dismissed the matter from my mind. At the very end of the road we turned into a small cottage, a peasant's hovel, containing but two rooms, yet not uncomfortably furnished in their primitive fashion. A tallow candle was burning upon a small table. At the door a dark-browed woman stood and glared sullenly at me before stepping aside and permitting me to enter.

I knew whom she must be. This was the woman for whose sake the Greek spy had deserted his wife in Paris, the woman of whom Mme. Zeuxis had told me.

"You—you will eat, mademoiselle?" faltered my involuntary host.

Indeed I would, for I was famishing. At a few words from Zeuxis the woman stepped into the kitchen, returning with a bowl of curdled goat's milk, a dish of black beans and some rye bread, which she placed before me on the table. I made a hearty meal. When I looked up at last, satisfied, a throng of Corsicans was gathered around the door.

I advanced to the threshold. "Begone!" I cried, in Italian. They scuttled away like hares. Zeuxis and I were alone together again, the woman having sullenly retired into the kitchen after removing the remains of the repast. I closed the door and began speaking in French to him.

"You know why I have come?" I demanded.

"Signorina — mademoiselle, have mercy," he pleaded. "You will not betray me? All the spies of France are on my track. I have repented, truly. I have burned eighteen candles before the shrine of St. Christopher! I have—"

I cut him short.

"Do you know," I began, "that an innocent man stands in danger of being convicted of having sold the treaty?"

He nodded. "Let him suffer," he answered. "That is between himself and Magniff. I was only Magniff's tool. And he betrayed me, the scoundrel!" he continued, gritting his teeth in rage. "But just wait, mademoiselle. Wait till the spies have forgotten me. Do you know what I shall do? I shall creep back to Paris, so softly that none will know, and I shall draw my sharp knife across Leopold Magniff's throat so"—he imitated the action—"in revenge for the money that he stole from me."

His words gave me the clue that I had been searching for.

"Suppose I promised you an amnesty," I hazarded. "If I tell you that you will not be molested, would you be willing to return to Paris with me and to give evidence which will save the Chevalier d'Yves from a shameful conviction?"

He peered at me as if not understanding, or suspecting treachery.

"Will you come back with me tomorrow in the aeroplane?" I continued.

Zeuxis uttered a scream.

"The aeroplane?" he cried. "Never! I should die of terror. I would go, perhaps, in a ship—if I were offered money enough," he said, watching me greedily.

I had been noticing that his eyes continually strayed toward a small chest which rested in a far corner of the room. It was evidently no part of the original furnishings, being comparatively new, while those were black with age; and from the manner in which the Greek's glance had repeatedly fallen on it I formed a conclusion.

"Zeuxis," I said briskly, "go over to that chest and bring me my bonds."

He stared and leaped suddenly upon his feet.

"Mademoiselle, I have not your bonds," he stammered. "There is nothing there but carpenter's tools. I swear to you—"

I rose and strode over to the chest. The lid was locked.

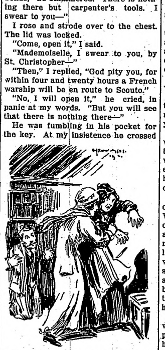
"Come, open it," I said.

"Mademoiselle, I swear to you, by St. Christopher—"

"Then," I replied, "God pity you, for within four and twenty hours a French warship will be en route to Scouto."

"No, I will open it," he cried, in panic at my words. "But you will see that there is nothing there—"

He was fumbling in his pocket for the key. At my insistence he crossed the room, fitted the key and turned the tongue of the lock willingly. I looked inside. There was nothing there but carpenters' tools.



A Small Knife, Keen as a Razor, Clattered to the Floor.

I took out an adz, a saw, and a hammer—a curiously fashioned hammer, for the haft was much too large for the head, and had evidently been fitted recently. I tapped it hard upon the floor and it flew off across the room, exposing a hollow space that ran clear through to the point of the handle. Inside were some papers, tightly rolled. I drew them forth with difficulty and glanced at them.

For the first time I held my cherished bonds, the cause of so many tribulations.

Meanwhile Zeuxis had stood watching me with an expression of the utmost discomfiture. As I drew forth the papers he fell upon his knees and clasped my hands.

"Yes, they are yours," he pleaded. "Take them! Take them as the price of my liberty, mademoiselle, and leave me. I have been harassed and persecuted for the sake of them; and what am I now? Once I roamed the boulevards a free man, rattling the money in my pockets—now I am a wretched fugitive, hunted like a fox, and all because I was overpersuaded by an unscrupulous rascal. Take them as the price of my liberty and go. Go, go, go, go!"

He repeated the word in a crescendo of wrath and fear. I drew back and looked down at him steadily.

"The price of your liberty is your evidence in Paris," I answered, and I saw his face turn green by the candle light.

Suddenly a compelling instinct made me turn my head. Behind me was the woman; she had emerged silently from the inner room and now stood over me, in the attitude of an avenging fury, as though about to strike. I sprang on her and twisted the arm that she concealed behind her back. A small knife, keen as a razor, clattered to the floor.

As I confronted her she broke into a torrent of furious words, incomprehensible to me, with frantic gesticulations.

At that moment there came a loud knocking at the street door, and without waiting for admittance a man, attired in the cassock of a priest, entered unceremoniously and advanced toward us. His keen eyes seemed to take in everything. Calm, benignant and authoritative, he advanced toward us, a dominating presence, and raised his hand solemnly. Zeuxis and the woman fell upon their knees. For a while he spoke with them in Italian, in words which I could not follow. A few sharp, expostulating phrases broke from the woman's lips. Presently she began weeping noisily.

Then the priest turned to me and addressed me in bad French which came to his lips haltingly:

"My daughter," he began, "you have heard it said that 'the wages of sin is death.' Your husband has sinned against you grievously, and, had he died, he would assuredly have suffered that death of the soul which is the penalty for all who are cut off from the ministrations of the church. But now, since he repents, I bid you take him back and pardon him."

My husband! Zeuxis? I was too astounded to utter a word. The priest resumed:

"Those ignorant peasants think you are an immortal. But I am a scientist and I know that you have flown from France in one of the new airships to win back the vagrant love of the man with whom you plighted your troth. Marriage is a sacrament, my daughter; it cannot be dissolved this side of the grave. Mademoiselle Torlando has consented to relinquish him to you. Forgive him; he will return to France with you. Or, if he refuse—"

He spoke in Italian again and seemed to thunder forth some terrible anathema. The woman bowed her head and wept wildly.

I understood then. The good priest, knowing that Zeuxis had abandoned his lawful wife in France, imagined that I was she, and that the purport of my visit had been to win back the rascal's love.

Indignation overpowered me; then the humor of the situation came to my aid and saved me.

"You agree to accompany me?" I asked the Greek.

"Yes, yes," he muttered hastily. "But not in the aeroplane."

"And that will not be necessary," the priest replied, "for a yacht has just arrived in the harbor from Marseilles, and doubtless passage can be procured on it. I will recommend you," he added confidently.

As he turned to comfort the weeping woman I whispered to Zeuxis hastily:

"You will come, then? Remember, the government guarantees you an amnesty, provided you give evidence. But you must tell all."

Zeuxis clenched his fists. "Aye, I will come," he muttered back, "And then—I shall seek out my enemy and with my knife—" He stopped to gather his thoughts. "On the yacht—yes, but not in the aeroplane," he concluded.

A roar of voices, rising and falling on the wind, interrupted his soliloquy. We started and looked through the open door. The cries grew louder, and suddenly a mob of men came running along the narrow street, gesticulating and cursing. They swerved toward us with a single motion, as a school of fish that veer in deep water, and forcing the priest, who sought to bar the path, aside, burst into the cottage and surrounded us. And at their head was—Leopold Magniff!

Yes, that arch-traitor, to frustrate whose machinations I had made my perilous passage in the aeroplane—and here in Corsica! Doubtless he had arrived in the yacht which, as the priest had told me, lay in the harbor. He must have learned of my movements from the newspapers and, shrewdly surmising the object of my journey, had chartered a vessel at Marseilles and sailed to forestall me.

But this conclusion was the result of subsequent cogitations; for at the moment seeing him here, I was overcome with horror and dread. At the very moment of victory he had circumvented me, raised the peasants against me, cutting off all chance of rescue. They thrust their faces in mine, baying me like a pack of hungry wolves.

"Ah, madame, do not look round and think of your aeroplane," said Leopold mockingly. "It is destroyed; it lies, a heap of broken metal and wood, in the center of the market place." He turned to the priest. "I demand possession of my lawful wife," he cried, and flung a forged marriage certificate upon the broken table.

The good father glanced at it and, involuntarily, shrank back from me. He looked at me with trembling lips.

"It is false!" I shouted defiantly.

The priest made as if to speak; then, abandoning the effort, which proved beyond his power, turned away, muttering to himself and wringing his hands. I must, indeed have appeared very much married to his eyes. What an abandoned monster of wickedness I seemed to the good man.

I understood now the frenzy of these good peasants against me. The runaway wife is not an object of sympathy in rural districts.

Leopold came to me with a sneer, pushing aside the men who stood in his way.

"Madame," he said mockingly, "come! Our yacht lies in the harbor."

I looked round in desperation to see if aid would come from any quarter. I looked at the priest, but he was making his way sorrowfully toward the door. Zeuxis cowed by this sudden appearance of his erstwhile confederate, had sunk to the floor and stared at him with a mixture of hate and terror. And all around me the peasants glared at me, waiting upon Leopold's word to tear me limb from limb, if he so ordered.

"Will you come quietly, Madame Magniff?" continued the fellow, "or shall these citizens carry you to our yacht?"

I shrugged my shoulders, and, since there was nothing else to be done, moved at his side toward the door. Only, as I did so, with a swift movement which escaped his notice, thrust the rolled up bonds into the bosom of my gown. I do not think, to do the man some justice, that he thought of them then. I alone held the stage, and the triumph of possession had driven all lesser thoughts away.

He stepped down the long street beside me, the peasants keeping guard around. In the market place, as we passed on our way to the wharf, I saw the fragments of the aeroplane, and for the first time moisture dimmed my eyes. So ended all my hopes of saving Charles. Leopold had played his cards better than I, and had conquered. Now there was nothing to do but—

At any rate, if the worst came, I would choose death rather than life with him. That was a comforting thought. I had been betrothed to Charles; nothing could remove that fact nor anyone usurp his place.

A tiny yacht, which was under steam, was moored to a little pier in the harbor. At the pier end my guard left me and we were received by three figures, ruffianly seafarers attired in picturesque tatters, evidently a bodyguard of my abductor, who watched me with impassive faces. I scanned them quickly. I read no hope in them. Had they been Frenchmen I would have thrown myself upon their mercy even then—but they were ugly-looking Levantines, the scum of the Mediterranean ports, and obviously beyond scruple. Whether my story were true or false mattered nothing to them; they had their pay; that was their end; no chivalry perplexed their souls.

They closed closely around me and indicated that I should descend to a small cabin amidships. The hold looked dark and uninviting; my heart pounded as terror swept over me, and I hesitated upon the topmost step. My abductor indicated the way.

"Have no fear, mademoiselle," he said suavely. "These men obey my slightest word. Descend!"

I followed him in silence down the stairway and into the cabin. Then I breathed more freely again, for I could see the tumbling waters through the port-holes, and the room, lighted by electricity, was well furnished and comfortable, while the ruffians halted at the door. Clearly I need apprehend no physical injury.

I made no answer but stood by the table facing him. He shrugged his shoulders and, sitting down in an armchair, lighted a gold-tipped cigarette.

"Those scoundrels speak no French," he said, indicating our impassive spectators. "But they are absolutely at my beck and call. All hope of safety by appealing to them, therefore, is merely foolish."

I drummed my fingers upon the table idly. Up on deck I heard a creaking, groaning sound.

"The windlass," said Leopold, following my thoughts. "They are hauling in the cable. Tonight we anchor half a mile out at sea; therefore all hope of rescue from the shore is actually a chimera."

"Well," I said, breaking silence for the first time, "what is it you want of me?"

"I want you alone, dear Anne," said Leopold, smirking odiously. "When the news of your gallant flight from Paris reached me it only increased the ardor of my love for you. You see, your cause is absolutely hopeless. Consent to marry me and I shall forgive everything."

"You—forgive!" I answered contemptuously.

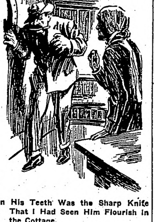
"Yes, my dear Anne," he repeated, "I shall forgive you even for the taunts you uttered to me at Clichy, for I know that, once you have transferred your allegiance to me, you will honor me as much as the traitor Charles, who, by the way, will be convicted on Monday morning, if he is not first lynched by an indignant populace. Marry me, Anne, and we will spend our honeymoon abroad, cruising the deep together. Nothing can save your lover. Dismiss all thought of him. You will be kept prisoner in this cage until you consent to be my wife."



In His Teeth Was the Sharp Knife That I Had Seen Him Flourish in the Cottage.

Leopold rose from his chair and came toward me, greatly agitated.

"O, Anne," he cried, catching at my hands, which I withdrew from the contamination of his touch, "why will you not be reasonable? Has the chevalier been as loyal to you as I, loved you as faithfully? I loved you from that moment when first I saw you on board the ship in Montreal harbor. All that I have done has been for you. Forget him, Anne, and be my wife. I will be true to you forever. If it is money," he added, ending his impassioned plea, "I have become reconciled with my father. I shall be his sole heir. We shall have millions; each wish of yours shall be gratified. You—you—"

"Let me answer you once and for all time," I replied, in tones scarcely audible, so intense was my agitation. "I would rather die a thousand deaths by torture than bear the contamination of your presence. I loathe you as I might loathe a venomous snake. You are the incarnation of all evil. You talk of love," I cried hysterically, "why you do not know even love's alphabet. Love is noble; it begets sacrifice and self-forgetfulness and innocence. You can love no more than a toad can know beauty. These are my last words to you, whatever tyrannies and treacheries you may devise."

He staggered backward, and I felt, in spite of all, a momentary pang of pity at the extremity of his anguish. For in some strange, warped way, this man did love me, I knew. I had always felt that he did, and it had never wholly closed my heart against compassion for him.

In a moment Leopold had recovered his self-possession. He uttered a few curt words to the guards in some Mediterranean dialect. They advanced and indicated by signs that I should follow them. I was conducted into a little cabin in the fore part of the ship, the door was locked on me and I was alone.

As I stood there in my desolation I felt the vessel begin to move through the water. Leopold was fulfilling his threat. We cast our anchor half a mile out at sea. Through the port-hole I saw sunset faintly mirrored in the dark waves like a pale reflection of the cold misery in my own breast.

CHAPTER XI.

The Ultimate Appeal.

(In which I snatch success out of the jaws of failure.)

We lay at anchor half a mile outside the bay. All was silent aboard the yacht, save the monotonous tramp of the guard on deck above my cabin. My watch marked six o'clock in the afternoon and this was Wednesday. Five days remained—only five days of grace, and on Monday Charles would stand condemned, while I was powerless to save him. I pictured him in his dungeon in the Paris fortress, ignorant of my whereabouts; I wept to think that my desperate flight to Corsica to procure the only witness who could deliver him had ended in my ignominious capture. Yet unless deliverance came from some unguessed-at quarter, hope must be abandoned.

I dared not go to bed but paced my tiny cabin in feverish despair. Outside, through the closed port-hole, the sea tumbled in rising waves, and the yacht rocked and pitched as she strained at her anchor. So heart-weary was I, so helpless, that my fatigue induced a period of merciful unconsciousness into which I glided by imperceptible degrees, to be tortured by nightmares. Now I was in Paris again, watching the condemnation of Charles. One by one the military judges arose and announced their verdict—guilty. I saw him led forth to the parade ground, to be stripped of his uniform, to have his buttons and epaulets torn from him and his sword broken, while outside the barriers a mob howled for his death. The intensity of my despair awoke me.

What was that low tapping upon the pane of the port-hole?

I was upon my feet now, fully awake, staring with incredulity through the dull, rounded glass, at a small boat that rocked perilously beside the yacht. I listened; the tramp on deck had ceased. The sentinel was gone, or sleeping upon watch. The tapping came again, and, looking out, I perceived the Greek Zeuxis, with a companion seated in the little boat.

I strained at the port-hole fastenings with all my strength. The rusty catch slid back and admitted the fresh night air. The head of Zeuxis was upon a level with my own.

Then I knew that his words had not been vain; he had come to settle his score with my captor, Magniff. There was no need of words; we both understood. I opened the port-hole to its fullest extent. It was just wide enough to admit of the Greek's passage.

He stood up in the rocking boat, clung to the exterior of the orifice with both his hands, and then, heedless of the swaying boat, which rose and fell beneath him, raised himself and thrust his head and shoulders within. He caught at my too willing hands, a moment later and he had wriggled through and stood up on the floor of my cabin. He looked back, nodded, and the boat pulled slowly away. He had cut off his retreat, the single avenue of flight.

In his teeth was the sharp knife that I had seen him flourish in the cottage. I knew the mad determination which inspired him, the hate which had transformed the cringing coward into a hero. I knew the deadly purpose for whose accomplishment he had armed himself with that razor-keen blade. But now, with Charles' liberty at stake, and hope clutching me by the throat, what was the life of Leopold Magniff to me. Should I not in duty let loose this assassin upon the man who had shown me no quarter?

While I was struggling thus between two motives Zeuxis, still without a word, had crept like a cat to the locked door of the cabin. He wrenched at it; then, with a smile at the pitiful weakness of that defense which had seemed insuperable to me, he inserted the thin blade of the knife into the lock and forced back the tongue. A moment later and he had disappeared from sight, leaving me tremulous with alternating terror and hope. I heard his footsteps die away upon the carpeted floor without. I heard Leopold's voice, cool, calm, penetrating, and the voice of the Greek as he raged above him, pouring forth a torrent of accusations, threats and objurgations. Then came a rush of quick footsteps, the crash of a falling deck-chair, and I pressed my fingers tightly to my ears.

"Yes, but I could not shut out that awful cry that followed, I heard racing below, shouting and struggling, the slamming of doors. Oaths, maledictions, blows came to my ears faintly as I cowered there; the sound of falling bodies—and then a more intense and still more awful silence. I dared not stir.

That silence, that complete absence of sound, was far more terrible to me than had been the sounds, and the shouting. Nothing occurred. There was no murmur in the air. I took my fingers from my ears, and, sitting up waited. At last, hours later, it seemed to me, I heard the slow, uncertain tread of heavy footsteps without. A finger appeared round the door, groping uncertainly; a hand followed it, an arm—and Leopold Magniff entered and stood before me, his face convulsed with pain, yet wearing the semblance of a ghastly smile.

Blood dripped from his arms and breast, and there was a deep slash across his face and throat. He stood there, holding for support against the lintel, and, regarding me silently, he continued smiling. When at last he spoke his voice seemed hollow as a spectre's.

"See what you have brought me to, Anne," was all he said.

I came to my senses then. I rose to staunch the blood, to bind his wounds; but he waved me aside, and then, as though his sight failed him, he groped uncertainly for me and found my arms.

"Take me back to my cabin, Anne," he whispered. "I think I'm going to die."

Summoning all my fortitude I placed my arm round him. His grasp upon my shoulder made me wince. Slowly, with staggering steps, I led him along the passage way toward his room, outside which a group of sailors clustered, terror-stricken, staring foolishly at one another and at me. One had a long cut across his hand; another a blood-stained head-bandage. And on the stairs that led up to the deck dead men were lying, hideously hacked and maimed. I looked into the face of the one nearest me. In those livid and twisted features I recognized all that had been mortal of the Greek Zeuxis.

Leopold waved back the men as they approached, and we entered his cabin. Inside, the table was overturned; pillows and blankets strewed the floor, and there were all the signs of a desperate battle. I placed Leopold upon the couch and sought to cleanse his wounds. But he declined all my efforts and beckoning to me to kneel at his side, spoke in low whispers.

"It's no use—I'm dying, Anne," he murmured. "I only want your forgiveness. Don't let me go down to hell without your pardon, Anne. My love for you was the one not wholly selfish act of my life. You knew that, Anne?"

I nodded, seeing him through a mist of blinding tears. When he began to speak I understood how my words of the evening had wounded him. I think that in my horror and hatred for the man I had overlooked the human qualities that lay buried deep, but existent, in his heart.

"I am dying, Anne," he whispered, grasping for my hand and holding it fast in his, as though seeking to find some clasp upon that life which was slowly ebbing away. "Do you remember your words last night? That I could know love no more than a toad can know beauty? And that I seemed to you the incarnation of all evil? Well, I think you were right, Anne."

I made no answer, but sat silently beside him, while his grasp tightened cruelly on mine. I knew the struggle that was taking place in his soul.

"I want to tell you something, Anne," he said after a while. "I was not quite so bad as you imagined me to be. You always influenced me for good. Are you glad to hear that, Anne?"

"Very glad," I answered.

"I always planned, when I had won you, to turn over a new leaf, as my father would have phrased it. I've been a bad lot, but I was playing for high stakes, Anne, and—and I've lost. And now I'm going to make amends. We must get you to Paris before the trial."

My hopes, so long abased, leaped up incredulously again. With Zeuxis dead I had not dared to think that anything could stay the fate which overhung my lover. But now—if Leopold should take the place of the Greek, if he should confess.

He smiled weakly, as if in anticipation of my thoughts.

"Do you see that little cabinet in the corner, Anne?" he whispered. "Under that pile of papers near it you will find a key. Unlock the cabinet and bring me what you find inside."

I rose and obeyed him. I fitted the little key into the lock and, opening the cabinet, drew forth a bundle of manuscript. I placed it in Leopold's hands.

"These papers contain my confession, Anne," he said. "I wrote it once when under the influence of good thoughts—of you. Often I have been tempted to destroy it. But I felt that if you should escape me and carry out your purpose it would be but fair to give you the means with which to free your lover, the chevalier. These papers will exonerate him completely, even after I am dead, for they contain an entire history of the plot to secure the treaty, and give the names of those who were behind us. No officers of the court could read it and condemn your lover. Now touch the bell, Anne."

I rang, and instantly two sailors reappeared from the passage without. They stood impassive and mute before us. Leopold spoke a few words to them in their own language.

"These men will take the yacht at ful speed to Bon Martin," he continued to me, speaking now with a supreme effort of the will. "It is a little seaport near Marseilles, but not too near. There you will charter a special train for Paris, using the money which you will find in the drawer of my desk. There are ten thousand francs; they are yours by all laws of war. As for the yacht, the men will take her out to sea again after they have set you ashore and convey her where she belongs. They have been amply recompensed for their work and they know it."

"And now, Anne, grant me your forgiveness."

DRIVEN TO ATROCITIES, GERMAN COMMANDER TELLS CORRESPONDENT

By E. ALEXANDER POWELL.

[By Cable to The Chicago Tribune.]

Headquarters in the Field of the Ninth Imperial Army, Chateau Lafere, near Renaix, Belgium.—Three weeks ago the government of Belgium requested me to place before the American people a list of specific and authenticated atrocities committed by the German armies upon Belgian noncombatants.

Today General von Boehn, commanding the Ninth Imperial field army, acting mouthpiece of the German general staff, has asked me to place before the American people the German version of the incidents in question.

So far as I am aware I am the only correspondent in the present war who has motored for an entire day through the ranks of the advancing German army, who has dined as a guest of the German army commander and his staff, and who has had the progress of the army on the march arrested in order to obtain photographs of the German troops.

This unusual experience came about in a curious and roundabout way.

Invited by General Von Boehn.

After an encounter in the streets of Ghent last Tuesday between a German military automobile and a Belgian armored car, in which two German soldiers were wounded, American Vice Consul Van Hee persuaded the burgomaster to accompany him immediately to the headquarters of General von Boehn to explain the circumstances and ask that the city should not be held responsible for the unfortunate affair.

In the course of the conversation with Mr. Van Hee General von Boehn remarked that copies of papers containing articles written by Alexander Powell criticizing the German treatment of the Belgian civil population had come to his attention and said he regretted he could not have an opportunity to talk with Powell and give him the German version.

Mr. Van Hee said by a fortunate coincidence I happened to be in Ghent, whereupon the general asked him to bring me out to dinner the following day, and issued a safe conduct through the German lines.

Though nothing was said about a photographer, I took with me Photographer Donald Thompson. As there was some doubt regarding the propriety of taking a Belgian driver into the German lines, I drove the car myself.

In Midst of Kaiser's Men.

Half a mile out of Sottehem our road debouched into the great highway which leads through Lille to Paris. We suddenly found ourselves in the midst of the German army. It was a sight never to be forgotten. Far as the eye could see stretched solid columns of marching men, pressing westward, ever westward.

The army was advancing in three mighty columns along three parallel roads. These dense masses of moving men in their elusive blue gray uniforms looked for all the world like three monstrous serpents crawling across the countryside.

American flags which fluttered from our windshield proved a passport in themselves and as we approached the close locked ranks they parted to let us through.

For five solid hours, traveling always at express train speed, we motored between the walls of the marching men. In time the constant shuffle of boots and the rhythmic swing of gray-clad arms and shoulders grew maddening and I became obsessed with the fear that I would send the car plowing into the human wedge on either side.

Miles of German Soldiers.

It seemed that the ranks never would end, and as far as we were concerned they never did, for we never saw or heard the end of that mighty column.

We passed regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade of infantry, and after them hussars, uhlans, cuirassiers, field batteries, more infantry, more field guns, ambulances, then siege guns, each drawn by 30 horses, engineers, telephone corps, pontoon wagons, armored motor cars, more uhlans, the sunlight gleaming on their forest of lances, more infantry in spiked helmets, all sweeping by as irresistible as a mighty river, with their faces turned toward France.

This was the Ninth field army and composed the very flower of the empire, including the magnificent troops of the Imperial guard. It was first and last a fighting army. The men were all young. They struck me as being keen as razors and as hard as nails. The horses were magnificent. They could not have been better. The field guns of the Imperial guard were almost twice the size of any used by our army.

Thirty-two Horses Draw Howitzer.

But the most interesting of all, of course, were the five gigantic howitzers, each drawn by 16 pairs of horses. These howitzers can tear a city to pieces at a distance of a dozen miles.

Every contingency seems to have been foreseen. Nothing was left to chance or overlooked. Maps of Belgium, with which every soldier is provided, are the finest examples of topography I have ever seen. Every path, every farm building, every clump of trees, and every twig is shown.

At one place a huge army wagon containing a complete printing press was drawn up beside the road and a morning edition of Deutsche Kreiger Zeitung was being printed and distributed to the passing men. It contained nothing but accounts of German victories, of which I never had heard, but it seemed greatly to cheer the men.

Field kitchens with smoke pouring from their stovepipe funnels rumbled down the lines, serving steaming soup and coffee to the marching men, who held out tin cups and had them filled without once breaking step.

Covered Wagons Hide Machine Guns.

There were wagons filled with army cobblers, sitting cross-legged on the floor, who were mending soldiers' shoes just as if they were back in their little shops in the fatherland. Other wagons, to all appearances ordinary two wheeled farm carts, hid under their arched canvas covers nine machine guns which could instantly be brought into action.

The medical corps was as magnificent as businesslike. It was as perfectly equipped and as efficient as a great city hospital.

Men on bicycles with a coil of insulated wire slung between them strung a field telephone from tree to tree so the general commanding could converse with any part of the 50 miles long column.

The whole army never sleeps. When half is resting the other half is advancing. The soldiers are treated as if they were valuable machines which must be speeded up to the highest possible efficiency. Therefore, they are well fed, well shod, well clothed, and worked as a negro teamster works mules.

Only men who are well cared for can march 35 miles a day week in and week out. Only once did I see a man mistreated. A sentry on duty in front of the general headquarters failed to salute an officer with sufficient promptness, whereupon the officer lashed him again and again across the face with a riding whip. Though welts rose with every blow, the soldier stood rigidly at attention and never quivered.

Finally Reaches Von Boehn.

It was considerably past midday and we were within a few miles of the French frontier when we saw a guidon, which signifies the presence of the head of the army, planted at the entrance of a splendid old chateau. As we passed through the iron gates and whirled up the stately tree-lined drive and drew up in front of the terrace a dozen officers in staff uniform came running out to meet us. For a few minutes it felt as if we were being welcomed at a country house in America instead of at the headquarters of the German army in the field. So perfect was the field telephone service that the staff had been able to keep in touch with our progress along the lines and were waiting dinner for us.

After dinner we grouped ourselves on the terrace in the self-conscious attitude people always assume when having their pictures taken, and Thompson made some photographs. They probably are the only ones of this war, at least of a German general and an American war correspondent who was not under arrest.

Then we gathered about the table, on which was spread a staff map of the war area, and got down to serious business. The general began by asserting that the stories of atrocities perpetrated on Belgian noncombatants were a tissue of lies.

"Look at these officers about you," he said. "They are gentlemen like yourself. Look at the soldiers marching past in the road out there. Most of them are fathers of families. Surely you don't believe they would do the things they have been accused of."

Explains Aerschot Crimes.

"Three days ago, general," I said, "I was in Aerschot. The whole town now is but a ghastly, blackened, blood-stained ruin."

"When we entered Aerschot the son of the burgomaster came into the room, drew a revolver, and assassinated my chief of staff," the general said. "What followed was only retribution. The townspeople only got what they deserved."

"But why wreak your vengeance on women and children?"

"None has been killed," the general asserted positively.

"I am sorry to contradict you, general," I asserted with equal positiveness, "but I have myself seen their mutilated bodies. So has Mr. Ginson, secretary of the American legation at Brussels, who was present during the destruction of Louvain."

"Of course, there always is danger of women and children being killed during street fighting," said General von Boehn, "if they insist on coming into the street. It is unfortunate, but it is war."

Data Startles General.

"But how about a woman's body I saw, with her hands and feet cut off? How about a white-haired man and his son whom I helped bury outside Sempstad, who had been killed merely because a retreating Belgian had shot a German soldier outside their house? There were 22 bayonet wounds on the old man's face. I counted them. How about the little girl two years old who was shot while in her mother's arms by a uhlan, and whose funeral I attended at Beystopdenberg? How about the old man who was hung from the rafters in his house by his hands and roasted to death by a bonfire being built under him?"

The general seemed somewhat taken aback by the amount and exactness of my data.

"Such things are horrible, if true," he said. "Of course, our soldiers, like soldiers of all armies, sometimes get out of hand and do things which we would never tolerate if we knew it. At Louvain, for example, I sentenced two soldiers to 12 years' penal servitude apiece for assaulting a woman."

Louvain Library Incident.

"Apropos of Louvain," I remarked, "why did you destroy the library? It was one of the literary storehouses of the world."

"We regretted that as much as any one else," answered the general. "It caught fire from burning houses and we could not save it."

"But why did you burn Louvain at all?" I asked.

"Because the townspeople fired on our troops. We actually found machine guns in some of the houses." And smashing his fist down on the table, he continued: "Whenever civilians fire upon our troops we will teach them a lasting lesson. If women and children insist on getting in the way of bullets, so much the worse for the women and children."

"How do you explain the bombardment of Antwerp by Zeppelins?" I queried.

Explains Zeppelin Bombs.

"Zeppelins have orders to drop their bombs only on fortifications and soldiers," he answered.

"As a matter of fact," I remarked, "they only destroyed private houses and civilians, several of them women. If one of those bombs had dropped 200 yards nearer my hotel I wouldn't be smoking one of your excellent cigars today."

"This is a calamity which I thank God didn't happen."

"If you feel for my safety as deeply as that, general," I said earnestly, "you can make quite sure of my coming to no harm by sending no more Zeppelins."

"Well," he said, laughing, "we will think about it." He continued gravely:

"I trust you will tell the American people through your paper what I have told you today. Let them hear our side of this atrocity business. It is only justice that they should be made familiar with both sides of the question."

I have quoted my conversation with the general as nearly verbatim as I can remember it. I have no comments to make. I will leave it to my readers to decide for themselves just how convincing are the answers of the German general staff to the Belgian accusations.

Photographs German Army.

Before we began our conversation I asked the general if Mr. Thompson might be permitted to take photographs of the great army passing. Five minutes later Thompson was whirled away in a military motor car ciceroned by an army officer who had attended the army school at Fort Riley. It seems they stopped the car beside the road in a place where the light was good, and when Thompson saw approaching a regiment or battery of which he wished a picture he would tell the officer, whereupon the officer would blow his whistle, and the whole column would halt.

"Just wait a few minutes until the dust settles," Thompson would remark, nonchalantly lighting a cigarette, and the Ninth imperial army, whose columns stretched over the countryside as far as the eye could see would stand in its tracks until the air was sufficiently clear to get a picture.

Thus far the only one who has succeeded in halting the German army is this little photographer from Kansas.

Show Thompson Gunnery.

As a field battery of the Imperial guard rumbled past, Thompson made some remark about the accuracy of the American gunners at Vera Cruz.

"Let us show you what our gunners can do," said the officer, and gave an order. There were more orders, a perfect volley of them, a bugle shrilled harshly, the eight horses strained against their collars, the drivers cracked their whips, and the gun left the road, bounded across a ditch, and swung into position in an adjacent field.

On a knoll three miles away an ancient windmill was beating the air with its huge wings. The shell hit the windmill fair and square and tore it into splinters.

"Good work," Thompson observed critically; "if those fellows of yours keep on they'll be able to get a job in the American navy after the war."

In all the annals of modern war I do not believe there is a parallel to this American war photographer halting with an upraised, peremptory hand the advancing army, leisurely photographing regiment after regiment, and then having a field gun of the Imperial guard go into action solely to gratify his curiosity.

Find English Leaders.

According to a dispatch from a Daily Mail correspondent at Rouen the Germans have been able, with seemingly uncanny precision, to locate the headquarters of the British general staff, no matter where it moves.

Throughout ten days, beginning when the fighting was about Mons, the invaders poured shells close to the meeting point of the king's generals.

It was the same thing when headquarters were at Donai and Landrecies, whereupon Sir John French withdrew his position to Le Cateau. There it was the target of a terrific bombardment, which set fire to the town and burned it. The next move was to St. Quentin, where again the British headquarters were a mark for the German fire.

Physicians Recommend Castoria

CASTORIA has met with pronounced favor on the part of physicians, pharmaceutical societies and medical authorities. It is used by physicians with results most gratifying. The extended use of Castoria is unquestionably the result of three facts: First—The indisputable evidence that it is harmless: Second—That it not only allays stomach pains and quiets the nerves, but assimilates the food: Third—It is an agreeable and perfect substitute for Castor Oil. It is absolutely safe. It does not contain any Opium, Morphine, or other narcotic and does not stupefy. It is unlike Soothing Syrups, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, etc. This is a good deal for a Medical Journal to say. Our duty, however, is to expose danger and record the means of advancing health. The day for poisoning innocent children through greed or ignorance ought to end. To our knowledge, Castoria is a remedy which produces composure and health, by regulating the system—not by stupefying it—and our readers are entitled to the information.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Letters from Prominent Physicians addressed to Chas. H. Fletcher.

Dr. B. Halstead Scott, of Chicago, Ills., says: "I have prescribed your Castoria often for infants during my practice, and find it very satisfactory."

Dr. William Belmont, of Cleveland, Ohio, says: "Your Castoria stands first in its class. In my thirty years of practice I can say I never have found anything that so filled the place."

Dr. J. H. Taft, of Brooklyn, N. Y., says: "I have used your Castoria and found it an excellent remedy in my household and private practice for many years. The formula is excellent."

Dr. R. J. Hamlen, of Detroit, Mich., says: "I prescribe your Castoria extensively, as I have never found anything to equal it for children's troubles. I am aware that there are imitations in the field, but I always see that my patients get Fletcher's."

Dr. Wm. J McCrann, of Omaha, Neb., says: "As the father of thirteen children I certainly know something about your great medicine, and aside from my own family experience I have in my years of practice found Castoria a popular and efficient remedy in almost every home."

Dr. J. R. Clausen, of Philadelphia, Pa., says: "The name that your Castoria has made for itself in the tens of thousands of homes blessed by the presence of children, scarcely needs to be supplemented by the endorsement of the medical profession, but I, for one, most heartily endorse it and believe it an excellent remedy."

Dr. R. M. Ward, of Kansas City, Mo., says: "Physicians generally do not prescribe proprietary preparations, but in the case of Castoria my experience, like that of many other physicians, has taught me to make an exception. I prescribe your Castoria in my practice because I have found it to be a thoroughly reliable remedy for children's complaints. Any physician who has raised a family, as I have, will join me in heartiest recommendation of Castoria."

Her Memory All Right.

Mrs. Geddes had a new maid, and she found it necessary to repeat her instructions several times before Nora obeyed them. The mistress had told her repeatedly about the finger-bowls, and one day, when there were guests they were again forgotten.

"Now, Nora," said Mrs. Geddes, extremely exercised over the omission, "this is the sixth time I've had to tell you about the finger-bowls. Didn't the woman you last worked for have them on the table?"

"No, mum," replied Nora, "her friends always washed their hands before they cum."

Resting.

Patience—Did you see Peggy down at the beach?

Patrice—Oh, yes.

"What was she doing? Flirting, as usual?"

"No, she said she went down there for a rest."

PARADISE FOR THE ARTIST

Devotees of the Brush Are Accorded Accommodations Without Price at Inn at Capri.

Capri, beautiful in itself as a winter resort, offers an irresistible invitation to artists, since it has an inn where anyone, by painting a picture on the wall, can get free board.

To the lovely island of Capri, with its perennial summer, its blue grotto, and its lemon groves, came, some fifty years ago, a ruined artist. He opened an inn, and died rich. In his will, leaving the inn to his heirs, he made these conditions:

"The charge per day, two bottles of red Capri wine included, is never to be more than six francs.

"If any artist is too poor to pay he shall paint a picture upon some wall-space, receiving all the accommodation accorded to those paying the highest price.

"If any German artist shall come to the inn he shall be accommodated, and shall receive the amount of his fare to Germany upon his promising never to return to Italy."

The inn is conducted today on these conditions. Its walls are covered with paintings. Now and then a German gets his fare home.

The Bridal Trousseau.

The old idea of providing brides with a score or more of gowns, wraps and hats has quite gone by. Even the fashionable trousseau of today contains no more than a dozen gowns, if as many. Styles change so fast that by fall the gowns for the June wedding, necessarily made some weeks before the ceremony, begin to look odd. Some authority has declared that the best dressed woman in Paris buys no more than three new toilets each year, but the opinion may be ventured that she is altering her last year's supply most of the time. The vast assortments of lingerie have also dwindled. Nobody provides such a multitudinous wedding outfit nowadays as used to be required.—Leslie's.

Eye to Business.

A young suburban doctor whose practice was not very great sat in his study reading away a lazy afternoon in early summer. His manservant appeared at the door.

"Doctor, them boys is stealin' your green peaches again. Shall I chase them away?"

"No," he said.—Lippincott's.

Empty Titles.

The emperor of Austria, it has been noted, lays claim to the title marquis of Antwerp. If all European sovereigns could make good their minor territorial titles there would, indeed, be a reconstruction of the map. The king of Italy, for instance, is officially styled king of Sardinia, France, Spain and England, of Italy and Jerusalem, of Greece and Alexandria, of Hamburg and Sicily, Master of the Deep, King of the Earth. The king of Spain also claims to be king of Jerusalem, king of Galicia (a title shared with the emperor of Austria), and, in addition, king of Gibraltar, of the West Indies and of India.

Keep Down Uric Acid

Uric acid is a poison formed inside our bodies in digesting certain foods, especially meat, and by the burning up of nerve and muscle cells during exertion.

Uric acid is harmless as long as the kidneys filter it promptly from the blood, but people who overdo and overeat, make uric acid so fast that it overloads the blood, weakens the kidneys, and attacks the nerves, causing rheumatic pains. It forms gravel, hardens the arteries and brings on dropsy or Bright's disease.

By restoring the kidneys to normal activity Doan's Kidney Pills help to overcome excess uric acid.

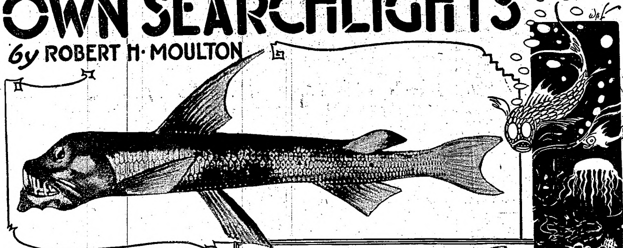
FISH THAT CARRY THEIR OWN SEARCHLIGHTS

by ROBERT H. MOULTON



A FISH FROM THE INDIAN OCEAN, WHICH BEARS AT THE TIP OF THE SNOUT A LUMINOUS ORGAN

CANNIBAL FISH FROM A DEPTH OF 3 MILES IN THE ATLANTIC OCEAN

SOME remarkable models of fishes that inhabit the great depths of the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian oceans have just been put on exhibition at the American Museum of Natural History. Only two sets of these models have been made, one for the British museum in London and one for New York. They are considered the most noteworthy contributions yet made to popular knowledge concerning the appearance, complicated structure and habits of the curious creatures that dwell from one to five miles below the surface of the ocean, in regions never penetrated by sunlight.

Among the queerest and most astonishing of them are the luminous fishes which possess organs for projecting light—veritable electric light plants. The habitat of these extraordinary looking creatures is the deep sea floor, a vast region of everlasting darkness and eternal silence. At an average depth of two miles the sea floor forms an abyssal plain, 90,500,000 square miles in extent, or nearly half the surface of the earth. The fishes of which models are shown were captured and brought up to the surface from enormous depths in recent deep sea explorations; as soon as they reached the vessel's deck wax casts were made of them.

Notable researches of this kind have been made by the Albatross, controlled by the United States bureau of fisheries. Dr. Charles H. Townsend, now director of the York aquarium, commanded this vessel for a number of years on its voyages and made many interesting discoveries of the life of the deep. The British ship, Challenger also made a notable cruise around the world for the purpose of deep sea investigations. Its trip yielded larger results than any other single cruise, but the Albatross has made a far greater number of expeditions.

Among the foremost living deep sea explorers are Sir John Murray of England, the greatest authority on this subject, and the Prince of Monaco, who is one of the most active students and patrons of oceanography of today. He maintains the steamer Princess Alice well equipped and specially designed for deep sea exploration. He also has established an oceanographical museum at Monaco to exhibit deep sea inhabitants.

Fishing at depths of from one to five miles, to bring up to the surface specimens of hidden inhabitants of the deep sea floor is accomplished by means of a large trawl net about fifteen feet wide and twenty-five feet long. This is attached to a steel wire cable wound on a drum and is let down to the desired depth. When it has reached the bottom the vessel steams slowly forward, dragging the net for many miles. Then by means of a steam windlass the net is drawn aboard the ship. In the net many curious fishes are caught as it drags along the bottom.

At great depths there is no movement of the water, no tides are felt. At the bottom of the abyss there is simply cold and darkness and perpetual silence. It is difficult to realize the immense pressure of such deeps; at a depth of 15,000 feet the pressure per square inch is two and a half tons, whereas on land the pressure is under fifteen pounds per square inch.

The tremendous pressure of the water keeps the creatures developed in it from extending their range upward or downward. A deep sea fish rising above its depths is killed by the reduction of the outside pressure. Its tissues swell, its blood vessels burst, its eyes are forced out. On the other hand, a fish sinking below the range to which it is accustomed is soon crushed or suffocated by the unaccustomed pressure. Sometimes the deep sea fish, in a struggle with its prey, is carried above or below its depths, in which case both are destroyed.

When fish from the greatest depths reach the top they are always dead, having been killed by the change in pressure in the early stage of their upward journey. Many of the creatures from the depths are cartilaginous and do not have a bony structure. Nearly all the fishes have formidable teeth and are extremely voracious, with mouths of enormous capacity; in fact, some have stomachs of such expansion that they can perform the astonishing gastronomic feat of swallowing animals larger than themselves.

Probably the most interesting and astonishing of the deep sea dwellers are the luminous fishes, marvelously equipped with organs for projecting light. These light organs are a means of illuminating the dark abyssal regions which they inhabit and of enabling them to avoid foes, recognize their own kind and capture prey. Many of these fishes display curious eyelike organs down the sides of the body, forming as it were a series of miniature bulls-eye lanterns. Again, others possess light emitting organs behind the eyes or on the head and shoulders.

Provided with lanterns or luminous spots, these fishes find their way in the great depths and plow through the dark waters like flaming torches. Some of the deep sea fishes are provided with a rod which is hinged so that its tip can be swung immediately over its back or in front of the voracious mouth. At the end of this rod is a luminous lure. This decoy attracts other sea inhabitants, which are quickly engulfed as they approach this shining point. Thus the fishing rod is employed by the fishes of the deep.

The lamp is also used by the fish itself in pursuit of prey, throwing out a beam of light like a searchlight as it darts to and fro in the inky waters. Many of the fishes are totally blind; these fall easy victims to the hunter after being detected by the bright rays of the lure.

It has been found that at a depth of 3,000 feet the sun's rays cease to penetrate the ocean. The eyes of the deep sea inhabitants have undergone some curious modifications. In the majority of cases it is found that the eyes are either very large or very small. A large proportion of the denizens of the deep possess either no eyes or eyes reduced to mere vestiges. The very large eye seems to represent an effort to make the most of what little light there is.

The deepest sounding so far reached on the ocean floor is in the North Pacific, near the Island of Guam, 5,269 fathoms, or 31,614 feet, or about 66 feet less than six miles. This enormous depth is 2,612 feet greater than the highest land elevation above the sea, that of Mount Everest in the Himalaya mountains being 29,000 feet. These great deeps, as they are termed, vary in form and size. The Nares Deep, lying wholly in the Atlantic ocean, north of the West Indies, is the largest. The floor of this deep sinks to 4,000 fathoms and is estimated to cover an area of 700,000 square miles.

The animal life on the ocean floor is enormous. Not all of the species have as yet been described.

TERRIBLE COST OF ILLITERACY

The annual cost of adult illiteracy to the United States is enough to build a new Panama canal every year, besides constituting a menace to representative government. The difference in productive power between those who can read and write and those who are illiterate is $100 a year, and since the census of 1910 showed that there were over 5,000,000 illiterates in the United States, the economic loss easily reaches the stupendous amount of $500,000,000, says Leslie's.

Speaking at the Industrial league conference on adult illiteracy, P. P. Claxton, United States commissioner of education, brought out the fact that, while during the last 20 years illiteracy in the southeastern group of the southern states has been decreased by 600,000, in the same period the number of illiterates in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut has increased by more than half that amount, a large proportion of the number being foreigners.

Men and women forty and fifty years old have been taught to read and write in a series of ten lessons. The problem is to secure co-operation of industrial managers and boards of education in providing free instruction during working hours.

The Standard Oil and General Chemical companies, with large plants at Bayonne, N. J., have arranged with the local board of education for instruction to be given to a thousand of their illiterate employes. George B. Gifford, general manager of the Standard Oil company, thinks that a vocabulary of about 600 words would be sufficient to enable the average workman to understand directions and to answer ordinary questions. Having that to begin with, the ambitious man could rapidly acquire more. The increased economic efficiency both to the workman and his employer, amounting, it is estimated, to $500,000,000 a year, is scarcely second to the benefit the civic life of the country would receive.

CAPTIVE BALLOON AT WORK

Balloons are being put to some practical purpose in Germany, where, at Salzburg, they are employed as a sort of locomotive for hauling a car up a mountainside, London Tit-Bits says.

The inventor's idea is merely an adaptation of the captive balloon principle, so arranged that long, but regular flights are possible. The balloon is attached to a steel rail laid on the mountainside, and upon this it makes its journeys.

It spans great chasms without the necessity of bridging and by running the rail over any projecting points there is, of course, no need of any tunneling. Fastened to the rail is a heavy steel slide, which holds the balloon captive. From the slide to the balloon runs a steel cable, which permits the balloon to soar about twenty-five feet above the rail, but holds it firmly in place.

In going up the mountain the balloon is lifted of course by the hydrogen gas it contains. No matter how desperately the captive may tug at its steel cable, it cannot get away, but must ascend directly over the guiding steel rail.

Reaching the top of the mountain the balloon is simply anchored until the time arrives for beginning the descent.

This is another problem easy of solution. A tank under the car is filled with water and the entire affair is dragged downhill by weight and gravity.

POWERFUL PERSONAGE.

"Who is it," he asked, "who can almost stop the world with a word and who can halt the stream of commerce with a wave of his hand?"

"Oh, I know," Robert exclaimed, "it's the traffic policeman!"

MAGIC OF NINA HILLER

By MAX STERNER.

It is not to be written whether Mrs. Huggins was more surprised at the apparition which appeared in her shabby sitting room or whether Nina Hiller, personifying the apparition, was more surprised at the prevailing slovenliness of the place. Certain it was that the dingy room which served as an office for Mrs. Huggins' fifth-class lodging house had never been graced by so neat and smart and altogether charming a person as Miss Hiller. Certain it also was that Nina never had dreamed there were so many unutterable kinds of dirt as she saw about her.

Mrs. Huggins was inclined at first to be a bit belligerent, but Nina's perfect frankness and gentleness disarmed her. As for Nina, her lips trembled just for the fraction of a moment as she contrasted the cheerless place with the neat and comfortable country home she had left.

"Do you have furnished rooms to rent?" she inquired.

"I do," replied Mrs. Huggins shortly.

"May I see one?" persisted Nina.

"What for?" rejoined Mrs. Huggins.

"I am looking for a room," replied the girl.

Mrs. Huggins gasped in surprise.

"There's plenty vacant, the Lord knows," she said, "but they ain't hardly your kind."

"I am not very particular so long as the place is respectable and the rent is not high," said the girl.

"Respectable," snorted Mrs. Huggins; "I never ran no place that wan't respectable."

"I'm sure of that," the girl hastened to say. "I—I only meant that was why I came here."

"Well, it's cheap enough," went on the landlady. "Goodness knows, it has to be. There don't seem to be no money any more. I have to take what folks can afford to pay."

Then she looked shyly at the girl and said with rough kindness: "I really think you might find a place you would like better. It's only poor folks that put up here."

"I am very poor," replied Nina simply. Then, noting Mrs. Huggins' keen glances at her neat and tasty clothes, and more especially at her gloves and rather stylish hat, she smiled and added: "I am from the country. My parents died very recently and left me alone, and there was not much left after the bills were paid."

"The city is a poor place to come," replied Mrs. Huggins grimly, but not unkindly. "Goodness knows there's a plenty here now tryin' to keep soul and body together. If you've got any friends in the country you'd better go back and get any kind of work to do to keep an honest roof over your head. There's an army of 'em here walkin' the streets, lookin' for work—and it's a bad business for a young girl and a purty one like you, a-gettin' discouraged and hungry and lonesome and all that."

The girl blushed and smiled a brave, confident little smile.

"I had a good mother and a good father," she said with quiet dignity, "and I am sure I will do nothing to disgrace them. I have no doubt at all but I will find work to do and that I will get on famously."

The upshot of it all was that Nina became established in a dingy room on the second floor with two dingy windows. There was a dingy carpet on the floor and a meager quantity of dingy furniture. There was also a neglected fireplace in the corner. It was all so hopeless and squalid that it required all Nina's courage to face it.

While waiting for her trunk the newcomer went out and returned with an armful of packages which filled the person of Mrs. Huggins with burning curiosity. A boy followed her with a good-sized box. Mysterious sounds came from the room of the new lodger. Presently a coal man carried several sacks of coal to the room. This was the straw that broke the landlady's back, so to speak. She simply had to go up and see what was going on.

If curiosity filled her before she opened the door astonishment prevailed when she gazed at the transformed apartment. The windows were washed inside and out, the carpet brightened up, all the furniture wiped and cleaned, a dainty coverlet was on the bed and a score of pretty and artistic things were tastefully placed about the room. And in the grate a fire was burning smartly. The entire effect was most homelike and cheerful. Mrs. Huggins could scarcely believe it was her own house. She never had seen anything like it—certainly nothing even suggesting it there.

"Are you goin' to have a fire all the time?" demanded Mrs. Huggins. "Coal does cost a lot."

"I'm going to try to be comfortable," replied the girl. "I think I can earn enough to keep warm and have enough to eat."

The miracle was duly announced to various of the lodgers, as they came in that evening, principally in the form of admonitions given with more or less vehemence by Mrs. Huggins.

"No more rough house in No. 12," she said sharply to Rose and Madge, two bindery girls, who occupied the next room to the new lodger. "Of course I know there ain't been no harm in it, but there's been a lot of noise. Let the fellers take you to a dance if you want to make a racket. As long as we've got a real leddy we won't scare her out."

"Cut out rushin' the growler to No. 16," she commanded Tib Ragan and Ed Root. "Either drink your beer at the saloon or move up on the third floor. Second floor's respectable now."

All this was alarming, but the very first evening Nina invited the bindery girls in to see her.

"I do so want to know you," she said. "You see I have always lived in the country and been friends with all my neighbors."

Awestruck with the comfort and beauty of the room, the girls went in very silent and very ill at ease. Under the friendly chatter of the new lodger they thawed out and remained a long time, telling the little stories of their narrow lives.

One by one all of the lodgers were invited into the transformed room and went forth with great friendliness and respect for the gentle girl who was so different from them all. And one by one the rooms of all the lodgers began to take on a new atmosphere. Even Mrs. Huggins swept the halls twice a week and once was seen to actually scrub them. Nina helped all with suggestions and with the work of her hands. The two bindery girls spent much of their spare time making things for their room after they were shown how it could be done with practically no expense for material.

In the meantime the new lodger had gone out only two days looking for work before she announced joyously that she had secured a position in a newspaper clipping bureau. To be sure the pay was very small and the work hard and the color faded from her cheeks, but she made enough to pay her room rent and live frugally and add a little all the time to the comfort of her own room and of those about her.

And there came to be little gatherings of the lodgers in the various rooms, but generally in Miss Hiller's, where there were famous little suppers cooked over the grate fire, and to which all contributed their mite. And there came to be talk of books which led to the reading of books. And the girls learned to sew and to make clothes and hats for themselves, and—in short, Mrs. Huggins' boarding house came to be the abiding place of a crowd of well-dressed, well-informed and self-respecting people. And all this happened without essential increase in the wages of the people—excepting that aroused ambition led to better work and Ed Root became foreman in the shop where he worked and Rose became the forewoman of her bindery, and there were other advancements which quite surprised those concerned and delighted the little home community.

Also was there marrying and giving in marriage when Ed Root married Madge and set up a home in a little flat around the corner.

Then came one sad day when the princess who wrought all this magic was carried away. A tall, sunburned stranger came and clasped her in his arms before all the company and chided her sternly for hiding herself from her friends and from him. It was quite a romance as the story came out, but the stern parent now was dead and the prince had come into his own.

"I would not have missed my experience here for anything in the world," she said, with tears in her eyes as she kissed Mrs. Huggins good-by.

The spirit she injected into the Huggins lodging house still abides, and many there are who called her blessed.

HELPS THE IVORY WORKER

Rat in Its Search for Toothsome Morsel Unwittingly Gives Aid to the Carver.

There is a curious but little-known fact that well illustrates the ravages that rats can inflict on the hardest substances with their sharp little teeth.

Many of the elephants' tusks imported into London for the use of ivory-ornament makers have their surfaces grooved into small furrows of unequal depth, as if cut by a very sharp-edged instrument. Surely no man can have taken the trouble to do that, for what would be the profit of his labor? The rats are at the bottom of the mischief. They have found out the tusks that contain the most gelatin or animal glue, a sweet and delicious morsel for the rat's dainty palate; and having gnawed away as much as suited their purpose, have left the rest for the ivory-cutter. He, for his part, is able and willing to profit by the fact that the rats have made clear.

The ivory that contains a large amount of gelatin is softer and more elastic than that which does not; and as elasticity is the thing most needed for billiard balls, the ivory-worker chooses this rat-marked ivory, and turns it into beautiful, elastic billiard balls. The elasticity of some of the balls is so great that if thrown down forcibly on a hard pavement they will rebound into the hand to the height of three or four feet.—Youth's Companion.

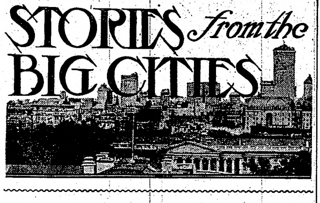
STORIES from the BIG CITIES



"Here Is Your Jewel Casket, Madam," He Said

NEW YORK.—"Madame," and the handsome station master looked into her violet eyes, "your jewel casket, I am happy to inform you, has been found." The violet eyes looked up into his and a flush mantled her cheeks.

THANK YOU
MADAM, YOUR JEWEL CASE

"Thank you so much," she said. "You must have seen me when I dropped it."

The H. S. M. said no, but with an accent that did not make it sound like a harsh word at all.

"I knew it was yours," he said, "because it just matched the color of your gown. I was much worried until I found you, for I know that the contents must be very valuable. Do not mention it at all. It has been reward enough to have returned these jewels to you." She shook the leather-covered box apprehensively and listened. "I suggest," said the H. S. M., "that you examine the contents before you go further. Perhaps some of them might be missing. My office is at your disposal if you wish to do so."

And so she of the violet eyes went to the office and the H. S. M. said to one of his assistants, "Odell, just give the lady this desk, will you. She would like to make an inventory of her jewels, which she just lost and—found again." And so she of the violet eyes opened the lid of that leather-bound box, and these are what she took out, one by one:

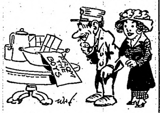
One small mirror, cracked.
One rabbit's foot.
One comb.
One bottle of perfume.
One pot of rouge.
One tube of cold cream.
One eyebrow pencil.
One date book.

"How funny," she said, after a pause, glancing at the limp form of the H. S. M., which had fallen back in his chair, "that you should have thought this was filled with diamonds! Why, this is my tango vanity. All the girls have them. Don't you think it is an especially nice one? Everything is all right but the little mirror. Thank you so much. Good-by. You have been very kind."

And the station master went into his private office and lighted a dank, dark cigar and pondered on the ways of womankind.

Firemen Steal the Bed of Pair Wed in Secret

CHICAGO.—A Maxim silencer on the wedding chimes failed to work when Charles F. Passow, a fireman, married Miss Margaret Mulligan at her home, 1340 North Avers avenue. Passow recently asked for a furlough, but did not explain that he intended to be married.



He had heard of the pranks played on prospective bridegrooms by their heartless mates in the firehouse. So he decided to have a secret wedding.

Passow and his fiancee picked out a sunny flat at 5305 Maryland avenue, and during his hours off they visited furniture emporiums and picked out all the accessories dear to the hearts of the newly-married.

Mr. and Mrs. Passow went to their new home after the wedding the other night. Passow tried to open the door, but the key would not work. This was because the members of company 19 had plugged up all the keyholes. In a rage hotter than most of the fires he has turned the hose on, Passow struggled with the key until finally he and his bride gained entrance.

On the dining-room table they found an elaborate set of aluminum kitchen utensils with a card conveying the company's best wishes.

"They are just beautiful," Mrs. Passow said.

"Yes, the boys are pretty good-hearted, even if they do have their little joke," Passow conceded.

Then he suddenly missed the bed.

Once more he felt murder in his heart. He raced back and forth through the flat and at last found that the door of a closet was locked and the keyhole stuffed. Passow got a chisel and hammer and got the door open. The bed had been carefully taken down and stored in the closet.

After they talked the matter over, Mr. and Mrs. Passow decided that they could afford to forgive the jokers.

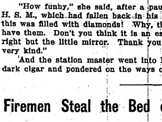
DENVER, COLO.—M. McGrath, a lifeguard at the Washington park bathing beach, found $367 in bank bills on the shore. With no thought of reward in his mind, he hastened to police headquarters and reported his find. There he learned the money was the property of a guest at the Argonaut hotel, who had lost his "roll" while bathing in the lake.



HERE'S 25¢ FER FINDIN' TH' MONEY
GIMME A NICKEL FER A KEEPSAKE LIFE GUARD

"I spent about two-bits telephoning all over the city trying to locate the owner of that money," said McGrath. "When I found him I hurried to his apartments and turned the big bunch of cash over to him, with never a thought of reward.

"But he was so overcome with gratitude and joy, he insisted that I be rewarded. He drew a dime and a quarter from his pocket and studied them for fully a minute. Finally he shoved the quarter toward me and said: 'You deserve a reward.'

"He looked so ruefully at that two-bits I couldn't bear to take it. It would have broken his heart, I am sure. Besides, I figured that it was up to him to pay for the telephone calls I had made in locating him. The reward would barely cover the amount I had spent, so I handed the quarter back to him.

"'Just give me a nickel out of that for a keepsake,' I said, 'and go down to the telephone company and pay the calls I made in finding out where to bring this roll.'

FIELD MARSHAL OF KAISER'S ARMY

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

Field Marshal Baron Kolmar von der Goltz is regarded by the Germans as one of the leading military men in Europe, and has been a power in the organization and training of the kaiser's army. It was Gen. von der Goltz who organized and trained the Turkish army which participated in the Balkan war.

Goltz, despite his advanced age—he is now seventy-one—is still a man of great energy and endurance. Only a few years ago he visited the Argentine Republic, traveled on horseback through the pampas of that country, and soon after his return to Germany, without taking a rest, he led the German general staff in the military maneuvers of that year.

Goltz personally is one of the most unassuming and modest of men. He cares nothing at all for titles or rank. He hates red tape and never hesitates to give expression to his opinions, both in speaking and writing.

Goltz was the first one, in his famous book, "People in Arms," to urge the introduction of two years' military service, and also in a number of magazine and newspaper articles called attention of the German people to the nature of war, and to the military duties which they owed to the fatherland.

Von der Goltz' greatest achievement in recent years has been his energetic work in behalf of the German scout movement.

ITALY'S QUEEN INFLUENTIAL

Italy's policy toward the great powers lies in a large measure with her queen, a statement which may provoke an incredulous smile on this side of the Atlantic, where the citizens of the republic are unaccustomed to feminine influence in questions of high governmental import, but a statement nevertheless true. Queen Elena has unusual influence upon her husband, King Victor Emmanuel. She can have the deciding voice with him if she cares to use it at such a critical time when there is so much to be said in favor of Italy's action, whether it be for or against her former allies of the triple alliance. The king rules under the restrictions of constitutional sovereignty, but he exercises a directing sway over his cabinet, the parliament and the people. The nation's present policy of neutrality is his personal policy, backed by Prime Minister Salandra, a newcomer in the cabinet, and strenuously opposed by Foreign Secretary di San Giuliano, the strongest man of the government, in office for several years, and openly friendly to the triple alliance.

The question of Italy's policy may be in the hands of the queen—one says this, speaking figuratively. The hands themselves so thoroughly typify the character of the queen that one could say it literally. They have the long, tapering fingers of a poetic temperament; strong, full of nervous energy, bearing the marks of constant use, not nourished and caressed as things of beauty and protected from labor to be soft and white and useless; the busy hands of love and devotion, tirelessly at work from morn till night.

FIELD MARSHAL SIR JOHN FRENCH

The British commander in the European war, Field Marshal Sir John French, has had a long and interesting record. As a boy he liked the navy and joined H. M. S. Brittannia in 1866, serving as naval cadet and midshipman for four years. In 1874 he entered the Eighth Hussars, in which regiment he served through the Sudan campaign of 1884-85. In 1889 he rose to the rank of colonel and commanded the Nineteenth Hussars until 1893, also acting as assistant adjutant general on the staff.

In 1899 General French was transferred as temporary major general to the First cavalry brigade at Aldershot. Later in the same year he commanded troops in the first part of the Boer war, at Elandslaagte, and later commanded Sir G. White's cavalry at Reitfontein and Lombard's Kop.

Before the Boer cordon had been completely drawn around White's army at Ladysmith, that commander detached French and his cavalry with orders to cut their way through and join the main British force under Buller.

From 1900 to the end of the war General French was lieutenant general, commanding the cavalry division. He was in the operations about Colesberg, commanded a cavalry force in the relief of Kimberley and was Lord Roberts' cavalry chief in the operations ending with the capture of Bloemfontein and Pretoria. He also commanded troops in Cape Colony in operations against the rebels.

CHIEF OF RUSSIA'S ARMY

The czar is nominally the supreme commander of the Russian army as well as of the Russian navy, and it is understood that when war was declared he was ambitious to place himself at the head of the troops in the field. But he has been persuaded to delegate the supreme command of the army to his cousin, the Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholaevitch. The czar would not be an inspiration to his soldiers, lacking the military appearance and the personality essential to an actual leader of men.

The Grand Duke Nicholas, on the other hand, is a soldier in looks, one of the tallest men in the army, and the finest cavalry officer of the empire, making a splendid appearance on a horse; and a commander of long experience who was one of the chief officers of the Russo-Japanese war. His executive ability was apparent when he acted as the head of the military commission in charge of the closing operations of this war, and he has been able to cope successfully with revolution in Russia itself.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Uncle Sam Makes Fine Reputation as Architect

WASHINGTON.—When the average citizen beholds the beautiful lines of the modern federal buildings in most of the principal cities of the United States, he probably does not realize that in addition to his many other vocations and professions, Uncle Sam is also an architect, represented at present by Oscar Wenderoth, supervising architect of the treasury. Yet, Uncle Sam is making a wonderful reputation for himself in this capacity. Not only is he doing good work, but he is being widely copied, and those who are acquainted with the facts realize that he is doing more to set the fashion and elevate the standard of architecture in this country than any other agency.

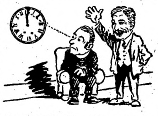
For the first 75 years of our national existence the public buildings were put up in a sort of haphazard way. Commissions appointed by the secretary of the treasury selected the architect of a building and attended to all the details of its construction. The result was that no fixed idea was carried out, and our earlier public buildings had no uniformity of design at all.

Today it is different. Uncle Sam has become an architect on his own account, and he is designing his own buildings. The result is that one may now recognize the new federal buildings of the country on sight by their uniformity of style. There is just enough diversity in detail to prevent too much similarity.

In times past the government roamed the whole world over to find new ideas in architecture, and in the older federal buildings one may see everything from the Gothic down to the Romanesque. But after trying them all, the classic style based on the best French and English influence as illustrated by the Senate office building in this city, has been decided upon as embodying the best that there is in beauty and utility in architecture.

Eleventh-Hour Stories of the Vice-President

VICE-PRESIDENT MARSHALL has a habit of telling a funny story at the eleventh hour. In fact, he usually waits until the eleventh hour and about fifty-five minutes. The consequence is that when he enters the senate chamber to convene that body of solemn toilers he is apt to have a half suppressed smile on his face, and the Rev. Forest J. Prettyman, the senate chaplain, has even more difficulty in maintaining the serious countenance of a man about to lead in prayer.



Here is the way the thing works out: Along about 11:30 Marshall shifts from his office in the senate office building to his room in the capitol. A few minutes before noon the chaplain comes to be in readiness to accompany the vice-president into the chamber. Now, for some unaccountable reason, the presence of the chaplain makes Marshall think of a funny story. At about five minutes prior to the hour of opening the senate he starts to tell this story with calm deliberation.

The golden moments speed on their way, and by the time Marshall has the basic part of his story outlined it lacks only two minutes or less until twelve o'clock. All hands begin to grow nervous and the sergeant-at-arms comes to the door, watch in hand, to make certain that the vice-president is going to reach his seat in due season.

Marshall gets up from his desk and proceeds across the corridor, still working toward the point to his story, and by a burst of speed gets out the climax just as he pushes open the door into the senate chamber. Chaplain Prettyman has his choice then of not laughing at the story, which would perhaps be impolite on his part, or of laughing and then pulling his face back into shape ready to offer prayer while walking the few steps from the door to the rostrum.

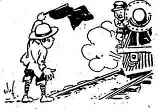
Sightseeing Indians Amused at Boys' Warfare

TWO Indians were sightseeing up Capitol Hill way. Both were civilized to the extent of cheap clothes that didn't fit, and, as small concessions to a tribal past, each wore a single quill in his gray sombrero. Also, one wore gold hoop earrings, and the other displayed on his breast a Catholic medal and cross. They shuffled along listlessly until, as they came to the library, each stopped with sudden alertness to watch two tiny boys playing on the grass. Each small chap had on an Indian suit of brown cambric with a war bonnet of turkey quills. And each waved a tinsel steel tomahawk and danced exactly as real Indians don't do and never did. And when one boy put his hatchet between his teeth and crawled over the grass to attack a portly black nurse who made believe she didn't know what was coming to her, the two who were the real thing looked at each other and chuckled.

And inside the library there are doubtless many books beautifully bound and illustrated to prove that the red man is a stoic who has never been known to smile.

Small Boy Finds Red Flag; Nearly Wrecks Train

A TWELVE-YEAR-OLD boy came near causing a disastrous rear-end collision on the Metropolitan branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad near the scene of the Terra Cotta wreck, the other morning, when he flagged the Frederick local due here from Frederick, Md., at 8:30 o'clock.



As usual, the train was crowded, as was the Hagerstown train, following it. The engineer of the Frederick local jammed on his emergency brakes, when he saw Robert Shipley, who lives at Stott's, near the district line, frantically waving a red flag on the track ahead, not far from the Stott station.

Quick work was necessary to flag and halt the Hagerstown train booming down the line behind. A rear-end collision was narrowly averted through the agility of the flagman, who put sufficient space between himself and the Frederick train to give the second engineer stopping room.

In the meantime, the engineer, conductor and many passengers piled out and surrounded young Shipley, demanding to know the danger. Unabashed, the boy explained that he had found a red flag on the track and wanted to return it. He was questioned closely, but to no further effect.

The conductor took the flag, and trainmen unanimously admitted that they had encountered a remarkable case of an honest boy. They added with some show of bitterness, however, that there are times when too much honesty is not the best policy.

BELIEVE GERMANS HAVE ORDERS TO KEEP OFFENSIVE

FRENCH OFFICIAL COMMUNICATION IMPLIES THAT TEUTONS FIGHT FOR DEFINITE RESULT.

CEASELESS STRUGGLE FOR INCHES ENTERS THIRD WEEK

Unremitting Attacks of Kaiser's Forces Have Proved Unavailing, Paris Asserts—Allies Still Direct Energy Toward Piercing General Von Kluck's Line.

By International News Service.

Paris, Sept. 29.—The Germany army in France seems to have been ordered by its commander-in-chief to remain on the offensive until a definite result of the battle of the Aisne is obtained. This was the interpretation given in the official communication issued by the war office of the unremitting attacks made by the Germans along the entire battle line during the past three days and nights. The report added that the efforts of the enemy so far had proved unavailing.

Struggle for Inches.

Thus the battle enters its third week with the rival armies engaged in a ceaseless struggle for inches of ground. The fighting of the past 24 hours has been of an unprecedented violence. Desperate attempts made by the Germans on the western end of the long battle line to break through the allied forces, which are engaged in a turning movement, have resulted in the most furious fighting which has taken place since the beginning of the campaign.

After fighting without rest night and day, corps of Germans were hurled against the allies only to be thrown back, the allies report. At points along the battle front, particularly between the Oise and the Somme and in the vicinity of Rheims, the opposing entrenchments are only a few hundred yards apart and the fighting consists largely of bayonet charges and counter charges.

Piercing Movement Continues.

The news that a considerable allied force has been in battle with German outposts at Bapaume is considered to be one of the most important developments. The presence of these troops is taken here to mean that the piercing of General von Kluck's line and the interruptions of its railroad connections between St. Quentin, Maubeuge, Namur and Liege is even nearer accomplishment than it was when the allies were confining their attacks to the section of the enemies' line between St. Quentin and Peronne, which was occupied last week.

Infantry Bears Brunt.

The infantry bore the brunt of the incessant fighting, but the artillery of both armies continued throughout 24 hours to bombard each other's positions. Hand to hand combats occurred at many points and bayonets were used freely.

Both Sides Optimistic.

London. — Statements from both sides are worded with the optimism which characterized all these official pronouncements. It was agreed that the allies had continued their advance.

The French claimed "marked progress," the German announcement from Berlin, though insisting that the advance had ben repulsed, nevertheless referred to it as an advance.

Przemysl Reported Occupied.

London, Sept. 29.—"The Russians on Saturday occupied the greater part of the city of Przemysl, Galicia, according to a message from Vienna," says the Rome correspondent of the Exchange Telegraph company. His dispatch continues:

Austrians Concentrate.

"The Russians approached the city from the southwest, forcing the Austrians to take shelter in the eastern forts where the entire garrison now is concentrated and is preparing to make a final resistance. The situation of the garrison is critical, as it is entirely surrounded.

"Russian troops are advancing from Grodek on the Austrian position, while the right wing continues to attack from the north. Troops are being poured into the city of Przemysl to press the attack from the southwest."

Claim Hungarian Town.

"Pursuing their success the Russians have pushed over the Carpathian range and captured Uzok (Hungary) near the source of the river Ungh, with numbers of guns, artillery, stores and prisoners," says the Petrograd correspondent of the Morning Post. "Thence the Russians have descended into the plains of Hungary."

Claim German Failure.

The Petrograd correspondent of the Daily Telegraph has forwarded the following semi-official statement regarding the operations in Russian Poland:

"The movement of German troops from East Prussia in the direction of Warsaw has come to nothing. In the government of Suwalki, Russian Poland, the Germans have suffered a serious repulse. The left flank of the Russian army has defeated the troops under the command of General von Hindenburg, near Suwalki.

"At the same time our troops won a complete victory at Mariampol, and the attacking Germans were thrown back ten miles across the river Scheschupa with a loss of many guns and prisoners. On the right flank at the Niemen river the battle ended in successes for us at Snedniki, where a German attempt to cross the river was repulsed with great loss."

East Prussia Fighting Line.

London, Sept. 29.—A Petrograd dispatch to Reuter's Telegram company says:

"So far as is disclosed by the official announcements the fighting line on the East Prussian frontier does not exceed 30 versts (20 miles). Both Sopotzkin and Druskeniki, where the Russians accepted battle, are on the left bank of the river Niemen. Sopotzkin is 30 versts west of Grodno."

Progress Is Unknown.

London, Sept. 28.—Almost simultaneously the two great hammer strokes in the battle in northern France have fallen and some decisive result must be announced before long. The allies have struck the German right wing, and the Germans on their part have hurled themselves against the French line between Verdun and Toul.

The commencements of these two attacks in earnest was disclosed by the French official statement, but little is told of how they are progressing.

Germans' Gains Admitted.

The French report admits that the Germans have succeeded in gaining a footing on the Meuse heights and have pushed forward in the direction of St. Mihiel, bombarding the forts of Paroches and the Roman camp, which face each other, across the Meuse.

The communication, however, adds that, on the other hand, on the south of Verdun, the French remain masters of the heights of the Meuse and that their troops, debouching from Toul, have advanced in the region of Beaumont.

Claim German Defensive Move.

London, Sept. 28.—"That Cracow has been occupied by German troops, that the town has been put under a German military commandant and that the Austrian civil administration has been displaced, is the gist of the latest advices received here," says the Petrograd correspondent of the Morning Post.

Report Residents Fleeing.

"All the original administration of the town and all civil officials of the Austrian government have left and the residents are fleeing in a panic.

"The leaders of the Polish secret committee, which has been in charge of all the Polish volunteer detachments fighting on the Austrian side, also have left Cracow. The Germans have thrown three army corps into the Cracow district, according to this information, and are bringing more troops in preparation for the expected Russian attack.

Experts Set Figuring.

"Word has been received here that Germany has stopped all traffic on the railways between Berlin and the German Baltic ports of Danzig, Elbing and Stettin. This news has set experts to figuring on the possibility of a German descent on Russian territory by way of the Baltic. Any such move is regarded here as impossible from the standpoint of an effective act of war, although it might be theatrically effective in supporting the morale of the Berlin populace."

German Guns Deadly.

At the Battle Front, Sept. 26.—Via Paris.—The German offensive was extremely vigorous at the western end of the long line stretching along the rivers Oise, Aisne and Woevre.

At one place the victims of the deadly German machine guns were counted in hundreds, especially where the advance was across an open wheat field that recently had been harvested.

"Some men of a French regiment, which was making a dash toward the German position when it was struck by the sweeping fire, were found dead in the kneeling posture they had taken behind the sheaves of wheat and from where they had emptied their magazines, intending to start a final rush and bayonet charge.

EUROPEAN WAR SITUATION.

Two desperate attacks are reported to have been struck almost simultaneously by the opposing armies in northern France, the Germans hurling themselves against the French between Verdun and Toul and the allies renewing violently their attack on the Teutons' right. Some decisive result is consequently looked for shortly.

Austrians Deny Defeats.

London, Sept. 26.—The Austrian general staff issues a denial of the reports of Russian victories and the defeat of General Dankl's army. The Austrian forces, the report says, "have been concentrated in a new position for several days, but have waited in vain for any serious Russian attack."

Russians Take Another Town.

London, Sept. 25.—The Russians in Galicia are pushing steadily on to their goal, which for the moment is Przemysl, according to Petrograd dispatches. They apparently have that place nearly surrounded, for, following the capture of Jaroslau, they announce the occupation of Wislok, a town on the Hungarian border southwest of Przemysl, and an important station on the railway which runs from Sanok through one of the passes of the Carpathians to Zemplyn and thence to Budapest.

MOVE HUGE GUNS TO VERDUN

Berlin, Sept. 28.—Official announcement is made that siege guns have been taken from Metz to bombard Verdun and the strong French forts in the vicinity of that stronghold.

"The French are striving to prevent the arrival of these guns," says the official statement, "but they are steadily approaching nearer. The reduction of Verdun cannot be averted when they reach a position where they can be operated with full effect.

"Our smaller guns continue their bombardment of Verdun Tulline with good effect."

1.460 BRITISH SEAMEN LOST

ADMIRALTY ISSUES FACTS CONCERNING NORTH SEA DISASTER.

Three Ships Sank Rapidly—Two Went Down Trying to Go to Rescue of Third.

London, Sept. 28.—The facts concerning the sinking of the British cruisers Aboukir, Hogue and Cressy by a submarine or submarines in the North sea with a loss of nearly 60 officers and 1,400 men are contained in an admiralty statement just issued.

The reports of Commanders Nicholson of the Cressy and Norton of the Hogue state that the Aboukir was hit by one torpedo and sunk in 35 minutes. Three torpedoes were fired at the Cressy, one of the explosives missing narrowly. She lasted from 35 to 45 minutes. The Hogue was struck twice, 10 to 20 seconds elapsing between the torpedoes and went under in 5 minutes.

The Cressy fired on the submarine and some of the officers were confident that the shots sank her.

Commander Nicholson says that the three torpedoes directed against his ship might have been fired by the same submarine and that there is no real proof that more than one was engaged.

The reports show that the strictest discipline was maintained and that acts of heroism were performed, but the admiralty has established the rule that such affairs must be governed by the same laws as prevail in naval actions and that disabled ships must be left to their own resources rather than that other ships should be jeopardized by rescue work.

TELLS OF CATHEDRAL BURNING

GERMAN INJURED BEATEN, SAYS ABBE OF RHEIMS.

London, Sept. 26.—The correspondent of the Daily Mail at Rheims gives a story by the Abbe Camu of the terrible scenes in the cathedral when it was set on fire. He said, in part:

"It was all over in an hour. There were two separate fires. We put the first out with four buckets of water, all we had in the place, but soon another shell struck the roof and the wind drove the flames along the rafters inside of the nave. We rushed up again but it was flaming all along and, as we could do nothing, we hurried down.

"There were holes in the ceiling of the nave and sparks began to fall through into a great heap of straw, 10 feet high and 20 yards long, the Germans had piled along the north aisle. We tried to catch the sparks in our hands as they fell and such of the German wounded as were able to walk helped us. But the first spark that fell on the pile set it blazing. There was time to think of nothing but getting out the wounded. They screamed horribly. We carried many of those that could not walk while others dragged themselves painfully along to the side door in the north aisle. Those who had only hand and arm wounds helped their comrades. We got out all except 13, whose bodies lie here now.

"When at last I came out of the flaming building I found the whole body of wounded huddled together around the doors. Opposite to them was a furiously hostile crowd of civilians of the town and a number of soldiers with their rifles already leveled.

"I sprang forward. 'What are you doing?' I cried.

"'They shall all burn,' shouted the soldiers in answer. 'They shall go back and burn with the cathedral or we will shoot them here.'

"'You are mad?' I explained. 'Think of what this means. All the world will hear of the crime the Germans have committed here and if you shoot these men the world will know that France has been as criminal in her turn. Anyhow,' I said, 'you shall shoot me first for I will not move.'

"Well, then the crowd, who was mad with grief and rage, set on us. I cannot describe it. You have never seen anything so dreadful as that scene. They beat some of the Germans and some of them they shot down."

CARNEGIE HOME; ABSOLVES KAISER OF BLAME FOR WAR

ASSERTS GERMAN MINISTERS RESPONSIBLE FOR PRECIPITATING CONFLICT IN CHIEF'S ABSENCE.

CALLS EMPEROR WILLIAM MOST SORROWFUL MAN

New York, Sept. 26.—Andrew Carnegie absolved Emperor William of responsibility for the European war on his arrival here from England on board the Mauretania.

Knows Kaiser Well.

"I know the kaiser well," said Mr. Carnegie.

"He is the most sorrowful man in Europe today. The emperor went to sea for a vacation. He was on his yacht when he heard of the trouble. He got into communication with Berlin. He was called back and went with all speed. When he got there the mischief was done.

Thinks Ministers Responsible.

"His ministers are responsible for the entire affair. The German emperor has done more for developing Germany than any other ruler of his time. He has made schools, he has pensioned the working classes, and he has helped the laboring man. Kaiser Wilhelm came into power and found Germany, under Bismarck, an uncivilized community.

"Things have taken such a turn that I believe Sir Edward Grey said exactly the right thing when he made the statement:

"'We are not fighting the German people, but German militarism.'

Criticises German Militarism.

"German militarism overrules the great men of Germany. The great men of Germany are not members of the court, but are scientists, philosophers and the real leaders of Germany's progress.

"The rulers of the world gathered around the men who feel that they also have a tenure of office and form these military cliques, such as was formed in Germany, and they took such action as instigating this war during the absence of the kaiser himself.

Compliments Edward Grey.

"Now that the war is on, I am delighted to find that Britain has as great and able man as Sir Edward Grey. He is a man who will lead them in the right way, he is a man who does not say things without meaning them. There is on greater statesman in the world today."

Mr. Carnegie expressed his pleasure over getting back to America.

"To get back to a republic at peace, and a country of the brotherohod of man, is wonderful," he said.

"Greatest Slaughter of All Time."

New York, Sept. 26.—"It is not war; it is a holocaust. The greatest slaughter in the world's history is going on behind that censorship curtain in France. When the world learns of the price that has been paid it will be staggered, sick at heart." That was the way Rev. Father James Malloy, who landed here on the Mauretania, summed up the European war. He knows far more about it than anyone else who has so far reached these shores. For two weeks and five days Father Mallony was on the actual firing line. He acted as chaplain attached to General French's personal headquarters.

U. S. Troops Will Likely Stay.

Washington, Sept. 28.—American forces will remain in Vera Cruz until the question of authority between General Carranza and General Villa is settled. This was the consensus of opinion of administration officials, although no definite announcement of the intentions of the Washington government was made. Secretary Garrison telegraphed General Funston at Vera Cruz not to load any necessary baggage or supplies aboard the transports.

Kaiser Carries Clover Talisman.

Von Schoen Denies Interview.

New York, Sept. 25.—Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador, said that he had received a letter from Baron Wilhelm von Schoen, an attache of the German embassy, in which the latter emphatically denied that he had stated in an interview attributed to him in Washington that he believed war between the United States and Japan was inevitable. Baron von Schoen further denied that he had made any statement that could be construed to mean this.

WAS MISERABLE COULDN'T STAND

Testifies She Was Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Lackawanna, N. Y.—"After my first child was born I felt very miserable and could not stand on my feet. My sister-in-law wished me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and my nerves became firm, appetite good, step elastic, and I lost that weak, tired feeling. That was six years ago and I have had three fine healthy children since. For female troubles I always take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it works like a charm. I do all my own work."—Mrs. A. F. KREAMER, 1574 Electric Avenue, Lackawanna, N. Y.

The success of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs, is unparalleled. It may be used with perfect confidence by women who suffer from displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, bearing-down feeling, flatulency, indigestion, dizziness, or nervous prostration. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the standard remedy for female ills.

Women who suffer from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should be convinced of the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health by the many genuine and truthful testimonials we are constantly publishing in the newspapers.

I Want Some of THE BLACK SHELLS

YOU can get better shells now than you bought just a few years ago. You can get THE BLACK SHELLS, which have modern features that improve trap scores 5% and field shooting 10%.

THE BLACK SHELLS have a non-mercuric primer that contains no ground glass (as mercury primers do) to absorb 16% of the heat of the primer flame and slow down the ignition. Hence the extraordinary heat from our primers.

THE BLACK SHELLS primer is a strictly chemical mixture that goes off with unthinkable speed and unvarying uniformity. Our flash passage through which the primer flame reaches the main charge is double size. These causes combine to make THE BLACK SHELLS drive the shot in a bird-proof pattern and with amazing penetrating power.

THE BLACK SHELLS are really and truly waterproof. Mean, rainy, foggy weather does not swell them. They are always dry and smooth—easy to eject and they "work" perfectly in a pump or automatic.

Send for our book about shells and learn about the other modernisms in THE BLACK SHELLS.

There are three BLACK SHELLS: ROMAX for black powder; CLIMAX and AJAX for smokeless powder.

State News of General Interest

STATE TAX LEVY IS REDUCED FOR 1915

ADDED $124,000,000 OF VALUATION IN STATE FACTOR IN .28 OF A MILL DECREASE.

NO CAPITAL LEVY NEXT YEAR

Fact That This Debt Is Fully Paid Does Away With .2 of a Mill Heretofore Required—More for Militia Armories.

St. Paul.—Minnesota's state tax levy for 1915 has been fixed by State Auditor S. C. Iverson. It shows a reduction of .28 of a mill from the 1914 levy. The total levy for state purpose is 4.75 mills, compared with 5.03 mills for this year.

Reason for Decrease.

An increase of $124,000,000 in the assessed valuation of the state made part of this reduction possible. The final figures on assessments are not available, as three counties have not reported, and the state tax commission has just begun its work of equalization, but Mr. Iverson estimates the total real and personal property assessment of the state this year at $1,494,000,000, compared with $1,369,970,302 for 1913. Another factor in the decrease is the final retirement of state capitol certificates. The capitol now is paid for and .2 of a mill heretofore levied is done away with.

More for National Guard.

Mr. Iverson has made the levy for the state revenue fund 2 mills even, instead of 2.3 mills. Other items are the same, save a slight increase from .03 to .05 of a mill levied for national guard armories. The items in the state tax levy for 1915 are:

	Mills.
Revenue fund	2.00
Roads and bridges	1.00
Soldiers' relief	.10
Prison building fund	.20
National guard armories	.05
Educational building fund	.14
Historical society buildings	.01
Itasca park acquisition	.02
State school fund	1.00
State university	.23

The legislature fixed the maximum tax levy for the biennial period last year. The state auditor has authority to reduce this where possible.

The state tax levy of 4.75 mills will realize the state revenue fund $2,995,000. Out of this revenue fund is paid the running expenses of the state. The total taxable valuation of real and personal property for the year 1913 was $1,369,970,000. Addition caused by the new basis of assessment fixed by the 1913 legislation added about $125,000,000. This makes a total of about $1,495,000,000.

WAR SAPS YOUTHFUL ENERGY

Winona.—Emphasizing the cost of war in sapping the youthful energy of a nation, James A. Tawney, former congressman, who made a memorable attack in congress on militarism, furnished figures to show that the youth of a nation is the sacrifice of armed combat. His statistics are those of the Civil war.

Notes he took from the official records of the war department were found by him. They showed that in the Civil war there were enlisted in the army of the North, 2,778,309 men, and of these 25 were 10 years old and younger; 225, 12 years and under; 1,523, 14 years and under; 844,891, 16 years and under; 1,151,438, 18 years and under; 2,159,798, 21 years and under, and 618,511, 22 years and over.

Thus the average of the whole Union army was 19.7 years.

"It shows how the industrial energy of a nation is destroyed," Mr. Tawney said. "The rising generation carries the burden, and it will require years and years in, the European nations now at war to recover from the awful cost of this conflict. The figures from our Civil war are convincing."

Corn Carnival Is Held.

Madison.—The corn carnival at Madison, Minn., proved to be one of the largest corn exhibits ever shown in the state. A huge arch built of corn with the inscription "Corn Is King," was prominent in decoration scheme. Traveling men's day drew 400 traveling men.

Rhodes Scholar Joins Faculty.

Fergus Falls.—Professor J. A. Larsen arrived from England to accept a position as instructor in Greek and Latin at Park Region Luther college. He is a Rhodes scholar, being one of two selected from the state of Iowa. He has also traveled in Germany, France and other European countries. He has a great admiration for German scholarship, but regards the present war as a war against German militarism, and feels the world will be better off if militarism is overthrown.

FIRE PREVENTION DAY OCT. 9

Governor Eberhart Asks That Special Attention Be Called to Great Unnecessary Waste in State.

St. Paul.—Minnesota will observe Friday, Oct. 9, as Fire Prevention day, and in many public places and private concerns special attention will be called that day to the waste that comes from carelessness in permitting fire hazards to exist. Governor A. O. Eberhart issued a proclamation naming the special day.

"In no way can greater economy prevail," says the proclamation, "than in preventing the terrible fire losses to which Minnesota, like other states of the union, is subject. While in Europe the average per capita loss by fire is 33 cents, in this country it is $2.50. This is a loss that is as appalling as it is criminally unnecessary. The fact that during the past 15 years $2,000,000,000 of property has been destroyed and 20,000 lives have been sacrificed to the fire scourge is enough to compel action.

"Minnesota has started out to curb the fire evil, and while much has been accomplished, yet the great bulk of the work remains to be done. * * * It is necessary that some special act be performed to call attention to the useless waste by fire, and this can best be done through the agency of the churches, schools, private concerns, commercial and municipal organizations.

"For the purpose of calling particular attention to this campaign against the waste by fire, I especially proclaim Friday, Oct. 9, as Fire Prevention day in Minnesota. It should be recognized in the different departments of the state, in all public and private institutions, by social, religious, educational and commercial organizations, and by individuals interested in the social and economic benefit of our people."

HARVEST FESTIVAL SUCCESS

Lacqui Parle County Farmers Show Wonderful Products and Accomplish Much by Exhibit.

Madison.—The largest and most complete corn and alfalfa exhibit ever displayed at a county fair was in evidence at the great corn festival at Madison. The combined efforts of the farmers of Lacqui Parle county and the fair association contributed to produce the best exhibit of corn ever collected.

A special feature was the township prize corn contest. A large booth contained specimens of the best corn in the county. Hundreds of dollars in prizes were paid the townships taking the prizes. The task of collecting such a representative display of good corn was accomplished by the combined efforts of farmers' clubs, rural schools and county agricultural men.

Secretary Rosenwald attributes the success of the festival to the activities of farmers and teachers throughout the rural districts. A fine exhibit of alfalfa was also presented. Several hundred acres of alfalfa planted last spring produced excellent yields.

Professor H. R. Smith of the University of Minnesota addressed an enthusiastic group of farmers. He advocated the growing of corn for stock consumption on the farm and pointed out other advantages of corn raising. A stock breeders' association was formed.

HEMP GROWS WELL IN STATE

Cambridge.—Miss Lillian Johnson, owner of Hillcrest farm, near here, is trying an experiment which may make it unnecessary in the future for the state prison binding twine plant to send all the way to the Philippine islands for its raw material.

She planted about an acre of hemp this year, believing it could be grown successfully on her farm. Samples of the matured hemp plant, sent to St. Paul by John A. Stoneburg of Cambridge, are on exhibition, and indicate the experiment was a success. The stalks are nearly eleven feet in height and perfectly developed.

In order to grow this plant it is necessary to use much rich fertilizer, Mr. Stoneburg says. Miss Johnson expects to plant a larger tract next year in order to ascertain whether the growing of hemp in Minnesota will pay. She is also raising tobacco, hops and sweet potatoes on her Isanti county farm. She takes delight in these experiments.

Urge Sunday Ball Law Repeal.

Winnebago.—Reports of the district superintendents of the Minnesota Methodist Episcopal conference by G. A. Cahoon of Mankato, F. A. Cone of Marshall, Frank Doran of St. Paul and J. A. Taylor of Winona at the session here, showed a membership increase of 2,000. Repeal of the present Sunday baseball law was urged by speakers, who advocated a Saturday afternoon or midweek holiday. Street meetings were a feature of the conference.

ST. PAUL WIFE CHARGES PLOT

DEFENDS HUSBAND IN WHITE SLAVE CASE.

Declares That Complaining Witness Against Rufus Edwards Lives on Proceeds of State Suit.

Chicago.—Affidavits have just been presented to Charles Clyne, United States district attorney, charging that the indictments of William Rufus Edwards, wealthy St. Paul lumberman, on a charge of violating the white slave act, were the result of a plot by Miss Ada M. Cox, the complaining witness. Although the indictments were returned a year ago, the trial has not yet been begun.

The affidavits were presented to Clyne by Mrs. Edwards, who is a niece of United States Senator Clapp.

Miss Cox, she said, is living on the $17,500 she collected from Edwards in a suit in the Minnesota state courts. Edwards is in a sanitarium near St. Paul. His hair has turned snow white, and he does not recognize his most intimate friends, according to his wife.

POTATO RATE HEARING NEAR

October 14 Date Set for Deciding Shipping Controversy—Examiner Dow to Come.

St. Paul.—Potato rates from Minnesota to points in Illinois, Indiana and Ohio will be the subject of a hearing before Examiner Dow of the interstate commerce commission, October 14, in St. Paul.

The tariffs on potatoes on all the roads of the Northwest have been the cause of disputes with shippers for several years, complaints having been brought especially against the Great Northern and the St. Paul.

Following this hearing, an effort will be made to have a final settlement which will include the charges made by the carriers for providing lined and heated cars in cold weather.

Arguments before the commission on the complaints involving interstate rates from the Head of the Lakes to Minnesota points will begin in Washington October 7.

The point at issue is the right of the carriers to make rates by interstate routes lower than those by intrastate routes.

CHOLERA LOSS ABOUT SAME

Total Last Year $8,000,000 and Reports Received by Dr. S. H. Ward Show No Diminution in Disease.

St. Paul.—Losses from hog cholera in Minnesota probably will be as great this year as they were last, according to reports received by Dr. S. H. Ward, secretary of the state live stock sanitary board. The losses to the farmers of the state during 1913 totaled about $8,000,000.

100 Die on State Farm.

Hog cholera has seized the pigs on the farms conducted by the state board of control at the St. Peter hospital. C. J. Swendsen of the board returned from a visit to St. Peter today and said 100 hogs died of the cholera at the hospital farm last week. In order to prevent spread of the disease twenty-one valuable hogs were killed. While Mr. Swendsen was at the farm piggery four hogs died of the disease.

Confined to Southern Part.

Dr. Ward said the cholera is mostly confined to the southern part of the state. Federal officers are now in that section investigating conditions.

1,500,000 BALLOTS NEEDED

Half of Blanks for Fall Election Will Contain Proposed Amendments —Distribution Soon.

St. Paul.—It will require 1,500,000 state ballots to supply the voters of Minnesota this fall according to Secretary of State Julius A. Schmahl, who has charge of the printing. Half of this number will be the ballots containing the eleven proposed amendments to the constitution and the other half will be for the names of the candidates for state office.

Mr. Schmahl already has ordered the pink ballots containing the amendments printed and will distribute these within a few days to the various county auditors. The white ballots carrying the candidates' names cannot be printed until after October 3, the last date on which filing by petition will be accepted.

The only petition expected is the one to place the name of Hugh T. Halbert of St. Paul on the ballot as the Progressive candidate for governor. This, it is understood, has been completed.

Delegation Visits Training School.

Red Wing.—About twenty-five men and women, representing the Boys' Welfare league of St. Paul, spent a day at the training school here. They were entertained at luncheon by Superintendent J. T. Fulton and officers of the institution. In the afternoon they were shown through the various buildings and gained an excellent knowledge of the system of training in force at the school. A meeting was held in the auditorium, the boys being addressed by men interested in their welfare.

Why Fasel Should Not Be Returned

As the Thief River Falls News-Press has devoted a couple of columns of editorial space to an article entitled "Should Return Fasel." We will devote a little space to explaining to the farmers and tax payers of this county, why they should fire Fasel. When Fasel went into that office he conducted it in an accurate and pains taking manner, but, alas, he met the enemy and he is "his'n." We will quote from a letter which we received from A. H. Fasel, under date of May 1st 1912, at the time we were having so much trouble with ditch No. 47. Mr. Fasel says:

"It certainly will be a great relief to get these Ditching Jobs progressing as they should, I believe I fully realize how badly your people are in need of the ditches, and it is indeed mighty unfortunate to have become burdened with these "Tramp Ditches" and "Scalpers"."

At the time Mr. A. H. Fasel wrote that letter he was trying to represent the interests of the farmer tax payers.

Now let us see what he is doing to-day.

When Grunde Austad of Malone, asked him what about ditch 42, he informed him that he had not granted any extension of time on Ditch 42 after 1911, but when the farmers hired an attorney to look up the record, the attorney found that an extension had been granted. Nor is this all he has done, but he has added insult to injury, by re-letting the ditch to Mareau, the old dead beat contractor, who failed to dig it before, because he says the bonding companies gave their consent, and perhaps ARRANGEMENTS had been made.

But, says the other tax payers of Pennington County, we are not particulary interested in Ditch 42, so let us tell you something that you are interested in. Are you aware my dear tax paying farmer that you and every tax paying citizen of Pennington County had to dig down in your pocket and pay twice to the Thief River Falls News-Press for publishing the delinquent tax lists last spring owing to errors in the first publication, made in the copy from the EFFICIENT (?) County Auditor's office?

Now Fasel has a fashion of picking up a copy of THE SUNBEAM and saying, "Hunt is a liar."

We challenge any tax payer of this county to go down to the Treasuer's office and see if the vouchers are not there for the payment of the publication of that delinquent tax list twice, owing to errors made in the first copy.

Does that show efficiency in office? Is it any wonder that the News-Press wants this man returnd to office? The News-Press says that Fasel has the care of the poor to look after. Did he consider the poor tax payers when he had them pay twice for doing this legal work? Not on your tin type, he did not! Mr. Fasel was able to get out these lists in former years correct, and whether his mistakes were accidental or intentional, we leave the people to judge, as we only quote the facts, as they appear from the County Records, and anyone can see that it is facts by looking up the county records, and the checks given for payment of the county bills.

Any printer knows that the payment of this bill twice for doing that work was an easy piece of money for the News-Press to make, and it is no wonder that Mr. Cutter can now devote so much space to telling "Why Fasel Should Be Returned."

We offer free space in THE SUNBEAM for Mr. Fasel to explain these charges.

Good Words For Hansen.

C. L. Hansen, candidate for State Senator from the 65th District, comprising the counties of Red Lake, Pennington and Clearwater is spending a few days this week taking in the County Fair and getting acquainted with the voters of this section of the country. Mr. Hansen's home is at Thief River Falls where he is engaged in the banking business and is one of that city's best boosters. Not only is he popular in his home town, but equally so in other localities where he formerly resided. During his brief visit here he appears to have made many friends who have declared their intentions of giving him their support during the coming election. He is a clean cut, able business man, and would make an excellent man to represent the 65th Dist., in the senate.—The Bagley Independent.

WANT TO BOND THE COUNTY

The people of Thief River Falls will submit a proposition to the voters of Pennington county to vote to bond the county for $50,000 to build a county hospital at Thief River Falls, at the general election on November 3rd. We are of the opinion that this proposition should and will be bitterly opposed by the farmers of the eastern part of the county.

The fact of the matter is that the farmers of this territory are already heavily loaded with ditch bonds, and they have only commenced to open up their farms since they have got them drained and nearer to a market for their produce. We know that the argument will be used that this hospital would be and is just what the county needs; and that it will only add a little to your taxes.

A stick of cord wood does not add much to the heft of a load of wood, but if you keep throwing on stick after stick you will get a load that will break down the strongest wagon, so the farmers of the east end should be sure to vote no on any proposition that will increase the burden of their taxes at this time.

We do not know how the farmer tax payers of Highlanding will vote on the question, but A. H. Fasel claims that seventy-five per cent of them will vote for his re-election, and if they do they are likely to vote for bonds, for they like to pay taxes so well that they are willing to pay twice for publishing the delinquint tax list.

Greek Wind Vanes.

The Greeks as far back as the fifth century B. C. were the first to make regular meteorological observations, some results of which still are preserved. Their great capacity for pure science induced them to propound meteorological theories. At this time they used wind vanes, and in the first century B. C. they built the tower of wind at Athens. The first quantitative observations—that is, the measurement of rain—were made in the first century A. D. These were made in Palestine, and their results are preserved in the Mishna.

The village of Goodridge is like some mining villages that grow up in one night.

T. G. Rome is thrashing yesterday and to-day. He has the Olson thrashing rig doing the work for him.

The weather has been very fine the past week, for stacking and thrashing, but there has been high winds nearly every day.

We are busy building an addition to our grainary to-day, and next week have to build a building that will be a curiosity in this country, viz, a corn crib.

C. L. Clark went down to Thief River Falls yesterday by way of the new Electric Line. He says it is a nice way to go to town, but the cars will not wait for a fellow to talk, but he has to get on board, if he wants to return by train.

Oscar T. Stenvick of Bagley, candidate for Representative, was up this way Wednesday looking over the field for votes. He made this office a pleasant call, and said that he was going to make a vigorous campaign, from the present time until election day.

Wm. Causin received notice last week that the final decision by the Secretary of the Interior had been given in his favor, in the contest case that he had with Wm. Fuller, involving the title to the S. W. ¼, section 33, Town of Kratka. This case has been long drawn out and bitterly fought, and appealed as long as it could be appealed.

We publish an article in another column, which we desire to have the people read carefully. If you doubt the truth of it, ask your County Commissioner if it is not facts. Tell him that you do not care for a long string of explanations, but to answer your question, viz: "Did the tax payers of this county pay twice for that publication or not? Answer yes or no.

Brother Lattimore says he has now got a horse and buggy of his own so he can ride around the country instead of walking. A good idea John, but stop right there, and do not do as we have done, after we bought the first horse, buy a mate to him, then buy another one so as to break land, for if you do, you will soon be worrying about rust and frosts and wet and dry weather. Stop now John, don't be tempted to buy a mate to that horse.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Olsen, of Rudell were transacting notary business here Wednesday, and made this office a pleasant visit. Mr. Olsen says that Mr Fasel, county auditor, was telling him a hard luck story when he was down to Thief River Falls last week, about Hunt and THE SUNBEAM. We are not abusing Fasel at all, but we are exposing some his official acts to the tax payers of this county, and he even wrote us a personal letter saying, "that it was great advertising," so, we can't see what he is kicking about.

Mrs. K. M. Kratzer received a letter yesterday from her parents in Germany. The letter states that there is a scarcity of food there now; and that prices for food has reached almost prohibitive prices among the poorer class of people. The old people are of the opinion that Mr. Kratzer will have to return to that country and fight for the kaiser. But Mr. Kratzer is so busy breaking muskeg for flax next season, that he will hardly get time to help Wilhelm out. Mrs. Kratzer has two brothers safely under the stars and stripes that are located at Raymond, Washington.

It is certainly handy to have a lumber yard so near as Goodridge, where the farmers can get grainary material.

There seams to be plenty of thrashing rigs in this territory this fall, so we guess all the farmers can get their thrashing done early in the season.

All these political announcements are paid for, or to be paid for at regular rates.

Having received the nomination for County Treasurer of Pennington County, I respectfully solicit your support and vote at the General Election November 3rd 1914.

Respectfully,

DIET AND DIGESTION.

Length of Time Different Foods Remain in the Stomach.

Few people could make an accurate guess as to the length of time different foods remain in the stomach. The popular ideas as to what are the most digestible foods are all wrong, or nearly so. In eating chicken, for instance, one imagines that he is sure of a rapid digestion, and yet chicken meat remains in the stomach, under normal conditions, for four hours. Duck, which is generally supposed to be much more difficult to digest than chicken, remains for only two hours.

A hard boiled egg lasts for four hours, which is much longer than the average, whereas boiled fish remains for only an hour and a half.

It is a very common mistake to suppose that well boiled beef is very easily digested, while as a matter of fact it remains in the stomach for six hours, which is longer than any other common article of food. Tripe, on the other hand, remains for only one hour in the stomach and is one of the easiest of all foods to digest.

A period of one and a half hours is required for apples, celery, cheese and oysters, while twice this time is required by rye bread, onions, sausage or raw milk.—Boston Herald.

I stooped over him and pressed my lips to his forehead. I felt no longer any revulsion from this pitiful human being whose span was nearly run. I could see by the ashen pallor that spread over his face that the end was almost come. "I forgive you freely," I answered.

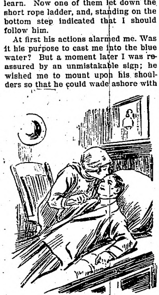
He smiled weakly, and, closing his eyes, lay back, his hand still holding mine. In a minute more he had sunk into unconsciousness. I sat there long; I lost all sense of time; I did not even realize that the anchor was weighed and that we were setting out to sea; nor did I hear the ominous splashes in the sea that marked the burial of the dead. I sat there till the grasp suddenly relaxed and the eyes opened. Then I left the cabin forever and went up on the deck.

I looked around me at the waste of waters over which we were speeding. I saw the silent man at the wheel. I heard the wind creak through the cordage; and in a sudden outburst of tears I found relief. Dawn was breaking in the east, and down in my soul. Too long I had been perplexed and harassed by this nightmare of circumstance; now my thoughts turned from the dead to the living, from Leopold to my lover.

All the next day we raced northward across the Mediterranean until, late in the afternoon, land upheaved itself across our bows, and I saw the wooded promontory of Bon Martin, with the white houses of the village nestling beneath the cliff. But the helmsman twisted his wheel and we veered away, running parallel with a white beach until we cast anchor not fifty yards from a low and desolate shore.

They had not spoken a word to me, these silent men. Whoever they were, of whence they came, I was never to learn. Now one of them let down the short rope ladder, and, standing on the bottom step indicated that I should follow him.

At first his actions alarmed me. Was it his purpose to cast me into the blue water? But a moment later I was reassured by an unmistakable sign; he wished me to mount upon his shoulders so that he could wade ashore with me. And in proof of his intention, he sprang into the sea, which did not reach higher than his armpits. Clearly this was the edge of a shoal; and, doubtless, the yacht had put in here to avoid notice.



Stooped Over Him and Pressed My Lips to His Forehead.

With some misgivings, I obeyed, and, clasping me tightly, the sailor waded ashore until he had deposited me high and dry above the sweep of the waves. Then, with a sweep of his cap, he was gone, and I stood upon the beach watching him.

He waded back and clambered aboard again. A moment later I heard the creak of the windlass, saw the anchor rise heavily out of the sea. There was a column of black smoke at the top of the funnel, the yacht began to back, swung around, and put out to sea once more. I watched her till she was no more than a speck upon the horizon.

Then, as if in a dream, I started along the beach in the direction of Bon Martin. As I trod the soil of France again my heart leaped in my veins with ecstasy. For in my dress, secure, I held my bonds and Leopold's confession. And in my hand, I held the money that he had left me. I felt no shame in taking it; it would play its part in releasing Charles and it was all the reparation that Leopold could make.

And this was Wednesday evening! I should arrive days and days ahead of necessity. For I could reach Paris by Friday morning, which left me three whole days before the trial began.

After half a mile of tramping over the clogging sands I began to pass fishermen's cottages; then the white houses of the residents appeared, strung out under the cliff, and the sand yielded to a firm road. Not far ahead of me I saw a little railway station. And, surest test of civilization, a little newsboy scampered along toward me, crying the latest edition of the Nice papers. I stopped him and purchased one, bidding him keep the change of the franc I handed him. Feverishly I opened it.

A moment later I was staggering like a drunken woman. For, in the large, black headlines before my eyes I read the fate of Charles, and the uselessness of my journey. The trial was to take place on Friday morning.

The government had hastened it by three days, to appease the outcries of the press and save the ministry. For, if I had left public feeling against Charles at red-hot heat, it was now white-heat and incandescent.

"By Friday evening the traitor must be on his way to perpetual exile on the Devil's island, or the government falls," was the terse telegraphic summary of the Paris correspondent.

What would I not have given now for the aeroplane that lay, a wreck of metal and wood, in Scouto market place!

"As for the female spy, who was released on bail," the message continued, "it is now believed that the woman who flew through France and evaded the authorities in so sensational a manner upon the Monaco frontier and at other places, was not she, but merely a notoriety seeker. It is said, on trustworthy report, that the spy has fled to Belgium, to join her lover, an ex-officer of the German army, and has already placed herself outside the reach of the law."

I smiled weakly at this wildest of all rumors. Then I set off hot-footed. Five minutes later, breathless, with tumbling hair, I was interviewing the station master, at Bon Martin.

"A special train to Paris, madame!" he ejaculated, when he had recovered from his astonishment. "It is impossible. It would cost you six thousand francs. It would disorganize the traffic over the entire system. Besides, no special train could reach the capital by Thursday morning. If you should take the night local to Marseilles and make the Thursday morning express, it would land you there by eight a. m. on Friday."

"But Friday will be too late," I cried, thrusting down the money upon the table of his office. "Here are seven thousand francs. Take them—only give me a train. You do not comprehend, monsieur; it is a matter of life or death."

He rose, perplexed, and scratched his head.

"I don't see how it can be done," he faltered. "Under ordinary circumstances I could give you a special to Marseilles, where you could make your own arrangements, but unfortunately—why, the ex-Empress Eugenie comes from Nice tonight, and traffic must wait for her."

I glanced at him in dumb despair. Then my gaze wandered to a great map of the southern railroads of France, suspended from the wall, and an idea occurred to me. I walked over and placed my finger on it.

"But why not go through Lyon?" I asked.

He came over to me and followed the tracing of my finger.

"Why, yes, mademoiselle, I could give you a clear road to Lyon," he answered. "But there you would have to wait for the express from Geneva, which has precedence of all traffic, for his excellency the president of the Swiss republic makes a ceremonial visit to Paris and—"

"And traffic must wait for him," I ejaculated bitterly.

"Exactly, madame," he answered, beaming. "Your perspicacity is like that of a man. I am sorry, but—"

"Give me a special train to Lyon," I interrupted brusquely.

"But it will do you no good, madame," faltered the station master. Then his glance fell upon the money; he shrugged his shoulders, looked at me whimsically as though it were useless to interpose further objections to my foolish whim, and became all at once the man of action.

"It shall be ready in fifteen minutes," he answered. "But, madame, the authorities will certainly not permit any special to follow his excellency, the president, for several hours."

I made no answer but paced the station platform while the lumbering engine reversed itself upon the turntable and at last came clattering up to its car and was coupled on. In less than half an hour all was in readiness. I stepped into my car, and, an instant later, we were off, really off, on the long road to Paris—or at least Lyon.

All through the night we raced over the vast plains, now sweeping by the Rhone, a breath of dismal, wind-swept water, now winding among oak forests and fields of grain the scent of which came to me through the velvety blackness. I had not eaten since the preceding evening, and should not eat again till I reached Paris. I felt dizzy and weak—but the intensity of my resolution spurred me to fresh efforts; nor did I close my eyes until, soon after six, we rolled into the large station at Lyon.

Upon the platform opposite a train was standing, the engine puffing frantically, as though anxious to be off. I sprang from the carriage and raced toward it. A functionary barred my way.

"You cannot pass," he said sternly. "His excellency the president of the Swiss republic—"

"But I must see him," I cried wildly. "I must see the president instantly. I—"

Then I became aware that a stout good-natured, fatherly-looking old gentleman, who had been pacing the platform, stretching his legs, had halted nearby and was watching me intently. Though it was early morning he wore a full dress suit, across which a broad sash of many colors was draped. Instinct leaped to my aid. I cried to him:

"Monsieur le President!"

He hesitated and then came swiftly toward me.

"At your service, madame," he answered.

"Take me to Paris in your train," I pleaded. "It is a matter of life or death. They will not let me hire a train. I must go, I must be there by evening—"

He bowed and offered his arm.

"You shall be my guest, madame," he answered, and escorted me to his carriage, as though I were a princess, leaving a line of gaping functionaries behind him.

That age-long journey is only the faintest memory to me now, for, once the train started, my pent-up feelings found vent in a hysterical outburst which sorely repaid the good president for his courtesy. I remember how he and his suite crowded me as I lay in the sleeping car which he had perforce relinquished to me; how someone discovered that I was starving and fed me with milk and whisky; how, overcome by the potency of the liquor, I babbled something of my story—at least enough to reveal my identity. Then the romance of it gripped them and they constituted themselves my servitors. Towns rushed past us and were swallowed up in the plains, night followed day, and at last, after an eternity of torment, we rolled into the terminal at eight o'clock on the morning of Friday.

Next I remember a wild ride in a cab, with the secretary of the Swiss legation seated beside me, trying to calm me as I brandished a bundle of papers; a halt at the fortress gates; a sudden message that sent orderlies scurrying in all directions; finally there comes to mind the picture of a courtroom, of the grave judges, of Charles, erect in his uniform, regarding me at first stonily, then with a cry of amazed joy. I recall, most faintly of all, thrusting down my documents before the presiding officer. Then blackness encompassed me and, as my senses failed, I felt Charles' arms encircle me, and fell into that haven as a shipwrecked sailor casts himself on the sustaining breast of the land.

CHAPTER XII.

Mr. Spratt to the Rescue.

(In which I discover that the Code Napoleon is by no means a negligible quantity.)

My dramatic appearance before the military tribunal had been none too soon. In accordance with the usual procedure the court had convened at six o'clock in the morning. In fact, at the moment of my appearance with the proof of Charles' innocence the judges were already preparing to retire for the consideration of their verdict; and that verdict could have been of one nature alone.

My proofs threw an entirely new complexion upon the affair. While insufficient to secure Charles' immediate acquittal, they were of a nature so startling—implicating, as they did, three powers of Europe and unveiling an international conspiracy—that an adjournment was immediately obtained. A week later, when the tribunal reconvened, Charles was acquitted with the merest formalities, his sword restored to him, and, a little subsequently, he received the coveted legion of honor from the president's hand.

He told me afterward that he had never doubted the ultimate verdict of the court; what had driven him almost to frenzy was his inability to learn anything concerning me. Of my wild flight to Corsica he had been kept in complete ignorance.

Of this, and the ensuing death of the chief conspirators, they say I told the presiding judge in detail. But of all that I have not the least remembrance. A violent attack of meningitis, the result of the physical and mental distress which I had undergone, confined me to my bed for weeks, during most of which period I was raving in delirium. I lived over again and again those awful scenes in Corsica and aboard the yacht; and ever I seemed hurrying to catch a special train which just eluded me at every station on each railroad line of France.

When I opened my eyes at last to consciousness they fell first upon Charles' mother. I was back in my room in Clichy, and she was seated beside me, watching me with that anxious and yet serene gaze which I had learned to know during those arduous days after my first arrival there. When she saw recognition in my eyes she began to weep quietly. She bent down and pressed her lips to my forehead.

"Charles?" was my first word.

"Hush!" she said, smiling, and tiptoed softly out of the room. A moment later she reappeared, Charles at her side. He knelt beside my bed and raised my fingers to his lips. He was attired in his complete uniform; I understood the meaning of that. There was no need to ask the judges' verdict.

We were supremely happy during those early days of my convalescence, when I could sit in my invalid chair under the pergola in the gardens, inhaling strength with every breath of the soft September airs. In those days we four, Charles and I, his mother and our grandfather, the old comte, forged a link that has made our lives inseparable. We shall never part, any of us, so long as we live; and in spite of his four and eighty years I hope that there will be many more years of activity for the Comte d'Yves.

One day, when I was almost well, I suddenly thought of the bonds which I had brought back from Corsica; those famous bonds without which this history would never have been written, nor Charles and I ever have met. I asked for them, and Charles' mother, who had been anticipating such a request, rose and brought them to me from the drawer of her escritoire.

"Is it not strange," I said, "that Magniff has not inquired for them? Or has he?"

Charles looked at his mother inquiringly, and she nodded her head. "Tell her, Charles," she said.

"Magniff will be here tomorrow," he answered. "Then he will require them."

"But what is he coming for besides?" I asked. And then the dreadful knowledge flashed over me. "For Clichy?" I demanded.

Charles nodded. "The interest fell due yesterday," he answered. "There is no hope of meeting it, Anne. Clichy must pass out of our hands; we have grown, in a way, reconciled to the loss and have already planned our future. We have packed everything and start tomorrow evening for Paris."

"Has not the tragic death of his son softened him?" I asked.

Charles laughed. "It has embittered him," he answered. "The fact is, Anne, he has aged greatly during the past month; he seems to be approaching a mental and physical breakdown; but with the death of Leopold he has concentrated all his thoughts upon the fulfilment of his long-cherished revenge for the affronts which he claims my grandfather put upon him so many years ago. I have pleaded with him to make some arrangement which would leave Clichy to us. Some of our foreign investments have turned out unexpectedly profitable, and would permit us to take a new mortgage and keep up the estate. But Magniff's sole thought is his revenge—and so, tomorrow, Clichy surrenders to the enemy for the first time in her history."

"I could not restrain my tears. "If only I had not sold him the bonds," I said. "Charles, grandfather, can such a bargain hold, seeing that I did not know the incalculable value that they were to him? Why, I could have obtained millions. You told me that he must have the bonds to deliver to the American government; that they are already sold. Why, I could have bankrupted him."

"The word of the d'Yves has never been withdrawn, Anne," answered my grandfather. "What the law is, matters nothing. You sold the bonds; unless the sale itself were invalid in law, it were better to lose Clichy than to try to reclaim them upon the grounds you mention."

"But," I said angrily, "he owes me 50,000 francs for the bonds—the price at which I sold them. Can he not be made to pay this before we lose Clichy, so that we can meet the interest upon the mortgage?"

Charles shook his head sadly. "Under the law," he said, "he need not pay for the bonds until the formalities connected with their transfer have been completed. That is the reason why he has not asked for them before. He does not mean to pay for them before Clichy is his. You appealed to him upon this subject once before in vain. And we—well, I asked him again fruitlessly."

We said no more. I wished to leave before Magniff's arrival, but the others vetoed this proposition emphatically.

"We must stay and surrender in person, Anne," they told me. "We'll haul down our flag."

And so, the following afternoon, we sat in the reception room awaiting the old banker's arrival.

He came at two o'clock. It was the first time that he had set foot in Clichy in some five and twenty years, and he did not conceal his sense of triumph. Shocked as I was at the change in him—for he presented the aspect of extreme old age—I could not but feel disgust at the insolence of his bearing, at the scarcely veiled contempt with which he treated us. His first word was as to the bonds; and when I had handed them to him, he scrutinized them for long, reading each letter carefully, as though to assure himself that I had not tricked him with a forgery. At last, satisfied, he handed me his receipt.

"If you will send me your future address, mademoiselle," he said blandly, "a check for fifty thousand francs will be sent to you within a week upon the conclusion of the legal formalities." And he sat back and gloated and rubbed his thin hands together, chuckling over our discomfiture.

My indignation overcame my powers of repression. I could not hold back the words that poured forth from my lips.

"So you have achieved your life purpose, your long-sought revenge." I cried. "You turn an old man from his home, the home of his ancestors during eight hundred years—and for some fancied slight in the long past. Well, make the most of your triumph during the few years of life remaining for you. But when he meets you before the judgment seat of the Almighty, how will you justify yourself? Hasn't life taught you anything? It's hard enough for all, but unless it teaches forgiveness and justice, compassion and humility, of what use is it? Has not your son's death shown you the futility of revenge, has it not taught anything to you?"

"Anne!" said Charles' mother imploringly.

The old banker smiled, as though the situation amused him. "I only claim my own," he answered, rubbing his hands again. "I am a business men, mademoiselle. Business knows none of the abstract qualities you have enumerated."

Then the grotesque came treading upon tragedy's heels. Our ancient servitor flung open the door.

"Les Cooks, madame!" he announced impassively.

"The what?" cried Charles, startled.

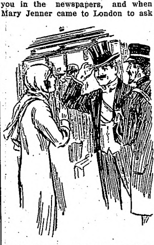
The ancient man explained. A chara-banc, containing some Cook's tourists—foreigners, he expounded, apologetically—had come from Paris and begged permission to see the famous castle of which they had heard so much.

"Show them in," said Charles' mother. "Have tea made. Pray remain, Monsieur Magniff. This is your property now."

"It will be at six o'clock this evening," said the banker, implacably.

"Les Cooks!" announced the serving man from the doorway, and upon the word a party of three entered—a man and two women. My eyes opened with amazement. Was I dreaming? Or were these really Mary Jenner, my one-time room-mate . . . and little Mr. Spratt . . . and Estelle Christie, whom I had left in London?

"Anne!" screamed Estelle, flinging her arms around my neck. "O, my dearest Anne, who would have thought of seeing you here? We read all about you in the newspapers, and when Mary Jenner came to London to ask me where you were I told her that we must positively go to Clichy, even though you weren't there."



"Take Me to Paris in Your Train," I Pleaded.

"Not here?" I stammered.

"Why, Anne, the newspapers said that you had gone to Copenhagen to instruct the crown prince in the art of aviation."

"A little device of mine," said Charles, smiling. "Just to avoid newspaper reporters."

Estelle opened her eyes.

"Well," she gasped at last. "If I don't make Cedar Plank, Ia., sit up and hum when I get back, I'll send my resignation to the Ladies' club." And I believe she meant it.

Then Mary and I kissed each other, and next I introduced the whole party to one another, not exclusive of Magniff, who, retiring into a corner immediately afterward, absorbed himself in reading something that looked like title deeds which he drew from his coat pocket. It was evident that he resented this comic interlude in the development of his own personal, private melodrama.

"So Mr. Spratt and you really took the trip," I said to Mary.

"Not alone, not alone," said Mr. Spratt hastily. "We're with a party in Paris—a large party of Winnipeg teachers. Just came out to Clichy for the day to see the place where we thought you weren't, you know, Miss Anne."

"I condole with you on the disappointment of learning that it was the place where I was," I answered. Somehow the memory of the innumerable snubbings that I had administered to Mr. Spratt compelled me to continue them.

But to my amazement Mr. Spratt refused to be snubbed again. Instead of blushing and retiring behind the person nearest him he looked at me quizzically, until I had to lower my eyes. And then I knew that something had happened!

It was another Mr. Spratt that faced me. He seemed to have emerged from his shyness like a butterfly from its cocoon. He was not embarrassed in the least degree. I glanced from him to Mary and saw that her face was rosy.

"Mary!" I gasped. "When—when is it to be?"

"In—in June," she murmured, looking like a fresh beet.

I recollected a certain letter in my possession in which she had alluded to her fiance as "an odious little persecutor," and for a moment mean thoughts assailed me. For, though I had never in the least reciprocated Mr. Spratt's undoubted passion for me, I did not like having Mary, my best friend, commandeer him from me. Then my good angel came to my assistance.

"I congratulate you both," I said, "and wish you the greatest happiness in the world."

Then we had tea, while Magniff brooded in the corner. I noticed that he had glanced repeatedly toward the mantel, and, after cogitating upon the cause of his manifest uneasiness, suddenly the truth flashed upon me.

He meant to take possession at six o'clock! And it was now a quarter after five.

I resolved to give him the worst three-quarters of an hour that he had ever spent in all his money-grubbing life. Our eyes met across the party. I read hate and hostility in his; what he saw in my own I do not know, but after a while he ceased to watch me and again began reading his title deeds.

I was thinking so busily that I hardly heard the conversation that was taking place until suddenly Mary sprang out of her chair and came over to me, her eyes beaming.

"Anne," she cried, "why didn't you tell me?"

"Tell you—?" I muttered absently.

"That you were engaged," said Mary, looking hurt and reproachful. "O, I'm so glad and proud of you, Anne! And will you both promise faithfully to come to Canada when the next school year ends?"

Then, like a worm that turns, Mr. Spratt turned himself about in his chair.

"Speaking of the school year," he said, "are you aware, Miss Anne, that under law you forfeit your contributions to the teachers' pension fund?"

"Dear me, how dreadful!" I answered sarcastically. "It is such a serious matter."

"It is serious," answered Mr. Spratt, hugging himself, "not by reason of the amount involved, but because it strikes at a principle deeply rooted in the laws and customs of the Anglo-Saxon race—it penalizes marriage. Now in France they manage things differently. The admirable Code Napoleon, as you have doubtless read in the copy of my work which I presented to you—"

"Dear me, Mr. Spratt, will you be very offended if I mention that I didn't quite finish it?" I inquired.

"That admirable compilation, the Code Napoleon," he resumed, "distinctly lays down the principle that the betrothal of a minor annuls all pecuniary contracts that have not been actually put into execution. Consequently under the code your pension fund would be returnable."

"But I am not a minor," I interrupted.

"The age of majority, under the Code Napoleon, is not necessarily twenty-one, Miss Anne," said Mr. Spratt in grave rebuke. "For certain purposes, as this, it is twenty-five. In other cases—"

I saw the banker drop his title deeds and grasp at the seat of his chair. His face was drawn and tense. Next moment I amazed Mr. Spratt by springing to his side and clasping both his hands in mine.

"Say that again; I didn't catch it," I panted. "Under the Code Napoleon I am a minor for financial purposes and the—the betrothal—"

"The betrothal of a minor annuls all contracts of a pecuniary nature, that have not actually been carried into effect," reiterated Mr. Spratt. "Therefore—"

"My dearest Anne, what are you driving at?" asked Charles.

I walked over to Mr. Magniff.

"My bonds," I said, and flung down his receipt before him.

He rose up, tottering, and grasped the edge of the table.

"It has been carried into effect," he almost screamed. "You can have the money at once—before six o'clock. I don't mind renewing the mortgage—I was—meant to all along. I—I—I—"

"My bonds, please," I repeated quietly.

"I'll give you a hundred thousand for them, then," he cried. "You wouldn't rob me, bankrupt me, by a legal trick like that? You're people of honor. That's all very well for tricky tradesmen, but not for the d'Yves. You can't afford to play a trick like that on me."

"My bonds, Mr. Magniff," I reiterated implacably.

Charles came up and placed his arm round me. He understood.

"No, let him keep the bonds, Anne," he said. "He's right. We don't do things like that."

"Then," I said decisively, "you must keep Clichy. That is the price of them. Do you agree?" I continued turning to Magniff.

He groaned as though my words had been a thrust of a sword. I pushed some paper toward him and, dipping a quill into the ink, placed it in his hands.

"Write," I said, dictating. "For value received, namely bonds (I enumerated them), now in my possession, I hereby agree to relinquish to Anne Ives all rights that I possess to the castle and estate of Clichy, together with the mortgage upon the same, which I now hold, and all the accumulated interest.' Is that legal?" I asked, turning to the astounded Mr. Spratt.

"Irregular, but unassailable under the Code," answered the little man, rising heroically to the occasion.

"Now go, Mr. Magniff," I said, pointing to the door. "And, if you can profit by it, take with you that forgiveness which you yourself denied."

Mary and Mr. Spratt have promised to spend their honeymoon with Charles and me at Clichy next July. "And all that I regret," wrote Mary in her last letter, "is that you have had nearly a year's start of us in matrimony. But you haven't had any start of us in sheer and undiluted happiness."

"We'll take them riding in our new aeroplane," said Charles, when he had read Mary's letter. Then we went out to look at her in the new hangar. Charles says that when aviation becomes safer he'll let me ride again. But after my flight to Corsica I'm not sure that I shall ever want to.

Charles pointed to the name upon her frame, and smiled. "That will puzzle your friends," he said. "They don't know all that we know, do they, Anne?"

The name is "La Mascotte."

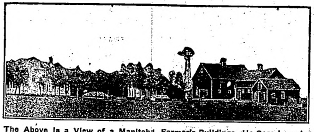
WESTERN CANADA'S GRAIN CROP FOR 1914

THE WHEAT CROP ALONE WILL BE WORTH UPWARDS OF ONE HUNDRED MILLION DOLLARS.

The yield of wheat in Western Canada for 1914 is now safely estimated at 135 million bushels. This is not as large as in 1913 but for various reasons will net the farmer considerably more money. Had it not been for drought that struck some portions of Southern Alberta and Southwestern Saskatchewan, shortly after seeding, there would have been a phenomenal crop and with present prices there would have been a year of unprecedented prosperity. In a large district of the country the crops are fully up to the average. The portions referred to had ample rainfall and blessed with conditions that put them into a more enviable condition than the districts first referred to. Fortunately in most places where lack of precipitation prevented harvesting a good crop this year, this is the first of a number of years that it has happened, and the farmers are in a position to withstand a partial failure. Throughout all of Manitoba, Central Saskatchewan and the largest portion of Alberta conditions are good. The raising of cattle, sheep and hogs is now playing an important part in the success of the Western Canada Farmer. From these, and the product of the dairy and the creaming, he is placing himself in an excellent financial position. It is expected that during 1915 the acreage sown to grains of all kinds will be largely in excess of all previous years. In the districts that had not the crop that others had, there is no disheartedness, but embracing the opportunity to get their land ready in good time, and pursuing more definite methods of conserving the moisture, the farmers are now busily engaged in preparing larger areas for wheat, oats, barley and flax, and in this way very much will be added to the large acreage placed in crop in 1913. There are none that take any comfort out of the war in Europe because it will mean increased prices for everything they can raise, but they propose taking advantage of the opportunity that is afforded. Western Canada is the recognized grain field of the world, and will be so for all time. Looking into the future, thousands of Americans are now contemplating joining the band of Western Canada grain growers and they are wise in doing so, for they can secure the best of land in good localities, convenient to market, at from $15 to $20 per acre if purchased from railway or land companies, or they can still get homesteads within reasonable distance of railways by making entry for them. The American settler is always welcome, and he will find in almost any district in which he cares to locate, scores of American settlers, who are doing well, and few, if any, ever prove a failure. There are special rates given to the settlers on the railways for both himself and his effects.

The natural resources of the country are so vast that they cannot be told in mere figures. Man can only tell of what tiny portions have done. He can only say "I am more prosperous than I ever expected to be." And yet if a farmer expects to succeed on land that he has been forced to pay $50 to $100 an acre for, he ought to feel assured of attaining prosperity when he finds the richest prairie soil at his disposal absolutely free. If he has a little capital, let him invest it all in live stock and farm implements—he will find himself ten years ahead of the game. Some day such a chance will not be found anywhere on the face of the globe. But now the same opportunities await you as awaited the pioneer and not one hundredth part of the difficulties he encountered and overcame. Success in Canada is made up of two things, natural resources and human labor. Canada has the one and you have the other.



The Above Is a View of a Manitoba Farmer's Buildings. He Goes Largely Into Mixed Farming.

You want a cozy home, a free life, and sufficient income. You want education for your children, and some pleasure for your wife. You want independence. Your burden has been heavy, and your farm hasn't paid. You work hard and are discouraged.

You require a change. There is a goal within sight, where your children will have advantages. You can get a home in Western Canada and freedom, where your ambitions can be fulfilled. If the Prairie Provinces are full of Successful Farmers, why should you prove the exception? Haven't you got brains, experience, courage? Then prove what these are capable of when put on trial. It is encouraging to know that there is one country in the world where poverty is no barrier to wealth!

Besides the grains spoken of, all kinds of grasses do well in Western Canada. At one of the fairs held a short time ago the writer saw no less than eighty varieties of wild grass. Of the cultivated grasses, Alfalfa gives a splendid yield, and although not yet generally grown, it will soon become universal. At a recent contest of fields sown not later than June, 1912, there were prizes awarded in all districts in Saskatchewan. The quality was excellent. In Alberta it will soon become the popular feed. In Manitoba the growing of alfalfa is quite successful, and many farmers are now preparing land for it.

"I'll dream again of fields of grain that stretch from sky to sky,
And the little prairie hamlets, where the cars go roaring by,
Wooden hamlets as I saw them—noble cities still to be
To girdle stately Canada with gems from sea to sea;
Mother of a mighty manhood, Land of glamour and of hope,
From the eastward sea-swept Islands
to the sunny Western slope."

It is the inspiration that led Sir Conan Doyle to pen the above that has led the many Americans that are now in Western Canada to make their home there.—Advertisement.

RETREAT OF GERMANS WAS STEADY UNTIL THEY MADE STAND ON AISNE

London.—An account of the operations of the British army in France and the French armies in immediate touch with it during the period from September 10 to 13, written by an officer attached to Field Marshal Sir John French's staff, has been issued by the official press bureau. The account follows:

Since Thursday, September 10, the British army, in co-operation with the French, made steady progress in its endeavor to drive back the enemy. The country across which it had to force its way and over which it will have to fight in the near future is undulating and covered with patches of thick wood.

"Within the area which faced the British before the advance commenced, right up to Laon, the chief feature of tactical importance is that there are six rivers running across the direction of the advance, at all of which it was possible the Germans might make a stand. These are, in order from the south, the Marne, Ourcq, Vesle, Aisne, Ailette and Oise.

Real Resistance at the Aisne.

"The enemy held the lines of the Marne, which was crossed by our forces on September 9, as a purely rear guard operation. Our passage of the Ourcq, which here runs almost due east and west, was not contested. The Vesle was only lightly held, while resistance along the Aisne, both against the French and British, has been and still is of a determined character.

"On Friday, September 11, little opposition was met along any part of our front and the direction of the advance was for the purpose of co-operating with our allies turned slightly to the northeast. The day was passed in rushing forward and gathering in various hostile detachments. By nightfall our forces had reached a line north of the Ourcq, extending from Oulchy-Le-Chateau to Longpont.

General Advance of French.

"On this day there was also a general advance of the French along their whole line which ended in a substantial success, in one portion of the field Duke Albrecht of Wurtemburg's army being driven back across the Saulx, and elsewhere the whole of the corps artillery of a German corps being captured. Several German colors also were taken.

"It was only on this day that the full extent of the victory gained by the allies on September 8 was appreciated by them and the moral effect of this success has been enormous.

"An order dated September 6 and 7 issued by the commander of the German Seventh corps was picked up. It stated that the great object of the war was about to be attained, since the French were going to accept battle, and that upon the result of this battle would depend the issue of the war and the honor of the German armies.

Germans Make Heroic Effort.

"It seems probable that the Germans not only expected to find that the British army was beyond the power of assuming the offensive for some time, but counted on the French having been driven back on to the line of the Seine, and that, though surprised to find the latter moving forward against them after they had crossed the Marne, they were in no wise deterred from making a great effort.

"On Saturday, September 12, the enemy were found to be occupying a formidable position opposite us on the north of the line at Soissons. They had both sides of the river and an entrenched line on the hills to the north of the eight road bridges and two railway bridges crossing the Aisne, within our section of the front. Seven of the former and both of the latter had been demolished.

Foes in Artillery Duel.

"Working from the west to the east, our Third army corps gained some high ground south of the Aisne, overlooking the Aisne valley, to the east of Soissons.

"Here a long range artillery duel between our guns and those of the French on our left and the enemy's artillery on the hills continued during the greater part of the day and did not cease until nearly midnight. The enemy had a large number of heavy howitzers in well concealed positions.

"The movement of this army corps was effected in co-operation with the French sixth army, on our left, which gained the southern half of the town during the night.

"The Second army corps did not cross the Aisne. The First army corps got over the river Vesle, to the south of the Aisne, after the crossing had been secured by the First cavalry division. It then reached a line south of Aisne practically without fighting.

Battle of Braisne.

"At Braisne the first cavalry division met with considerable opposition from infantry and machine guns holding the town and guarding the bridge. With the aid of some of our infantry, it gained possession of the town about midday, driving the enemy to the north. Some hundred prisoners were captured around Braisne, where the Germans has thrown a large amount of field gun ammunition into the river, where it was visible under two feet of water.

"On our right the French reached the line of the river Vesle. On this day began an action along the Aisne which is not yet finished, and which may be merely of a rear guard nature on a large scale, or may be the commencement of a battle of a more serious nature.

"It rained heavily on Saturday afternoon and all through the night, which severely handicapped transport.

"On Sunday, September 13, extremely strong resistance was encountered along the whole of our front, which was some fifteen miles in length. The action still consisted for the most part of long range gun fire, that of the Germans being to a great extent from their heavy howitzers, which were firing from cleverly concealed positions.

"By nightfall portions of all three corps were across the river, the cavalry returning to the south side. By this night, or early next morning, three pontoon bridges had been built and our troops also managed to get across the river by means of the bridge, carrying the canal over the river.

"On our left the French pressed on, but were prevented by artillery fire from building a pontoon bridge at Soissons. A large number of infantry, however, crossed in single file the top girder of the railway bridge left standing.

Germans Quick to Surrender.

"During the last three or four days many isolated parties of Germans have been discovered hiding in numerous woods a long way behind our line. As a rule they seemed glad to surrender, and the condition of some of them may be gathered from the following incident:

"An officer proceeding along the road in charge of a number of led horses received information that there were some of the enemy in the neighborhood. He gave the order to charge, whereupon three German officers and 106 men surrendered.

"At Senlis immediately on his arrival a proclamation was issued by the commander of a division. The main points were that all arms were to be handed in at the town hall at once; that all civilians found with arms would be shot at once; no person was to be in the street after dark; no lights were to be maintained in the houses or the streets; the doors of all houses were to be left open and the inhabitants were not to collect in groups. Any obstruction of the German troops or the threatening of them immediately would be punishable by death.

"At Villers Cotterets, the mayor appears to have behaved judiciously and though supplies far in excess of the capabilities of the place were demanded, the town was not seriously damaged.

"The Germans evacuated the place on September 11 in such haste that they left behind a large amount of the bread requisitioned.

"It was stated by the inhabitants that the enemy had destroyed and abandoned 15 motor lorries, seven guns and ammunition wagons.

"Reims was occupied by the enemy on September 3. It was occupied by the French after considerable fighting on September 13."

CORRESPONDENT TELLS OF THE BURNING OF TERMONDE

By T. M. KETTLE.
International News Service.

Termonde.—Here is the story of the wrecking of Termonde, told by a dozen different inhabitants and confirmed from dozens of other reliable sources.

Following the German entry into the city the commander demanded a levy of 2,000,000 francs. The money was not in the public treasury, and the burgomaster was not there to save his town as Braun saved Ghent.

General Sommerfeld had a chair brought from the inn into the center of the grand palace. He sat down on it, crossed his legs and said:

"It is our duty to burn this town."

The inhabitants were allowed two hours to clear out and then the soldiers went to work.

Use Portable Caissons.

Their apparatus consisted of a small portable pressure caisson filled with benzine and fitted with a spray. Other witnesses said that there also were great caissons on wheels. With this they sprinkled the floors and ground stories of the houses and set fire to the buildings. Others used a sort of phosphorus paste with which they smeared the object to be destroyed. They completed their work by flinging hand grenades and prepared fuses into the infant flames.

Remembering Louvain, General Sommerfeld had evidently given directions that the public and monumental buildings were to be spared. Thus the museum and the city hall both remain standing, but right between them his petroleurs destroyed a hotel.

Pillaged Everything.

General Sommerfeld's soldiers stole, pillaged and drank everything on which they could lay their hands. Witnesses on this point are many and unshakable. Their moderation must impress anybody who talks to them.

A citizen of Termonde, who himself had been held as hostage, said to me while standing amid the ruins of his town:

"Monsieur, there is human nature among the Germans. I saw many officers in tears. A German lieutenant came and shook me by the hand, crying, 'It is not our fault.'"

Invents a New Chicken.

George White has produced by selective breeding, the shortest legged chicken in existence after ten years of effort, during which he crossed and recrossed breeds. The result is a big white fowl that continually seems to be sitting, the impression being due solely to the shortness of its legs. When it walks it waddles like a duck.

The advantage, says White, is that the newly "invented" type of chicken is not a roamer and not a scratcher. It canont go very far and has not enough of a reach to scratch. The result is that it lives a quiet, peaceful existence, never roosts on a neighbor's fence, and is a busy layer.—Eaton (O.) dispatch to the New York World.

Content to Remain in Scotland.

An extremely self-important middle-class Londoner, visiting Scotland for the first time in his life, volunteered to a kindly but sharp old Highlander that no Englishman could ever find Scotland anything but a place to leave—and that rapidly.

"I'm nae so sure o' that," returned the old man, dryly. "I'll tak' ye to a place no' far frea Stirling, whaur thetty thousand o' yer countrymen ha' been content for five hundred year, and they're nae thocht o' leavin' yet!"

"What is the place?" bellowed the Londoner.

"Bannockburn!" snapped the Scot, waving his hand in the direction of the battlefield.

Brought Home to Him.

Gen. W. L. Alexander was discussing, at a dinner, the European war.

"This war," he said, "will affect even us. We must economize to weather it. And our economy must be general, too.

"We musn't be like Gayboy, whom a friend asked over a bottle of champagne on a roof garden:

"'Well, apropos of the war, old man, did you give your wife that lecture on economy?'

"'Yes, I did,' Gayboy answered, 'and she went right out and bought me a safety razor.'"

ECZEMA ON CHILD'S BODY

570 High St., Oshkosh, Wis.—"When about two months old my nephew had sores break out on different parts of his body. The trouble first began as a rash which itched so at night some-one always held his hands, even while sleeping, as at the least scratching it would run together and form scabs. His night-clothes had to have mittens on them or the scabs would be raw and bleeding by morning. His clothing or the least friction irritated the trouble. His face and scalp were covered. They called it eczema.

"We tried different treatments but none cured him. At three years old we commenced the use of Cuticura Soap and Ointment. It took nearly a year to effect a complete cure and he never had anything like it since." (Signed) Mrs. F. Scofield, Mar. 21, 1914.

HIS MOTHER'S SON

By EDNA FERBER

Author of "Dawn O'Hara," "Battered Side Down," etc.

Copyright by Frederick A. Stokes Company

"Full?" repeated Emma McChesney (and if it weren't for the compositor there'd be an exclamation point after that question mark).

"Sorry, Mrs. McChesney," said the clerk, and he actually looked it, "but there's absolutely nothing stirring. We're full up. The Benevolent Brotherhood of Bisons is holding its regular annual state convention here. We're putting up cots in the hall."

Emma McChesney's keen blue eyes glanced up from their inspection of the little bunch of mail which had just been handed her. "Well, pick out a hall with a southern exposure and set up a cot or so for me," she said, agreeably, "because I've come to stay. After selling Featherloom petticoats on the road for ten years I don't see myself trailing up and down this town looking for a place to lay my head. I've learned this one large, immovable truth, and that is, that a hotel clerk is a hotel clerk. It makes no difference whether he is stuck back of a marble pillar and hidden by a gold vase full of thirty-six-inch American beauty roses at the Knickerbocker, or setting the late fall fashions for men in Galesburg, Ill."

By one small degree was the perfect poise of the peerless personage behind the register jarred. But by only one. He was a hotel night clerk.

"It won't do any good to get sore, Mrs. McChesney," he began, suavely. "Now a man would—"

"But I'm not a man," interrupted Emma McChesney. "I'm only doing a man's work and earning a man's salary and demanding to be treated with as much consideration as you'd show a man."

The personage busied himself mightily with a pen, and a blotter, and sundry papers, as is the manner of personages when annoyed. "I'd like to accommodate you; I'd like to do it."

"Cheer up," said Emma McChesney, "you're going to. I don't mind a little discomfort. Though I want to mention in passing that if there are any lady Bisons present you needn't bank on doubling me up with them. I've had one experience of that kind. It was in Albia, Iowa. I'd sleep in the kitchen range before I'd go through another."

Up went the erstwhile falling poise. "You're badly mistaken, madam. I'm a member of this order myself, and a finer lot of fellows it has never been my pleasure to know."

"Yes, I know," drawled Emma McChesney. "Do you know, the thing that gets me is the inconsistency of it. Along come a lot of boobs who never use a hotel the year around except to loaf in the lobby, and wear out the leather chairs, and use up the matches and toothpicks and get the baseball returns, and immediately you turn away a traveling man who uses a three-dollar-a-day room, with a sample room downstairs for his stuff, who tips every porter and bell-boy in the place, asks for no favors, and who, if you give him a half-way decent cup of coffee for breakfast, will fall in love with the place and boom it all over the country. Half of your Benevolent Bisons are here on the European plan, with a view to patronizing the free-lunch counters or being asked to take dinner at the home of some local Bison whose wife has been cooking up on pies, and chicken salad and veal roast for the last week."

Emma McChesney leaned over a desk a little, and lowered her voice to the tone of confidence. "Now, I'm not in the habit of making a nuisance of myself like this. I don't get so chatty as a rule, and I know that I could jump over to Monmouth and get first-class accommodations there. But just this once I've a good reason for wanting to make you and myself a little miserable. Y'see, my son is traveling with me this trip."

"Son!" echoed the clerk staring.

"Thanks. That's what they all do. After a while I'll begin to believe that there must be something hauntingly beautiful and girlish about me or every one wouldn't petrify when I announce that I've a six-foot son attached to my apron strings. He looks twenty-one, but he's seventeen. He thinks the world's rotten because he can't grow one of those fuzzy little mustaches that the men are cultivating to match their hats. He's down at the depot now, straightening out our baggage. Now I want to say this before he gets here. He's been out with me just four days. Those four days have been a revelation, an eye-opener, and a series of rude jolts. He used to think that his mother's job consisted of traveling in Pullmans, eating delicate viands turned out by the hotel chefs, and strewing Featherloom petticoats along the path. I gave him plenty of money, and he got into the habit of looking lightly upon anything more trifling than a five-dollar bill. He's changing his mind by great leaps. I'm prepared to spend the night in the coal cellar if you'll just fix him up—not too comfortably. It'll be a great lesson for him. There he is now. Just coming in. Fuzzy coat and hat and English stick. Hist! As they say on the stage."

The boy crossed the crowded lobby. There was a little worried, annoyed frown between his eyes. He laid a protecting hand on his mother's arm. Emma McChesney was conscious of a little thrill of pride as she realized that he did not have to look up to meet her gaze.

"Look here, mother, they tell me there's some sort of a convention here, and the town's packed. That's what all those banners and things were for. I hope they've got something decent for us here. I came up with a man who said he didn't think there was a hole left to sleep in."

"You don't say!" exclaimed Emma McChesney, and turned to the clerk. "This is my son, Jock McChesney—Mr. Sims. Is this true?"

"Glad to know you, sir," said Mr. Sims. "Why, yes, I'm afraid we are pretty well filled up, but seeing it's you maybe we can do something for you."

He ruminated, tapping his teeth with a penholder, and eying the pair before him with a maddening blankness of gaze. Finally:

"I'll do my best, but you can't expect much. I guess I can squeeze another cot into eighty-seven for the young man. There's—let's see now—who's in eighty-seven? Well, there's two Bisons in the double bed, and one in the single, and Fat Ed Meyers in the cot and—"

Emma McChesney stiffened into acute attention. "Meyers?" she interrupted. "Do you mean Ed Meyers of the Strauss Sans-silk Skirt company?"

"That's so. You two are in the same line, aren't you? He's a great little piano player, Ed is. Ever hear him play?"

"When did he get in?"

"Oh, he just came in fifteen minutes ago on the Ashland division. He's in at supper."

"Oh," said Emma McChesney. The two letters breathed relief.

But relief had no place in the voice, or on the countenance of Jock McChesney. He bristled with belligerence. "This cattle-car style of sleeping don't make a hit. I haven't had a decent night's rest for three nights. I never could sleep on a sleeper. Can't you fix us up better than that?"

"Best I can do."

"But where's mother going? I see you advertise 'three large and commodious steam-heated sample rooms in connection.' I suppose mother's due to sleep on one of the tables there."

"Jock," Emma McChesney reproved him, "Mr. Sims is doing us a great favor. There isn't another hotel in town that would—"

"You're right, there isn't," agreed Mr. Sims. "I guess the young man is new to this traveling game. As I said, I'd like to accommodate you, but — Let's see now. Tell you what I'll do. If I can get the housekeeper to go over and sleep in the maid's quarters just for tonight, you can use her room. There you are! Of course, it's over the kitchen, and there may be some little noise early in the morning—"

Emma McChesney raised a protesting hand. "Don't mention it. Just lead me thither. I'm so tired I could sleep in an excursion special that was switching at Pittsburgh. Jock, me child, we're in luck. That's twice in the same place. The first time was when we were inspired to eat our supper on the diner instead of waiting until we reached here to take the leftovers from the Bisons' grazing. I hope that housekeeper hasn't a picture of her departed husband dangling, life-size, on the wall at the foot of the bed. But they always have. Good-night, son. Don't let the Bisons bite you. I'll be up at seven."

But it was just 6:30 a. m. when Emma McChesney turned the little bend in the stairway that led to the office. The scrub-woman was still in possession. The cigar-counter girl had not yet made her appearance. There was about the place a general air of the night before. All but the night clerk. He was as spruce and trim, and alert and smooth-shaven as only a night clerk can be after a night's vigil.

"'Morning!" Emma McChesney called to him. She wore blue serge, and a smart fall hat. The late autumn morning was not crisper and sunnier than she.

"Good-morning, Mrs. McChesney," returned Mr. Sims, sonorously. "Have a good night's sleep? I hope the kitchen noise didn't wake you."

Emma McChesney paused with her hand on the door. "Kitchen? Oh, no. I could sleep through a vaudeville china-juggling act. But—what an extraordinarily unpleasant-looking man that housekeeper's husband must have been."

That November morning boasted all those qualities which November-morning writers are so prone to bestow upon the month. But the words wine, and sparkle, and sting, and glow, and snap do not seem to cover it. Emma McChesney stood on the bottom step, looking up and down Main street and breathing in great draughts of that unadjectivable air. Her complexion stood the test of the merciless, astringent morning and came up triumphantly and healthily firm and pink and smooth. The town was still asleep. She started to walk briskly down the bare and ugly Main street of the little town. In her big, generous heart, and her keen, alert mind, there were many sensations and myriad thoughts, but varied and diverse as they were they all led back to the boy up there in the stuffy, over-crowded hotel room—the boy who was learning his lesson.

Half an hour later she reentered the hotel, her cheeks glowing. Jock was not yet down. So she ordered and ate her wise and cautious breakfast of fruit and cereal and toast and coffee, skimming over her morning paper as she ate. At 7:30 she was back in the lobby, newspaper in hand. The Bisons were already astir. She seated herself in a deep chair in a quiet corner, her eyes glancing up over the top of her paper toward the stairway. At eight o'clock Jock McChesney came down.

There was nothing of jauntiness about him. His eyelids were red. His face had the doughy look of one whose sleep has been brief and feverish. As he came toward his mother you noticed a stain on his coat, and a sunburst of wrinkles across one leg of his modish brown trousers.

"Good-morning, son!" said Emma McChesney. "Was it as bad as that?"

Jock McChesney's long fingers curled into a fist.

"Say," he began, his tone venomous, "do you know what those—those—those—"

"Say it!" commanded Emma McChesney. "I'm only your mother. If you keep that in your system your breakfast will curdle in your stomach."

Jock McChesney said it. I know no phrase better fitted to describe his tone than that old favorite of the erotic novelties. It was vibrant with passion. It breathed bitterness. It sizzled with savagery. It—Oh, alliteration is useless.

"Well," said Emma McChesney, encouragingly, "go on."

"Well!" gulped Jock McChesney, and glared; "those two double-bedded, bloomin', blasted Bisons came in at twelve, and the single one about fifteen minutes later. They didn't surprise me. There was a herd of about ninety-three of 'em in the hall, all saying good-night to each other, and planning where they'd meet in the morning, and the time, and place and probable weather conditions. For that matter, there were droves of 'em pounding up and down the halls all night. I never saw such restless cattle. If you'll tell me what makes more noise in the middle of the night than the metal disk of a hotel key banging and clanging up against a door, I'd like to know what it is. My three Bisons were all dolled up with fool ribbons and badges and striped paper canes. When they switched on the light I gave a crack imitation of a tired working man trying to get a little sleep. I breathed regularly and heavily, with an occasional moaning snore. But if those two hippopotamus Bisons had been alone on their native plains they couldn't have cared less. They bellowed, and pawed the earth, and threw their shoes around, and yawned, and stretched and discussed their plans for the next day, and reviewed all their doings of that day. Then one of them said something about turning in, and I was so happy I forgot to snore. Just then another key clanged at the door, in walked a fat man in a brown derby, and the stuff was off."

"That," said Emma McChesney, "would be Ed Meyers of the Strauss Sans-silk Skirt company."

"None other than our hero." Jock's tone had an added acidity. "It took those four about two minutes to get acquainted. In three minutes they had told their real names, and it turned out that Meyers belonged to an organization that was a second cousin of the Bisons. In five minutes they had got together a deck and a pile of chips and were shirt-sleeving it around a game of pinochle. I would doze off to the slap of cards and the click of chips, and wake up when the bell-boy came in with another round, which he did every six minutes. When I got up this morning I found that Fat Ed Meyers had been sitting on the chair over which I trustingly had draped my trousers. This sunburst of wrinkles is where he mostly sat. This spot on my coat is where a Bison drank his beer."

Emma McChesney folded her paper and rose, smiling. "It is sort of trying, I suppose, if you're not used to it."

"Used to it!" shouted the outraged Jock. "Used to it! Do you mean to tell me there's nothing unusual about—"

"Not a thing. Oh, of course you don't strike a bunch of Bisons every day. But it happens a good many times. The world is full of ancient orders and they're everlastingly getting together and drawing up resolutions and electing officers. Don't you think you'd better go in to breakfast before the Bisons begin to forage? I've had mine."

The gloom which had overspread Jock McChesney's face lifted a little. The hungry boy in him was uppermost. "That's so. I'm going to have some wheat cakes, and steak, and eggs, and coffee, and fruit, and toast, and rolls."

"Why sigh. the fish?" inquired his mother. Then, as he turned toward the dining room, "I've two letters to get out. Then I'm going down the street to see a customer. I'll be up at the Sulzberg-Stein department store at nine sharp. There's no use trying to see old Sulzberg before ten, but I'll be there, anyway, and so will Ed Meyers, or I'm no skirt salesman. I want you to meet me there. It will do you good to watch how the overripe orders just drop, ker-plunk, into my lap."

Maybe you know Sulzberg & Stein's big store? No? That's because you've always lived in the city. Old Sulzberg sends his buyers to the New York market twice a year, and they need two floor managers on the main floor now. The money those people spend for red and green decorations at Christmas time, and apple-blossoms and pink crepe paper shades in the spring must be something awful. Young Stein goes to Chicago to have his clothes made, and old Sulzberg likes to keep the traveling men waiting in the little ante-room outside his private office.

Jock McChesney finished his huge breakfast, strolled over to Sulzberg & Stein's, and inquired his way to the office, only to find that his mother was not yet there. There were three men in the little waiting-room. One of them was Fat Ed Meyers. His huge bulk overflowed the spindle-legged chair on which he sat. His brown derby was in his hands. His eyes were on the closed door at the other side of the room. So were the eyes of the other two travelers. Jock took a vacant seat next to Fat Ed Meyers so that he might, in his mind's eye, pick out a particularly choice spot upon which his hard young fist might land—if only he had the chance. Breaking up a man's sleep like that, the great big overgrown mutt!

"What's your line?" said Ed Meyers, suddenly turning toward Jock.

Prompted by some imp—"Skirts," answered Jock. "Ladies' petticoats." ("As if men ever wore 'em!" he giggled inwardly.)

Ed Meyers shifted around in his chair so that he might better stare at this new foe in the field. His little red mouth was open ludicrously.

"Who're you out for?" he demanded next.

There was a look of Emma McChesney on Jock's face. "Why—er—the Union Underskirt and Hosiery company of Chicago. New concern."

"Must be," ruminated Ed Meyers. "I never heard of 'em, and I know 'em all. You're starting in young, ain't you, kid? Well, it'll never hurt you. You'll learn something new every day. Now me, I—"

In breezed Emma McChesney. Her quick glance rested immediately upon Meyers and the boy. And in that moment some instinct prompted Jock McChesney to shake his head, ever so slightly, and assume a blankness of expression. And Emma McChesney, with that shrewdness which had made her one of the best salesmen on the road, saw, and miraculously understood.

"How do, Mrs. McChesney," grinned Fat Ed Meyers. "You see I beat you to it."

"So I see," smiled Emma, cheerfully. "I was delayed. Just sold a nice little bill to Watkins down the street." She seated herself across the way, and kept her eyes on that closed door.

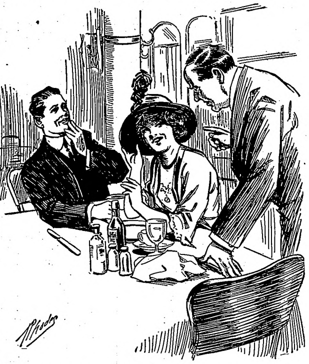
"Say, kid," Meyers began, in the husky whisper of the fat man, "I'm going to put you wise to something, seeing you're new to this game. See that lady over there?" He nodded discreetly in Emma McCresney's direction.

"Pretty, isn't she?" said Jock, appreciatively.

"Know who she is?"

"Well—I—she does look familiar but—"

"Oh, come now, quit your bluffing. If you'd ever met that dame you'd remember it. Her name's McChesney—Emma McChesney, and she sells T. A. Buck's Featherloom Petticoats. I'll give her her dues; she's the best little salesman on the road. I'll bet that girl could sell a ruffled, accordion-plaited underskirt to a fat woman who was trying to reduce. She's got the darndest way with her. And at that she's straight, too."



"His name," smiled Emma McChesney, "is Jock McChesney."

If Ed Meyers had not been gazing so intently into his hat, trying at the same time to look cherubically benign he might have seen a quick and painful scarlet sweep the face of the boy, coupled with a certain tense look of the muscles around the jaw.

"Well, now, look here," he went on, still in a whisper. "We're both skirt men, you and me. Everything's fair in this game. Maybe you don't know it, but when there's a bunch of the boys waiting around to see the head of the store like this, and there happens to be a lady traveler in the crowd, why, it's considered kind of a professional courtesy to let the lady have the first look-in. See? It ain't so often that three people in the same line get together like this. She knows it, and she's sitting on the edge of her chair, waiting to bolt when that door opens, even if she does act like she was hanging on the words of that lady clerk there. The minute it does open a crack she'll jump up and give me a fleeting, grateful smile, and sail in and cop a fat order away from the old man and his skirt buyer. I'm wise. Say, he may be an oyster, but he knows a pretty woman when he sees one. By the time she's through with him he'll have enough petticoats on hand to last him from now until Turkey goes suffrage. Get me?"

"I get you," answered Jock.

"I say, this is business, and good manners be hanged. When a woman breaks into a man's game like this, let her take her chances like a man. Ain't that straight?"

"You've said something," agreed Jock.

"Now, look here, kid. When that door opens I get up. See? And shoot straight for the old man's office. See? Like a duck. See? Say, I may be fat, kid, but I'm what they call light on my feet, and when I see an order getting away from me I can be so fleet that I have Diana looking like old Weston doing a stretch of muddy country road in a coast to coast hike. See? Now you help me out on this and I'll see that you don't suffer for it. I'll stick in a good word for you, believe me. You take the word of an old stager like me and you won't go far—"

The door opened. Simultaneously three figures sprang into action. Jock had the seat nearest the door. With marvelous clumsiness he managed to place himself in Ed Meyers' path, then reddened, began an apology, stepped on both of Ed's feet, jabbed his elbow into his stomach and dropped his hat. A second later the door of old Sulzberg's private office closed upon Emma McChesney's smart, erect, confident figure.

Now, Ed Meyers' hands were peculiar hands for a fat man. They were tapering, slender, delicate, blue-veined, temperamental hands. At this moment, despite his purpling face, and his staring eyes, they were the most noticeable thing about him. His fingers clawed the empty air, quivering, vibrant, as though poised to clutch at Jock's throat.

Then words came. They spluttered from his lips. They popped like corn kernels in the heat of his wrath; they tripped over each other; they exploded.

"You darned kid, you!" he began, with fascinating fluency. "You thousand-legged, double-joined, ox-footed truck horse. Come on out of here and I'll lick the shine off your shoes, you blue-eyed babe, you! What did you get up for, huh? What did you think this was going to be—a flag drill?"

With a whoop of pure joy Jock McChesney turned and fled.

They dined together at one o'clock, Emma McChesney and her son Jock. Suddenly Jock stopped eating. His eyes were on the door.

"There's that fathead now," he said, excitedly. "The nerve of him! He's coming over here."

Ed Meyers was waddling toward them with the quick light step of the fat man. His pink, full-jowled face was glowing. His eyes were bright as a boy's. He stopped at their stable and paused for one dramatic moment.

"So, me beauty, you two were in cahoots, huh? That's the second low-down deal you've handed me. I haven't forgotten that trick you turned with Nussbaum at DeKalb. Never mind, little girl. I'll get back at you yet."

He nodded a contemptuous head in Jock's direction. "Carrying a packer?"

Emma McChesney wiped her fingers daintily on her napkin, crushed it on the table, and leaned back in her chair. "Men," she observed, won'eringly, "are the cussedest creatures. This chap occupied the same room with you last night and you don't even know his name. Funny! If two strange women had found themselves occupying the same room for a night they wouldn't have got to the kimono and back hair stage before they would not only have known each other's name, but they'd have tried on each other's hats, swapped corset cover patterns, found mutual friends living in Dayton, O., taught each other a new Irish crochet stitch, showed their family photographs, told how their married sister's little girl nearly died with swollen glands, and divided off the mirror into two sections to paste their newly washed handkerchiefs on. Don't tell me men have a genius for friendship."

"Well, who is he?" insisted Ed Meyers. "He told me everything but his name this morning. I wish I had throttled him with a bunch of Bisons' badges last night."

"His name," smiled Emma McChesney, "is Jock McChesney. He's my one and only son, and he's put through his first little business deal this morning just to show his mother that he can be a help to his folks if he wants to. Now, Ed Meyers, if you're going to have apoplexy don't you go and have it around this table. My boy is only on his second piece of pie, and I won't have his appetite spoiled."

Driven to It.

"Do you want work?" "Yep," replied Plodding Pete. "If you'll gimme somethin' light an' easy, I'll engage. I believe I kin get more rest as a regular hand than to go on bein' waylaid an' pestered by people that's tryin' to hire me."

Her Advantage.

"A ship has one paradoxical advantage in a storm."

"What's that?"

"No matter how she may lose her grip she generally manages to keep her hold."

Almost Synonymous.

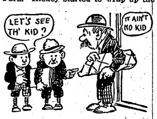
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Chicago Judge's Dead Pig Is His Bailiff's Jinx

CHICAGO.—Judge Adelor J. Petit of the circuit court directed his deputy bailiff, John Hickey, to take a dressed pig to the judge's home in Rogers Park. Hickey started to wrap up the pig. "Don't you know it's against the law to take a pig on the 'L'?" said one of Hickey's associates. "A friend of mine was arrested last winter by health officers because it is against the law to take dead animals among passengers in public conveyances."



"If they don't see the pig they won't know it," said Hickey.

Before he could leave the county building other deputies told newsboys Hickey was going to carry out the body of a dead baby that had been used as an exhibit in a murder trial.

Several hundred "murder fans" were gathered in front of the building when Hickey emerged with the package under his arm.

"Let's see the kid," said a dirty-faced urchin, tugging at the bailiff's arm.

"It's no kid, I've got. 'Tis a pig, it is," said Hickey, elbowing his way through the crowd. Hickey boarded a train for Rogers Park.

A fellow deputy called up the Rogers Park police station.

"This is Simpson, the commission merchant," he said. "I just fired one of my employes and when he left he stole a dressed pig weighing 49 pounds. He just got on an elevated train. Arrest him for us."

Heavy hands fell on Hickey's shoulders as he stepped to the platform at Birchwood avenue. Two detectives grabbed him. Hickey denied that he was a pig thief.

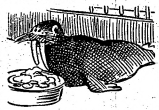
"What's this?" said one of the detectives, tearing the paper around the package under Hickey's arm. "Ah! ha! 'tis a pig. You will lie to us, will you? C'm'long."

"I got a court order to deliver this pig to Judge Petit's house," said Hickey, "and I don't care whether you are detectives or not. I am going to do it."

Explanations followed at the judge's residence and Hickey was released.

Zoological Park Walrus a Victim of Gluttony

NEW YORK.—Ephraim, the huge walrus of the New York Zoological park, afflicted with a multitude of hookworms, died of sheer laziness, superinduced by the most voracious appetite ever possessed by any animal.

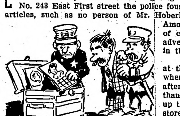


He was caught near Etah, Greenland, by Paul Rainey, and was presented to the park four years ago. At that time he weighed 140 pounds, but he began eating his way to an early death on the day he arrived. Eating was a continuous performance with Ephraim, both awake and asleep, until he became so fat that it pained him to move.

He weighed 500 pounds on the day of his death. In the last four months his weight increased at the rate of half a pound a day. He was possibly the most expensive animal on exhibition at the park. He ate 40 pounds of clam meat and other items of expense were the labor of preparing the feed, the frequent cleaning of his tank and adding sea salt to the water, so that the cost of keeping Ephraim was equal to that of two large elephants.

Illiterate Man Dateless With Many Calendars

LOS ANGELES, CAL.—In investigating the room of Franz Hoberlik at No. 243 East First street the police found a trunk filled with contraband articles, such as no person of Mr. Hoberlik's station in life should have.



Among the articles was a great pile of calendars, art calendars, with no advertising on them, such as are sold in the stores.

The police took up their station at the entrance to the building, and when Hoberlik returned to his room, after the sentries had waited for more than five hours, they followed the man up the stairs. He added more to his store, just as the police looked through the door.

His actions were sufficiently suspicious to warrant arrest, and the man was ordered to open the door. He did so, but locked the trunk, and threw the key into a crevice in the wall. It took more than an hour to retrieve the key. Hoberlik said later that he could have done it much faster, had he wanted to, for he had a long hook with a wire handle, to turn the trick.

Much of the goods was packed up in packages available for carrying, and the two detectives and the suspect, each with full arms, came to the police station. Hoberlik was carrying 100 calendars.

The detective was writing. "What day is this?" he asked Hoberlik.

"Don't know," said Hoberlik.

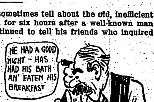
"Sweet Essence of Ignorance," shouted the detective. "You have 100 calendars there; look it up."

"Can't read," said Hoberlik.

And he couldn't. He thought it was still August.

Getting Cheering Information From a Hospital

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Medical men sometimes tell about the old, inefficient times in hospital management when, for six hours after a well-known man had died, a hospital telephone girl continued to tell his friends who inquired about him that he was "resting as well as a man in his situation could be expected to rest." Of course, such a thing could not happen nowadays, but—



HE HAD A GOOD NIGHT - HAS HAD HIS BATH AN' EATEN HIS BREAKFAST

Willie was in an Indianapolis hospital recently. The first morning after a slight operation his daddy telephoned to ask about him. "He had a good night, has had his bath and has eaten his breakfast," said the girl at the other end of the line. It was indeed reassuring. That afternoon the boy's mother called on him and he was, indeed, all right. The next morning the answer at the hospital was just the same. It was suspicious. When the same words, precisely, were used the third morning and the fourth, the father began to be disappointed with the answer, so he did a mighty mean thing the next morning, after the boy had been taken home the evening before. He called the hospital and asked about the boy. The answer, in clear, sweet tones, was: "He had a good night, has had his bath and has eaten his breakfast."

"That's just what you always say," insisted daddy. "Have you really had information about him this morning?"

"Why, certainly!" came the clear, sweet voice.

He didn't tell the girl any better—what was the use?

KAISER'S IMPERIAL CHANCELLOR

The fifth to hold the office since Bismarck became the first chancellor of the German empire in 1871, Dr. von Bethmann Hollweg, the present imperial chancellor, is a big, raw-boned man who looks like a backwoodsman, built by nature for the rough, uncivilized life of the frontier, its poverty and privations. He is in reality the product of many generations of wealth and culture, a philosopher whose highest delight is in the abstruse, scholarly problems of metaphysics, and who has become a statesman by imperial command.

Of Jewish origin some generations ago, when a daughter of the famous Jewish banker of Frankfort, Bethmann, married a son of the Prussian noble family of Hollweg, the chancellor looks as if he might trace his origin in direct line back to the Zealots, that small band of indomitable Jews who carried on a desperate struggle with the Romans to preserve Jerusalem from falling into profane hands and who submitted to annihilation but not defeat. Under certain influences of environment and inheritance Bethmann-Hollweg would have become a Socialist. Under certain others, those which he has had, he is a bureaucrat.

The son of the Jewish banker's daughter and the Prussian noble's son was Bethmann Hollweg's grandfather. Through his mother he had enough wealth and through his father enough ancestry to become an intimate of royalty when he went to college at Bonn.

ENGLAND'S FOREIGN SECRETARY

Sir Edward Grey, Bart., Knight of the Garter, Liberal secretary of state for foreign affairs since December, 1905, has been recently Great Britain's most outstanding figure. He is the closest confidant of King George V among all his present ministers and is marked out as England's next Liberal prime minister. He was the first statesman within more than a century without the rank of a noble to have received the highest decoration the king of England has to bestow, when King George conferred upon him the noble Order of the Garter. Indeed, in the many hundreds of years that have elapsed since the order was created, there has been only one other occasion when a member of the house of commons has been so honored, when Sir Robert Walpole, prime minister, received it.

Sir Edward Grey inherited his title of baronet from his grandfather, Sir George Grey, who was one of the chief statesmen whose wisdom brought about the passing of the reform act of 1832, by which the people of England for the first time tasted freedom and who afterward became prime minister. The Greys of Northumberland are one of the noblest as they are one of the oldest families in England, and the present Earl Grey, who won such popularity throughout all North America during his term as governor-general of Canada, is his cousin. The Greys were a great house at the time of the wars of the roses.

NEW POPE A PATRICIAN

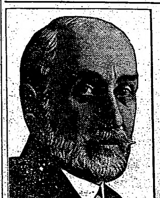
Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

A patrician has succeeded a plebian on the throne of the Fisherman. A son of a Marchese (Marquise), whose brothers are an admiral and a captain in the Italian navy follows as pontiff of 300,000,000 Catholics the son of a village postman whose devout sisters are the humblest of peasants.

"Will my frail shoulders be able to bear this burden?" cried Giacomo Cardinal della Chiesa, archbishop of Bologna, when his election as vicar of Jesus Christ on earth was announced. His hearers knew he referred to the Armageddon, for he realized full well he had been chosen to meet one of the greatest crises in the world's history.

And so is elevated to the highest spiritual seat a man almost unknown outside of Italy, one whose sixty years make him a young man in the papacy. The whole world, Catholic and noncatholic alike, is curious over the personality of this figure whom the astute members of the sacred college hope will lead mankind back to the walks of peace. There is found nothing in the comparison of the persons of Pius X and Benedict XV which suggest the higher birth of the latter. In the new pope one sees a man five feet eleven inches high and well built. He is a trifle bent, as if from study, and wears heavy spectacles. He is not a handsome man.

RUSSIA'S FOREIGN MINISTER



Serge Sazonoff, the minister for foreign affairs, has been four years in his present office. The United States remembers that it was to him as the representative of the czar that the American ambassador to Russia, Curtis Guild, delivered the formal declaration from President Taft December 18, 1911, that the treaty of 1832 between the United States and Russia would be abrogated by the United States on January 1, 1913, as a protest against the passport regulations in Russia against American Jews. Sazonoff is believed to be friendly to a settlement of the question according to the desires of Washington, but his influence is not sufficiently strong with the Russian bureaucracy to accomplish it.

He is a brother-in-law of Russia's former prime minister, Stolypin, a despotic servant of the imperial despot, who came to his end by assassination. Sazonoff is not a man of the Stolypin type, but he is of the same caste and his political creed is in reality the same.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

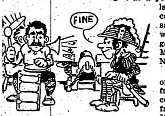
WASHINGTON.—A recent writer, in discoursing about the Marine band, says that it came into being 116 years ago, when President John Adams approved an act establishing it as a permanent organization. The original law provided for a fife and drum corps, consisting of 16 drummers and same number of fifers, one of whom was to act as fife-major. This aggregation of musicians constituted the Marine band until the arrival of the Neapolitans, some three years later.



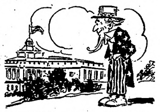
An old tradition has it that the original Marine band was kidnaped from Sicily. According to this account one Captain McNeil of the frigate Boston was cruising in the Mediterranean when an irresistible longing for some real music came over him. While ashore he was delighted and pleased with the performance of a Sicilian regimental band and at once conceived a plan for insuring plenty of music during the remainder of the voyage. He at once blandly invited the musicians on board his vessel for the ostensible purpose of playing for a ball. Probably induced by the prospect of receiving a liberal compensation, the members of the band accepted the invitation with alacrity.

Soon after the musicians with their instruments had gone on board Captain McNeil suddenly found it necessary to hoist anchor and get under way for the United States. The Sicilians protested, but in vain; the music-loving captain carried them bodily off and was entertained by their playing all the way.

No authentic record showing what finally became of these Italian musicians is now in existence, as many of the Marine corps archives were destroyed in 1814. It is shown, however, in official records that shortly after the organization of the Marine corps Lieutenant Colonel Henderson brought from Naples a group of 13 Italian musicians, whose addition to the organization made of it an instrumental band.

One of the Greatest Libraries of the World

ALREADY one of the greatest of the libraries of the world and the largest and most important in the western hemisphere, it is apparent that the library of congress is to become national in the broadest and most inclusive sense. It is that already, but not to the degree that will be true of it after awhile. The policy with regard to the library of congress is briefly yet fully stated by Mr. Herbert Putnam, librarian since 1899, in these words:



"In each country there should be one library as nearly as possible comprehensive. This means indefinite accumulation and preservation. In the United States that library is the National library at the national capital. Its possession of the unusual book, or the little-used book, may enable the local libraries to get along without them. A book here is available to the entire country, and this means a great saving to the country as a whole."

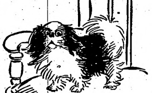
Mr. Putnam points out that the word "comprehensive," as used by him, does not mean the purchase of everything in print. If congress each year were to give the library all the funds for which it asks, there would still be exercised in the purchase of books that selection which has been the policy of the past. The work of selection is even carried into the copyright deposits, only a portion of which are placed in the library proper.

"Mere bookstacks cost little," adds Mr. Putnam. "As against the cost of the main establishment the cost of housing the accessories is a relatively small one. At the present rate of increase, which is about eighty to ninety thousand volumes a year, it would not exceed one per cent of the cost of the building.

"So far as the library building is for the reader, for exhibition purposes, and for the purposes of ordinary administration, it will be good for an indefinite length of time, in spite of our annual additions in the way of volumes and pamphlets."

Spaniel Enjoys Distinction in Official Society

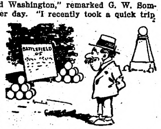
SENATOR JAMES E. MARTINE'S King Charles spaniel enjoys great distinction in official society of which he is a member, for he is not only the oldest member of official petdom, but he always has the entree at the White House, where he is a prime favorite.



Ambassadors, senators, representatives and hopeful office-seekers may cool their heels in the anteroom. But not so with Scrap. He enjoys the prestige of being an old and intimate friend of the president and his family, when they lived in New Jersey, so when he arrives at the White House he simply walks unannounced into the room where the president is, knowing that he will receive a warm welcome. Scrap is fifteen years old and thinks a good deal of the comforts of life. His special delight is to lie in a big rocking chair, of which the senator is also very fond, and sometimes gets it before him.

Places of Historical Interest Near Washington

"WHAT a wonderful opportunity for the study of history is provided within a radius of a few miles around Washington," remarked G. W. Sommers of Parkersburg, W. Va., the other day. "I recently took a quick trip through a part of Virginia, and every moment of my time some point of historical interest was opened to me. Within ten miles of Fredericksburg seven of the important battles of the Civil war were fought, and in the walls of the old courthouse in Fredericksburg can still be seen cannon balls. Richmond, the capital of the Confederacy, is filled with historic spots. The present capitol building was where the ordinance of secession, which practically began the Civil war, was signed. The James river is lined with interesting places. It was on its banks that the first permanent white settlement on the western continent was established. I saw magnificent brick palaces that even today are regarded as luxurious dwellings which were built a century and more ago from bricks imported from England. At Cape Henry still stands the first lighthouse ever built on the western continent, constructed from brick brought from England.



"It is remarkable that so few persons in Washington realize the wealth of historic interest that surrounds them within a radius of 200 miles. I dare say that the people of Europe know more about their native countries than we in the United States know about our own country."

ALLIES AGAIN CLAIM OFFENSIVE ON AISNE BATTLE LINE

BELGIANS CLAIM ANTWERP ATTACK IS UNSUCCESSFUL

BERLIN DECLARES GERMANS HAVE CLOSED IN UPON FORTS OF CITY CAPTURING TWO OUTER FORTRESSES.

BATTLE NEAR CRACOW TO SURPASS ANY YET FOUGHT

Engagement Is Expected to Be Most Important in the East—Invasion of Russia From East Prussia Declared Failure by Petrograd Advices.

London, Oct. 6.—Having repulsed the German attacks, presumably in the vicinity of Roye, the French, according to the official communication at Paris, have resumed the offensive at several points, while other positions on their left have been appreciably maintained.

Von Kluck Division In Peril?

The Daily Mail's correspondent in France reports fighting in and around Douai, in the department of Nord, 18 miles south of Lillie, and considers that if the French have reached Douai in force that the situation of the German general von Kluck must be desperate. "General von Kluck," the correspondent says, "has had all the reinforcements which can be spared him and yet finds himself outnumbered at every point.

Offensive Move Believed.

The great effort of the allies, to envelope the German right, may, therefore, be said to be again in operation, and it is believed that the whole French column from Roye northward to Arras is moving eastward against the German position.

It is the same operation that has been tried repeatedly for the last three weeks in an attempt to reach the German lines of communication and encircle the German army forming the right wing or force it to fall back to Belgium or Luxemberg. The Germans have had a long time in which to make their position secure, so there is a lot of hard fighting ahead for both the attacking forces and the defenses. The defensive rôle is now apparently being assumed by the Teutons.

Waiting in Center.

In the center, from the Oise to the Argonne, the two well intrenched armies are still watching each other, ready at a moment's notice to meet attacks or, on the advice of aerial observers, to move to some point where the line is threatened.

In the Argonne district, where the crown prince's army attempted an advance a few days ago, there has been additional fighting with the result that the Germans are said to have been pushed back northward. In Southern Woevre the French are "making progress, but very slowly" against the Germans, who crossed the Meuse at St. Mihiel, but later were forced back over that river.

In Lorraine on the Vosges there is no change in the positions of the armies.

Claim Germans Repulsed.

London, Oct. 6.—A dispatch to the Central News from Antwerp says:

"The Germans have been repulsed. They asked for a two-hour armistice to bury their dead, but the Belgians refused to comply.

"The Belgians have destroyed all the bridges over the river Nethe. The Germans attempted unsuccessfully to rebuild the bridges."

Germans Claim Antwerp.

Berlin, Oct. 6.—Via. Wireless to Sayville, L. I.—The following official announcement was made:

"In the siege of Antwerp, forts Wavre-St. Catherine and Dorpweld have been taken and fort Waelhelm invested. Termonde, an important strategical point, has been occupied.

"On the western wing, a new French attempt to encircle our forces has been repulsed. The French have been ejected from thir positions south of Roye.

"Sorties from Toul were repulsed with heavy losses."

East Prussian Fight Rages.

London, Oct. 6.—The battle is still raging along the East Prussian frontier, and according to the Berlin reports the Germans have scored a victory over the Russians who had pierced their center at Augustowo.

On the other hand, Petrograd dispatches say the battle of Augustowo ended Saturday with a complete victory for Russian arms.

Cracow Batle Progresses Slowly.

The battle of Cracow is developing more slowly than anticipated, or at any rate nothing has come through from either side as to the happenings in that field of operations.

Rulers in Field.

Three monarchs, the Russian emperor, the German emperor and the king of Belgium, and the President of France are now taking part in the battles or are on their way to visit the troops in the field. The German emperor has been on both western and eastern frontiers, while King Albert, has been on the actual firing line ever since the war began. The Russian emperor has left Petrograd for the front, and President Poincare accompanied by his ministers, is well on his way from Bordeaux to give greetings to the men on the firing line.

Italy Reported in Action.

If the report coming from Rome that Italian soldiers have occupied Avlona is true, Italy has taken action which will almost certainly involve her.

Allies Learn to Burrow.

On the Battle Front, Paris, Oct. 5.—A thrill is in the air all along the extended allied lines. The French and British troops who have been over a fortnight in the closest contact with the Germans feel they have accomplished their hard task of preventing the Germans from breaking through the human barrier erected between them and Paris, their main objective, and that this means eventual victory for the allies.

The lines of trenches make the battle front appear like deeply scarred fields. The allies, who quickly learned the lesson of burrowing, at some places face the Germans within a quarter of a mile. Their field entrenchments offer admirable shelter from the effects of the German artillery, which consequently reduces their casualties and permits the allies to await in comparative safety the German attacks which must be made across the open and often at terrible cost.

Hundreds of German prisoners, it is declared, fell into the hands of the allies at every point and it was remarked that the majority were Bavarians, who seem to have been prominent in the front of the German attack.

Austrians May Change Seat.

Rome, via Paris, Oct. 5.—A deep impression has been produced by a report circulating in diplomatic circles here to the effect that the Austrian government, in view of the present situation, is urging Emperor Francis Joseph to transfer the court and seat of government either to Prague or Salzburg.

Russ Report Great Victory.

London, Oct. 5.—A dispatch to the Central News from Rome says:

"The Russian embassy here has issued a communication which announces that the Germans have suffered a terrible defeat in the provinces of Lodz and Suwalki, Russian Poland.

"The Germans, the communication says, were attacked with extreme vigor and compelled to flee from Suwalki, and other towns, leaving behind them great quantities of transport and guns. Their troops threw away their rifles and baggage. Numerous cannon were abandoned in the quagmire."

Other telegrams from Petrograd, the Central News correspondent at Rome says, declare that the Germans have lost 30,000 men in killed or wounded and 20,000 taken prisoners.

Two Przemysl Forts Captured.

Reuter's Rome correspondent says news received in the Italian capital from the Russian headquarters is to the effect that Przemysl, Galicia, has been attacked by the Russians on all sides. Two of the forts, it is stated, already have been taken and from these the Russians have been able to silence several Austrian batteries.

Greatest Battle Near Cracow.

The battle which promises to be the greatest and most important of the eastern campaign has commenced near Cracow, Galicia, where an Austro-German army, estimated at 800,000 men, is endeavoring to check the Russian advance. This combined Austro-German army has occupied a line just inside the Russian Poland frontier, from Cracow through Czenstochowa to Kalisz, and has had plenty of time to prepare strong defensive positions. Both sides are bringing up reinforcements. The Germans are hurrying their from Breslau and Bavaria. All the Bohemian and Moravian railways are congested with German troops and war material.

Report German Plan Failure.

The German plan of an invasion of Russia from East Prussia has failed, according to Russian official reports.

Germans Confident of Winning.

Amsterdam, via London, Oct. 3.—The Berliner Tageblatt, in a leading article, says:

"The German people await anxiously, but with confidence, further news from the French war theater, the news of the great advance of the French troops against the flank of our line should not unbalance us. We know that our front line is protected by broad eschelons which are ready to oppose such an enterprise.

Claim German Reinforcements.

"Even if the French or British forces advance still further in a northwest direction they will encounter always reinforcements which our commanders have kept back in expectation of such advances.

"The influence of the British reinforcements makes itself more and more felt. They are effective to impede us, though the results will not be lasting. Victory must be ours all the same."

Claim Austrian Retreat.

London, Oct. 1.—"From the latest events in Galicia and along the Carpathians, the conclusion drawn is that the Austrian army has abandoned Hungary to its fate and has left the route to Budapest to be defended by the Hungarian national troops," say the Petrograd correspondent of the Daily Telegraph. This dispatch continues:

"The Austrians continue to retreat before the pursuing Russians and appear to have given up not only the defense of their country in general but also to have decided to abstain from further independent action. They are simply hurrying on to Cracow to join the right wing of the Germans and apparently intend to become a mere component part of the German army.

Russians Cross Carpathians.

"Having passed the difficult part of Ugek pass, in the Carpathians, after dislodging the Honveds (landwehr) from three positions, the Russian troops have only some 10 or 15 miles to descend before reaching the Hungarian plateau where there is not a single fortress or fortified position except such as may be hastily improvised in the form of earthworks by the Hungarian defenders."

Million Russians for Fight.

The Rome correspondent of the Havas agency says a dispatch from Petrograd states that in the great battle which is imminent in the region of Cracow, Galicia, the Russian strength will be 1,000,000 men with powerful artillery under the command of General Roszky, Brussiloff and Dimitrieff.

REPORT DRESDEN IS SUNK

Passengers Arriving at New York Bring Rumor of British Victory Over German Ship.

New York, Oct. 5.—A rumor that the German cruiser Dresden had been sunk by the British cruisers Glasgow and Goodhope was brought here by passengers on the steamer Japanese Prince, which arrived from South American ports. This rumor, the passengers said, was current in Pernambuco on Sept. 17.

Captain Johnston of the Japanese Prince said he had talked with the British consul in Pernambuco and although the consul said nothing about the reported sinking of the Dresden, he intimated that no German warships were near the South American coast and assured the captain that the voyage to New York could be made without danger of capture.

Chinese in Way of Jap March.

Pekin, Oct. 5.—Without further diplomatic controversy, the Japanese are proceeding along the railway to Tsinan. The Chinese have not withdrawn from the line, but are not opposing the Japanese march westward. One Chinese was killed by the Japanese when they took over the Weihsien station. Further similar incidents are feared, though the Chinese government has not withdrawn its instruction to the commanders not to oppose the Japanese.

First Austrian General Ill.

Paris, Oct. 2.—It is officially announced by Austria-Hungary, says a dispatch from Rome to the Havas agency, that General Von Auffenburg, commanding the first Austrian army, is ill.

EUROPEAN WAR SITUATION.

The official Paris statement declares the Germans in northern France have been repulsed and that the allies have resumed their great turning movement against the German right wing. The report claims some slow progress against the Crown Prince's army in the Argonne district, while the center and extreme east are reported quiet.

Reports Vienna in Panic.

BY STEPHEN BURNETT,
Of International News Service Staff.

Vienna, by special messenger to Rome, Oct. 2.—Vienna is in a panic. The disaster suffered by the Austrian armies in Galicia has at last become fully known. General Von Auffenberg, former minister of war, is in disgrace and has been removed from his command in Galicia. Cholera has gotten a firm grasp on the Austrian armies and is spreading rapidly throughout Austria. Some cases have been found in Vienna.

Gen. French Makes Report.

London, Oct. 5.—While reports of a general retreat of the German right wing are not substantiated in a report of Field Marshal Sir John French, commander of British forces in the French campaign, just made public, the communicatoin declares that German attacks at the time of writing lacked cohesion, and that the artillery fire had "decreased in volume and deteriorated both in control and direction." The report covered the period from Sept. 25 to 29.

Canadian Troops Fill 31 Ships.

Montreal, Oct. 5.—A correspondent of the Daily Mail sent from Rimouski a description of the departure of the Canadian troops from Quebec. "Thirty-one ships were required to carry the men, guns, horses and supplies," he said.

CONGRESS MAY END SATURDAY

NATION'S LEGISLATORS STRAINING AT LEASH NOW.

Members Anxious to Get to Political Firing Lines—Will Rush Pending Bills.

Washington, Oct. 6. — Members of congress are preparing for a dash to the political firing lines. Senators and representatives alike are straining at the leash that has held them here continuously for 18 months and with the prospect of release growing brighter each day, the talk of adjournment exceeds discussion of the trailing threads of legislation.

Senator Kern and Representative Underwood, the majority leaders in congress, are besieged every few minutes in the day by their colleagues with inquiries about the plans for adjournment. Senator Kern invariably replies that the session can be adjourned if the members will stay at their posts and aid in expediting the finishing touches to the Clayton bill and the passage of the war revenue measure. Mr. Underwood replies that the house will complete its work as soon as it disposes of the Clayton bill conference report, the Philippine bill and the senate revision of the war tax.

The Philippine bill will be passed within a day or two and will not be taken up in the senate.

Some senators are so optimistic as to predict that congress can be ready to adjourn next Saturday night.

Republican senators, however, purpose to inject considerable political discussion into the debate on the war revenue bill. Already they have begun the attack in speeches by Senators McCumber, Jones and Smoot.

Whatever happens, however, unless there are unexpected developments in the war situation to involve American affairs, the legislators can be speeding to their campaign activities by October 17.

President Wilson told callers last week that he was satisfied with legislation that had been accomplished and would not insist upon consideration of the Philippine bill in the senate at this session, nor upon passage of the ship purchase bill until next winter. He will not oppose the conference report on the Clayton bill and the measure now seems likely to be approved as reported, despite efforts of some Democrats and Republicans to have it recommitted.

The action of Democrats of the senate finance committee in holding rather closely to the provisions of the house war revenue bill also is expected to help the adjournment situation. Retention of the bank capital tax, splitting the difference in the gasoline tax with a tax on automobile sales that will not affect the automobile owner, and minor changes in the stamp tax, wine tax and special taxes, it is believed, will be accepted by the house without demand for a conference.

Another matter to be cleared up is the Alaska coal land leasing bill, which has been in conference several days. An agreement will be reported this week.

Warring Nations Buy Flour.

St. Louis, Oct. 2.—A rush order for 110,000 barrels of flour was placed with a local milling company by representatives of one of the warring European nations, the identity of which was ont disclosed. This is the largest single sale of flour ever made here. The flour will be made of Kansas wheat and will require 540,000 bushels. Shipments from Kansas fields to St. Louis will begin within a few days, and will be rushed to New York as fast as the wheat is ground. The price was not made public.

Cotton Crop Next to Largest.

Washington, Oct. 5.—A forecast of 15,300,000 500-pound bales of cotton as the crop of 1914 has been made by the department of agriculture's crop reporting board, in the season's final reporting, which showed the condition of the crop on Sept. 25 was 75.5 per cent of a normal crop. The quantity of cotton brings this year's crop second in point of size ever grown in the United States. The record is 15,692,000 bales, grown in 1911. Last year 14,155,000 bales were grown and in 1912 there were 13,703,000 bales.

Aviators to Attack British Fleet.

The Hague, Oct 3.—A number of Zeppelins have been removed from Cologne and are reported to have been taken to Wilhelmshaven with the purpose of forming there a great aerial squadron that will attack the British fleet.

U. S. to Send No More Ships.

Washington, Oct. 3.—Secretary Daniels said the administration had no intention of sending more warships to the Mediterranean to protect Americans in Turkey.

English Ship to Aid Russia.

New York, Oct. 1.—Captain R. Goetsche, in command of the Danish steamer, United States, in from Christiansand, said that he had picked up a wireless in the North sea containing the information that thirty English warships were on their way through the Cattegat to help the Russian fleet in the Baltic sea. Thirty warships of undisclosed nationality, steaming south, were sighted by a Swedish fishing fleet in the Cattegat, it was stated in a dispatch from Copenhagen to the London Standard.

Fashion Note.

"One blessing, at least, will come to us from this dreadful war. We shan't be inundated with shocking French fashions."

The speaker was a leading clubwoman. She resumed:

"At a club dinner the other evening a man fashion writer—man fashion writers are the best—said to me:

"'A truce to these foreign modes! They are caricatures.'

"'Caricatures?' said I. 'Caricatures? Yes, perhaps. But wouldn't it be more accurate to call them take-offs?'"

After using 5 boxes of Dodds Kidney Pills the swelling disappeared and he felt himself again. He says he has been benefited and blessed by the use of Dodds Kidney Pills. How Europeans Get Our Gold.

Do you know just how Europe recently got that $125,000,000 in American gold. Well, here is the way it was done: Europeans hold great amounts in American securities, which is to say they have bought bonds issued in this country. When the war crisis came they saw the need of actual money in place of these bonds. They cabled to their American brokers to sell at the market price. They took whatever they could get, but there was always something offered, so the sales were heavy.

The purchasers of these bonds gave their checks. These the brokers cashed at their banks and got currency. This currency of the United States is made good by the deposit of gold in the treasuries. For every gold certificate in existence there is the actual metal in the treasury. So the brokers, getting the currency from the banks, went to the sub-treasury in New York and asked for the actual gold. They received it and sent the gold to their customers abroad.

Good Reason.

It was a very youthful class in physiology.

"Why," asked the teacher, "is it best to eat soup first when one is very hungry?"

The pupils stared at her blankly. Then Jamie enlightened them from the depths of his own experience.

"You can get it down faster," he announced.

It Helps a Lot.

Eve, for the first time in their married life, was telling Adam just what she thought of him.

"This is the original rib roast," chuckled Adam.

And that was the beginning of the saving grace of humor.—Judge.

LIGHT BOOZE.
Do You Drink It?

A minister's wife had quite a tussle with coffee and her experience is interesting. She says:

"During the two years of my training as a nurse, while on night duty, I became addicted to coffee drinking. Between midnight and four in the morning, when the patients were asleep, there was little to do except make the rounds, and it was quite natural that I should want a hot cup of coffee about that time. I could keep awake better.

"After three of four years of coffee drinking, I became a nervous wreck and thought that I simply could not live without my coffee. All this time I was subject to frequent bilious attacks, sometimes so severe as to keep me in bed for several days.

"After being married, Husband begged me to leave off coffee for he feared that it had already hurt me almost beyond repair, so I resolved to make an effort to release myself from the hurtful habit.

"I began taking Postum, and for a few days felt the languid, tired feeling from the lack of the coffee drug, but I liked the taste of Postum, and that answered for the breakfast beverage all right.

"Finally I began to feel clearer-headed and had steadier nerves. After a year's use of Postum I now feel like a new woman—have not had any bilious attacks since I left off coffee."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

LETTERS INDICATE BLACKMAIL PLOT

MAN ARRESTED AT DULUTH SUSPECTED OF RUSE TO "BLEED" J. J. HILL.

CLAIM CONFESSED FORGERY

Charles Howell Said to Have Admitted Money Order Swindle—May Bare Fraud on Salvation Army—Other Charges Laid.

Duluth.—Charles Howell, in whose possession were found letters believed to have been intended for use in an attempt to blackmail James J. Hill out of $50,000, has been remanded to jail to await trial on a charge of passing a forged postoffice money order at Saginaw, Mich.

Confesses to One Charge.

Through his alleged confession before United States Commissioner Thomas H. Pressnell, before whom he was arraigned, far-reaching fake charity operations, in which a score of Salvation Army posts were the victimized "beneficiaries," are expected to be laid bare. Salvation Army posts had to reimburse the postoffice department for the amount of orders they are alleged to have received from Howell.

Though Howell has denied that he robbed the postoffice at Courderay, Wis., federal authorities working on the case are convinced that it was from this robbery that Howell came into possession of the money order blanks used in the Salvation Army frauds.

Mystifying Feature.

A mystifying feature of the operations, and one that may send Howell before a lunacy commission rather than before a criminal court, is that there was no profit to the sender of the "gifts" to Salvation Army posts. The posts received money orders by mail, cashed them and made use of the money.

These canceled orders are in the possession of the United States court and penmanship experts are to decide if the handwriting is that of Howell. Nonexports declare the handwriting is very much like Howell's, especially that on an order for $100 sent to the Salvation Army at Superior, Wis.

JOKE COSTS LIVES OF LADS

School Boys' Prank Responsible for Burning to Death of Two Children at Play, Is Belief.

Robbinsdale.—While nearly a hundred relatives and schoolmates stood a few feet away, unable to help them, Robert Heintz and Leland Lammers, 6-year-old school boys of Robbinsdale, were burned to death as the result of a boyish prank. The complete story of the tragedy may never be known.

Shut within a small frame shanty, used as a section house, with the door locked and the windows down, the boys had no chance to escape. They had stopped at the shanty to play on their way home from school.

The bodies were not identified until three hours after the fire. Meanwhile, scores of Robbinsdale mothers, agonized with fear that their children might be the victims, crowded around the shack and helped put out the flames. All the boys and girls in the village were gathered in a group by their elders and counted and checked over to determine who were the missing ones.

Stories of the accident are conflicting. That the boys went into the shack to play and the lock on the door was sprung by school fellows behind them as a joke is the general belief in Robbinsdale.

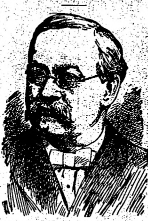
Sues for Sinking Boat.

Red Wing.—Mrs. Katherine Butterworth, daughter of the late John Deere, millionaire plow manufacturer of Moline, Ill., is made defendant in a suit brought by David Gantenbein, a fisherman of Diamond Bluff, Wis., to recover $1,600 damages for the sinking of his speed boat Carp at La Crosse, Wis., on July 6. Gantenbein alleges that Mrs. Butterworth is the owner of the private pleasure boat Kalitan, and that while the Carp was moored at Singer pier, La Crosse, the Kalitan officers carelessly operated the craft so that the stern swung around, crushing the side of the speed boat, sinking it.

Pickwick Merchant Alleged Murderer.

Winona.—Charles E. Suffrins, a young Pickwick merchant who on September 17 shot and killed Charles Bratz, a farmer, following a quarrel over the payment of a bill, was indicted on three counts by the grand jury. One indictment charges murder in the first degree, another murder in the second and the third manslaughter in the first degree. Suffrins, after a fistic encounter with Bratz following refusal of the latter to pay a bill of $1.25, it is charged, drew a shotgun and shot Bratz.

5,000 HONOR NORTHROP ON HIS 80TH BIRTHDAY



Three thousand University of Minnesota students, coming out of the armory where 5,000 people had met at the special convocation in honor of the 80th anniversary of the birthday of President Emeritus Cyrus Northrop, Wednesday, formed into companies, battalions and regiments like an army and acted as an escort of honor to Dr. Northrop to his home. Never was there so great a crowd packed into the armory as when the board of regents and the speakers faced the assemblage that had gathered to do honor to the former president of the state institution. Dr. Northrop headed the university twenty-seven years.

SHEEP INDUSTRY GROWING

One Red Valley Flock Numbers 4,200 and Is Being Fattened on Waste Production of Farm.

Crookston.—Four thousand two hundred sheep, owned by R. T. Buckler, were driven through the streets here to the Buckler farm southwest. Mr. Buckler has had a substantial flock of sheep ever since he began farming in this section, but last fall increased the number by heavy purchases in Montana, where the ranges were bare. He will fatten the flock in his stubble fields where the grazing is good and will market the animals just before the holidays.

Mr. Buckler has made a success of sheep every year he has been here and will net a substantial profit from his big flock this year. He says this is an ideal sheep country. The sheep foraged their living from the fields practically the entire winter, as he did not have to feed them any grain or roughage of any kind except for about ten days the latter part of January and the first of February, thus the cost of keeping was practically nothing.

In the fall and early winter months the sheep thrive with what otherwise would go to waste and at the same time materially assist in cleaning and fertilizing the land.

C. M. Winslow of central Polk county has shipped 300 head from the South St. Paul market to fatten on his fields this fall.

ABDUCTOR SENT TO PRISON

Married Man of Barrows Tracked 1,000 Miles Before Being Arrested.

Brainerd.—Holding court at Aitkin, Judge B. F. Wright heard the informations filed in three cases from Brainerd. Elmer Toutloff of Barrows pleaded guilty to the charge of abduction and was sentenced to an indeterminate term not exceeding five years in the reformatory in St. Cloud.

Toutloff, a married man, abducted a young girl from Barrows and in his wanderings was tracked over 1,000 miles by Deputy Sheriff Claus A. Theorin and eventually arrested in Chicago.

Jake Nesheim pleaded guilty to grand larceny in the second degree. Nesheim also was sentenced to an indeterminate sentence of not to exceed five years in the reformatory.

T. W. Larrabee, charged with selling liquor on Sunday, pleaded guilty and was fined $75 and costs of $87.77.

Charities Board Officers.

Bemidji.—Officers for the next conference of Minnesota Charities and Correction were elected as follows: President, G. A. Franklin, superintendent of schools, Faribault; vice president, O. M. Larson, county commissioner, Madison; second vice president, Mrs. C. L. Atwood, president State Federation of Women's Clubs, St. Cloud; secretary, Otto W. Davis (re-elected), Minneapolis; treasurer, C. E. Vasaly, chairman State Board of Control.

Sanatorium Site Selected.

Pipestone.—Worthington has been selected as the site for the southwestern Minnesota tuberculosis sanatorium. Eight counties in this section are interested in the project. Sites were offered at Currie, Windom and Worthington, and the committee of the boards of the counties interested selected the site at Windom, but the state sanatorium board overruled the action of the county boards and selected the site at Worthington. It is expected the building will be commenced early in the spring.

STATE FUND IS INSUFFICIENT

May Borrow for Schools as General Revenue Is Not Large Enough to Meet Full Appropriation.

St. Paul.—The state of Minnesota had $4,052,753.94 in its coffers at the close of business for the month of September, State Treasurer Walter J. Smith announces.

Of this amount $1,502,115.85 will be paid out October 19 to the school districts of the state. The general revenue fund totaled $1,044,018.91 last night. This probably will all be paid out this month for special school aid to high, graded, semi-graded and rural schools.

The 1913 legislature appropriated $1,962,875 for special school aid. If the entire appropriation is drawn by C. G. Schulz, superintendent of education, the general revenue fund will need to be overdrawn. This can be done to the extent of $950,000. The remainder of the money will have to be borrowed if the entire appropriation is withdrawn.

Mr. Schulz said last night that he will have figures prepared by next Monday showing how much special aid will be needed for the schools at this time.

BOOST HEALTH SAFEGUARDS

St. Cloud Exhibit at State Club Meeting Depicts Effective Work.

St. Cloud.—So as to show the splendid co-operation that is afforded the State Board of Health and local officials by the pure food and health and hygiene committees of the reading room, the delegates from St. Cloud are exhibiting at the meeting of the Federation of Women's Clubs, at Rochester this week, a complete collection of the blanks used by the health department and the inspection forms filled out each month by the societies' committee.

The blanks cover the testing of milk, the inspection of the butcher shops, groceries and bakeries, and will show the thoroughness with which the health of the city is safeguarded. St. Cloud is believed to be far ahead of any of the smaller cities of the state in this respect.

FOUR SUSPECTED OF MURDER

Coroner's Jury Charges Quartet Killed James Wallace, Dakota Harvest Hand.

Fergus Falls.—At the coroner's inquest over the body of James Wallace, who was shot by box car bandits near Luce station, in the northern part of the county, yesterday, a verdict was returned that Wallace came to his death at the hands of James Wolf, William Griffith, John Anderson and Michael Dempsy, the four men found hiding in a strawstack near Perham late last night.

Two of the men held up have identified two of the four as the men who did the shooting. All were brought here late today and are in jail.

Osakis on the Boom.

Osakis.—At a special election, the Osakis independent school district by a vote of 257 to 43, voted to bond the district in the sum of $45,000 for the erection of a new school building. The Osakis Creamery company has let the contract for a new solid brick building, and will utilize the old creamery for a farmers' co-operative steam laundry, the second institution of the kind in the state. F. H. Borchert, president of the Osakis State bank, is completing a new $10,000 home on Lake street. Many modern dwellings are being built in every section of the village.

Farmers Improve Herds.

New York Mills.—Much mixed stock is being shipped from here each week by the Farmer's Shipping association, all of which goes to the South St. Paul market. The movement among the farmers here to improve dairying cattle and to raise blooded stock is bringing noticeable results. Most scrub cattle are being shipped to market. A large shipmentwas taken to South St. Paul Thursday.

Woman Held for Shooting.

Pipestone.—Mrs. Anna Eschman, wife of a farmer living north of here, has been bound over to the grand jury, charged with shooting Kenneth Stead, a young man, whose father owns the farm on which the Eschmans live. Trouble over work on the farm is said to have led to the shooting. The bullet entered Stead's shoulder. He was not dangerously injured.

Bandits Robs Minnesota Hotel.

Bemidji, Minn., Oct. 3.—In the glare of electric lights, a masked highwayman entered the lobby of the Markham hotel, in the heart of the business district, and forced two bellboys and the night telephone operator, Miss Arvilla Patterson, to throw up their hands while, at the point of his gun, he compelled Harry Broecoe, night clerk, to unlock the safe. This done, the bandit lined Broscoe up against the wall and jumped over the counter and took the contents of the safe, amounting to $500 in cash.

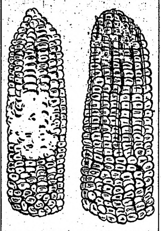
INFECTED CORN EARS

First Indication Is a Fading of the Husks.

Kernels Are Shriveled, Very Brittle and Loosely Attached to the More or Less Rotten Cob—Characteristics of Rots.

(By T. J. BURRILL.)

Everyone who has had anything to do with harvesting corn has noticed at least an occasional ear that differed remarkably from the normal ones in being more or less covered with and penetrated by mold. In many cases the husks and silk are also involved and appear cemented together and to the ear by a mass of white, cobwebby filaments. At the same time the parts affected have lost their substance, are light in weight and brittle in texture.



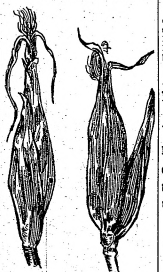
Two Ears Inoculated With Diplodia; That on the Left in the Silk; That on the Right at the Rose.

Upon close study it soon becomes apparent that there are several of these ear rots, or at least that there are differences which seem fairly constant when numerous specimens are carefully examined. It is thus possible to divide the affected ears into four groups, as follows: Diplodia, Fusarium I, Fusarium II, Fusarium III.

Some of these rots are so similar that the casual observer rarely entertains any suspicion of their being but one form. The resemblances are so complete in some instances that the removal of the husk and sometimes a microscopic examination are needed for the classification of the variety. Commonly, however, in fairly advanced stages of the disease one or more characteristic differences are apparent. The two forms most easily confused are the Diplodia, in which the color of the moldy growth is white, and Fusarium II, in which it is pink to red.

The first indication that ears of corn are diseased is a fading of the bright green of the husks to a pale yellowish green color. In Diplodia this change goes on gradually, and under favorable conditions quite rapidly, until the entire ear has the appearance of premature ripening. While this change of color on the outside is progressing one finds the inner husks have not lost their normal color, but are more or less tinged with brown, particularly along the advancing margin of the diseased area. This description also applies to the disease produced by Fusarium II, although no entirely decayed ear due to this organism has been found. In this case infection always begins at the tip and proceeds downward, rarely involving more than half of the ear.

The diseased ears shrivel up more or less, become darker in color and lighter in weight. The kernels are also shriveled, are very brittle, and are loosely attached to the more or less rotten cob. The silk is moldy and adheres by the mass of fungous threads to the inner husks and corn. The fungus penetrates all parts of the ear, sometimes extending into and badly injuring the shank.



Fusarium I. Fusarium II.

The premature yellowing of the husks of plants otherwise healthy is an indication that a diseased condition exists.

Birthplace of Froissart and Watteau.

Both Valenciennes and Malines, two of the latest towns to come into prominence in the western theater of war, have now little association with the production of lace beyond giving their names to the famous varieties. At Valenciennes, indeed, the manufacture has been discontinued, but the place has an alternate fame as the birthplace of Froissart, the historian (nearly six centuries ago) and of Watteau, the artist (230 years ago.)

No, Rupert, Fasel did not pay for that article in the News-Press. This is not that kind of a paper. —T. R. Falls News-Press.

No, he did not pay direct, but the tax payers paid for it, when they paid for publishing the delinquint tax list twice. Give Fasel another send off, he is entitled to it on that deal, you know, and we are of the opinion that he needs it bad, as the Pennington county tax payers are quite likely to give T. P. Anderson a trial at getting out those lists next time.

When you are friendly to both candidates for the same office, it is not a pleasant task to express an opinion about either, but we have had several requests from our subscribers to say something about the candidates for Judge of Probate and Sheriff. Mr. Dale the candidate for Judge of Probate in opposition to Mr. Michelet, seems to be quite a nice young man, although he is comparatively a stranger to us. As to Michelet we wish to say; that we have had the pleasure of doing business with him for a number of years, and a more honorable and painstaking official we never met. This office is one of a small salary, yet it is one of the most important offices in the county, for through it your property, and your wife's and childrens' interests in it must pass, when you are called to the other land. For this reason that office should be presided over by a competent and honorable attorney, both of which qualifications are possessed by Mr. Michelet. We want it distinctly understood that we do not only speak for ourselves, but for others on this question, for we have never heard of a single instance either as Judge of Probate, or as a U. S. Commissioner of a wrongful act being done by Wm. Michelet, and for this reason he should be re-elected by an overwhelmingly majority. The same rule would apply to Sheriff LaBree, for we do not only believe in firing a man that has not done right in office, but believe in rewarding one by re-election who has, for this is the only way to get and keep good officers.

D. P. O'Neill, in the News-Press publishes about two columns justifying his legislative record and challenges for a debate. Why, Daniel, we have been debating your record all summer, and have published chapter after chapter of it, and we would like to hear of you denying some of those facts either in print or in a public meeting, before we would spend time to chew the rag with you. But we would like to have you confine yourself to facts, and not make statements that are not facts. Let us tell you of the statement that you made to us in Deer Park a short time ago,—and we hope that you will not now try to deny it. When we asked you why you allowed that Drainage Bill, that was introduced by Marschalk, to be amended in the committee as it was, you told us that Marschalk withdrew the bill before it was acted on by the committee. Did you not tell us this Mr. O'Neill? Answer yes or no, before we consent to debate with you, for we tell facts. We immediately wrote Mr Marschalk at Warroad and asked him if he withdrew this bill, and I have his letter stating that he did not withdraw his bill, but that it was amended in the committee and was passed and became a law. We don't suppose that Mr. Marschalk ever paid any attention to it any further, as he seems to have been down there trying to get fish laws passed, while you were devoting a large portion of your time to a Modern Woodman bill. Now as to debating Dan, we want to say, "Go to it," speak every night and twice every day in all of the school houses in the district, and we will speak on Friday from Sunbeam, and if you can blarney up the farmers to vote for you again they certainly deserve all the injustice that they have suffered through those Drainage Laws. It is not necessary for us to follow you up in your campaign to debate with you, for you will find plenty of farmers, ready to ask you questions that will be hard for you to answer. We presume that your challenge for a debate at Thief River Falls will be accepted, and remember Dan that the eloquence of Bill Erwin, the famous criminal lawyer used to clear guilty murderers, until the juries "got next to him" that he was working for hire, then they turned him down The farmers are the jury this time Dan, and you caught them twice with your "hog wash" about being the GREAT representative of the farmers, but it is too late in the season to catch suckers now Dan, for they have stopped running.

The Thief River Falls News-Press seems to have adopted A, H. Fasel as a political orphan, but they will fail to land him at a home in that auditor's office.

The campaign of C. L. Hansen for State Senator is progressing finely, and he is gaining support every day, as the more his fitness for this important position becomes apparent to the people, the more votes he will gain. A man of a strong will and one that is devoted to the interests of his district is the kind of a State Senator that we need at this particular time, and Mr. Hansen possesses these qualifications.

As to County Treasurer, we wish to call the attention of the voters to the fact that Bernhard Knudsen is an old resident and tax payer of the county, that is well qualified for the position of County Treasurer, while his oppotent is comparitively a young man without any official experience. Mr. Knudsen has always been straight forward and honest in politics, and his friends should see to it that he is elected to the first political position that he has asked the people of the county to honor him with, and we believe that when the votes are counted Mr. Knudsen will be named as our next County Treasurer.

The Olson thrashing machine, from Rudell, has been thrashing in this neighborhood this week.

There will be a Young Peoples' Society at the residence of T. G. Rome Sunday, Oct. 11th. Everybody invited.

Eddy Hyland is doing the plowing on the Andrew Johnson farm with a "bull tracktor" gasoline engine, and he is going some.

Theodore H. Liden, candidate for County Treasurer was campaigning in this locality yesterday, and made this office a pleasant call.

If A. H. Fasel wants all of his political acts explained in the newspapers, we would suggest that he buy a daily plant and two linotype machines.

We saw a man yesterday looking for work, who had been a resident of North Dakota, and farmed it for seven years. He lays his financial difficulties to a failure of crops, and is seeking employment for himself and teams.

Local news are rather scarce this week, as the thrashing machine is in the neighborhood, and we must attend to saving our summer's crop. We expect to finish thrashing and plowing next week, and will devote some more time to the campaign. We will endeavor to publish one or two articles by Ole Olson as soon as he gets his plowing done so he has time to write them.

Ye editor and wife were business visitors at the flourishing little town of Goodridge on Monday. There are two good lumber yards located there, and it is almost impossible to mention the other branches of business, as they were all too busy to do much talking. It looks like a rush to a new town site in the gold fields, with people living in tents and any kind of a building that will afford them shelter. There will be a large territory tributary to this station, and there will undoubtedly be a thriving village built up there.

FOURTH CLASS POSTMASTER EXAMINATION

Saturday, October 24, 1914.

The United States Civil Service Commission announces that on the date named above an examination will be held at Thief River Falls, Minn. as a result of which it is expected to make certification to fill a contemplated vacancy in the position of fourth class postmaster at High Landing, Minn. and other vacancies as they may occur at that office, unless it shall be decided in the interests of the service to fill the vacancy by reinstatement. The compensation of the postmaster at this office was $ for the last fiscal year.

Age limit, 21 years and over on the date of the examination, with the exception that in a State where women are declared by statute to be of full age for all purposes at 18 years, women 18 years of age on the date of the examination will be admitted.

Applicants must reside within the territory supplied by the post office for which the examination is announced.

The examination is open to all citizens of the United States who can comply with the requirements.

Applications forms and full information concerning the requirements of the examination can be secured from the postmaster at HighLanding, Minn. or from the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

Applications should be properly executed and filed with the Commission at Washington at least 7 days before the date of the examination, otherwise it may be impracticable to examine the applicants.

U.S. Civil Service Commission.

LEAVE THE HORSE OUTSIDE.

Some of the candidates for office who are quite sure of election reminds us of a story, which runs something like this: A Jew had journeyed up the road to heaven, but when he arrived at the gate he was denied entrance. When he started back down the path, he met a God fearing parson, who was on his weary way to heaven, and thus accosted him: "There is no use to go up there for the door is shut, and Gabriel will not open it." "Oh yes," said the parson, "he will open it for me." "Well now I tell you," said the Jew, "what to do, you are weary and you can ride on my back, and when Gabriel opens the door for you we both can slip in." When they came up to the gate, the question was asked, "who comes there?" "Parson Jones," was the answer. "Well you may enter the gate, but hitch your horse outside." That is about the position that some of the county officials will find themselves in who are trying to ride Fasel into office on November 3rd.

FASEL'S REPLY.

County Auditor Fasel dumped about a page of newspaper copy onto us last night, which he claims is an explanation of our articles regarding him. Space and time to set it ALL in type forbids us to publish it in full in this issue. He denies all ditch charges, and lays the blame for the delinquint tax lists having to be published twice onto the Clerk of Court. As Mr. Fasel has threatened to publish the article in the Eleven Towns, and an affidavit also, we will allow him to do so, as his long winded article is only part of his explanation on ditch matters, which he is now trying to WORK us to publish free of charge, which we refused to do, and is undoubtedly what his affidavit refers to, which he is going to have published in the Eleven Towns. We only hope that Bro. Lattimore will charge him what the work is worth and if he does, he will not spread his news before the public at the expense of a poor country publisher. In conclusion we wish to say that we will publish free of charge any short explanation that Mr. Fasel desires to make, but we cannot devote him ten or twelve columns of space to tell about things that are not in controversy. For instance there is no dispute among the tax payers of this county about Jerry Sherwood being dead.

All these political announcements are paid for, or to be paid for at regular rates.

Having received the nomination for County Treasurer of Pennington County, I respectfully solicit your support and vote at the General Election November 3rd 1914.

Bernhard Knudsen

This story epitomizes, in the life of one big man, his big foes and big friends, the strife, the hopes, and the aspirations of modern America. Involved with his ambition is the ambition of the laborer, of the capitalist, of the progressive, of the humanitarian, of the socialist, of the society woman, and of the woman who gives all for love.

CHAPTER I.

Dreams.

He drifted into the delectable land that lies between sleep and waking, tasting the fleeting savor of his dreams—the epic visions of full-blooded youth. They had passed just beyond memory, leaving a confused yet glowing sense of sharp combats waged, of victories won. A golden haze enveloped him. Through it filtered a dwindling resonance, as of some noble processional sung by a departing far-distant choir.

A wave of delight rippled over him. Then the thought that, not sharing his slumber, had painted his colorful dreams, worked to the surface.

"My last day here!"

He awoke slowly. Before him, seen through the unshuttered window, lay a world somber enough to one tugging against its restraints, lovely when it was to be left behind. He saw the September sun peep over the hills at the head of the valley, rise majestically and swing clear, a golden disk hung in the sky, symbol of the reward of men's struggles; its radiance, streaming into the little room, dispelled shabbiness with a mellow glow he could almost feel. The matin sounds arose, according finely with the lingering echoes of his dream music. He reveled in a new perception.

He was twenty years old.

He was not one to loll. He sprang from bed and stood naked; supple [illegible] youth, too slender for great strength but with [illegible] unconscious grace of the wild animal.

He dressed and stood by the window in the attitude of a listener. Intently he sought to define the faint other-world resonance that still seemed to vibrate about him. But the theme eluded him.

His illusion was effectually shattered. Into the subdued melody of the Sabbath morning thrust a profane intruder, the jerky wheezing notes of a cabinet organ in the day's hymns, played by some one who aspired beyond endowment.

He frowned, then threw back his head and laughed silently—a trick he had sometimes—at the absurd anticlimax.

"I'm still in Bethel. It's a long way from here to—there." He drew a long deep breath.

A question halted him. "There—where?"

He shook his head vigorously, as though to throw off the query, and went down to the kitchen.

The odor of frying ham saluted his nostrils; he sniffed it hungrily. A man, apparently old, was placing heavy, chipped ironware dishes on the table. He nodded briefly in response to the youth's blithe greeting.

"I'll be ready," he said in a dull flat voice, "time ye're back from the stable," and continued his slow precise setting of the table.

In a few minutes the other returned, the horses fed and his own hands and face scrubbed in cold water from the cistern. They sat down without speaking. The youth ate eagerly, gulpingly.

When the first keenness of appetite was gone, burning to talk of the great hour at hand, he broke the silence. "Well, father, this is my last day in Bethel."

The old man merely nodded, keeping his eyes on his plate.

Boyishly the son began to set forth his plans and hopes and expectations; they were not small. But the old man maintained his silence. The youth conceived him to be an unsympathetic audience.

"Guess you're not interested," he said a trifle sulkily.

"Yes, I'm interested, Mark," the father answered, "but there ain't anything to say." He raised his glance to the window. "Guess I couldn't say anything that'd help much."

The sweep of the youth's anticipation faltered before a quality in the old man's words. Old, "old Simon;" so his neighbors called him. Yet he was not really old, but in the noonday of life wore the gray mantle of age. For he, too, had dreamed his big golden dreams. Below the village stood a dismantled rotting forge, monument to their futility. After his failure he had returned to his shop and trade, shoeing his neighbors' horses, mending their wagons and plows, a dull-eyed, taciturn, spiritless plodder.

Simon Truitt rose and began to clear the table. The son moved toward the door. There he paused, vaguely sensible of a sorrow to which some soothing word was to be said. But the word would not come to lips unschooled in such tender office. He went slowly out into the sunshine.

In the stable he curried the horses, lingering over the pretty brown mare—latest and finest trophy of his horse-trading—until her coat shone satiny. This labor of love ended, he lighted a pipe and sat in the stable doorway.

He sat there until from across the town came a flat unmusical clamor, the cracked church bell calling the faithful—that is to say, all Bethel save one—to worship. He rose reluctantly. Soon he emerged from the little house, shaved to the blood and clad in the discomfort of Sunday clothes.

Always on warm Sabbath mornings Simon Truitt was to be found sitting on the stoop, and always facing the north; the dismantled forge lay to the south. He was that one for whom the cracked bell tolled in vain; he was supposed to be an atheist.

"Goin' to church?" he asked in the expressionless tone that was his habit.

"I guess so," answered Mark. "Unless," with sudden understanding, "you'd like me to stay."

Simon hesitated, then shook his head. "No, ye'd better go same as always. Courtney'd want ye to."

"I owe him a lot."

Simon nodded. "More'n to—anyone else here. Think a good deal o' him, don't ye?"

"Yes. Sometimes he's kind o' queer, though."

Simon nodded again. "D'ye," he asked unexpectedly, "d'ye believe what he preaches?"

"Why, yes!" said Mark. "Yes, I s'pose so," he amended.

The dull glance momentarily sharpened. "Not very much, I expect. Better believe it hard—or not at all. It's most time fur church."

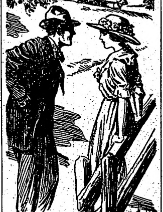
Mark swung heavily down the path. The father's eyes followed him wistfully.

Mark joined the straggling procession that moved, stiffly decorous, toward the house of worship. Once, during the short journey, a spring wagon overtook and passed him; a girl in the rear seat turned and nodded. A wave of red surged into his dark face. Until the wagon drove into the churchyard, his glance clung to the mass of yellow hair under the pink hat. Unconsciously [illegible] quickened.

He found an empty [illegible] near the door, and entering, leaned back, half closing his eyes. He followed the congregation as it rose and sat in hymn and prayer and lesson; but he moved mechanically, without thought of worship. His glance sought the far corner where a shaft of morning sunshine had set a mass of yellow hair ashimmering. The sight and his dreams gave him a new and daring resolve. The hour sped swiftly.

He went quietly from the church; in the yard he took a station by which the farmer folk must pass to their vehicles and there, as he had resolved, boldly, in the eyes of all, he waited for her.

She appeared, a slender girl who, as she moved slowly around the church, wove a spell over the betrousered portion of Bethel, even where she had not the subtle aid of dreams. She was not small, but, neatly made, gave an effect of daintiness not characteristic of the maids of that valley. Unity was supposed to be "delicate," hence was spared those arduous tasks that leave so little time to study of beauty hints and fashions. If there were some to suggest that "Squire Martin's family let Unity make fools of 'em," at least no males were among these critics.



"To the City? For Good?"

Self-conscious to the finger-tips but not betraying it, she picked her dainty way among the gossiping groups, tossing gay little smiles to this and that intoxicated youth, blissfully deaf to an occasional feminine titter in her wake.

She came to a halt beside Mark, looking up with a smile that made him forget curious observers.

"Good morning, Mark!"

"Unity!" His voice was low, tense, as though he announced some tragic happening. "I'm going away tomorrow."

The vivacity fell from her face, leaving it very serious.

"To the city? For good?"

"To the city. For good."

"I am glad."

"Glad!" he stammered. "I thought—I wanted you to be sorry."

"Yes," she nodded emphatically. "I'm glad—for you," she added more softly.

He remained silent, an unreasoning, indefinite disappointment lingering. Something he wanted—he could not say what—was lacking in her words.

"Aren't you glad?"

"Yes, but—" He dismissed the doubt. His eagerness returned. "I'm going driving this afternoon."

She became girlish again. "Is that an invitation?" with a demure little smile.

"If you want to go."

"Of course, Mister Solemn! Aren't you—" She stopped, apparently overcome with confusion for her boldness.

"Say it!" he besought thirstily.

There was a delicious moment of uncertainty, a breathless little laugh.

"My lover. There! I'll be waiting for you, just after dinner." And the butterfly fluttered away.

He went from the churchyard and followed the street past the point where it returned to its native state of dusty, weed-flanked, country pike. He came to a place where the road rose sharply and fell again. Mounting to the crest, he threw himself on the roadside and waited; thither Richard Courtney would come on the after-service walk that was his custom.

Up the rise, village-bound, leisurely creaked an ancient top buggy. In it slouched a middle-aged man upon whose face were written humor and patience, qualities of which he had great need just then. His horse labored heavily at its task, head hanging low; not the bellows in Simon Truitt's smithy puffed louder or harder. At the crest it stopped without urging. Mark frowned impatiently. Then he noted the sad state of the horse and a grin displaced the frown.

"Hear you're going away," "Doc" Hedges remarked. "For the good of the town?"

Mark nodded, the grin widening. "Maybe you'd like to help pay my fare?"

"I have helped," the doctor rejoined dryly. "Going to get rich, ain't you? They all think that."

"It happens sometimes."

"You might, though. Any man ought to get rich that could sell me this—would you call it a horse?"

"Hmm!" Mark considered the animal judicially. "Well, it has four legs."

"So's a billy goat," drawled the doctor. "Goat'd be more use to me, too."

"What did you buy it for, then?"

"I ain't squealing. Pretty slick customer, ain't you?"

The grin returned. "I can sell horses," Mark modestly admitted, "to some people."

"Humph! Only a fool'd buy 'em of you," the doctor agreed. "What'll you take for the brown mare?"

"The brown mare isn't for sale."

"Any horse is for sale," the doctor insisted, "at the right price. Give you a hundred and fifty."

"I wouldn't sell her for two-fifty."

The doctor sighed and clucked to the weary horse.

Out of the dusty cloud trailing behind the creaky buggy emerged a tall stooping figure, clad in the rusty black of the country clergyman. He walked slowly, and when he came to the rise, with a slight effort; evidently he was a frail man physically. At the crest he stopped, breathing hard.

"Taking a good-by look at it?" he asked between breaths.

"No. Just waiting for you."

The preacher smiled faintly; the worn dispirited face lighted up a little. He turned his glance to the valley.

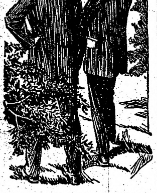
"It's worth a farewell. You'll be homesick for it sometimes—I hope. Shall we walk a bit farther?"

At his lagging pace they tramped along the road, constantly rising and descending but always reaching up toward a higher level. They kept the frank silence of those who have been companions often.

Ten years before Richard Courtney had resigned the city congregation that was steadily withering under his ministry and had come to shepherd the little flock of Bethel. It proved to be a life sentence, but in the end he stayed, if not gladly, at least with such Christian fortitude as a quivering sensitive soul could summon; having found—so he put it—a need to which he could minister. In the early days of his new service he had discovered a neglected, unlettered, moody youngster suffering under the blight of his relation to Simon Truitt, who, for his supposed atheism, was accounted a little less than respectable. Some quality in the boy caught the preacher's fancy. Tactfully he sought to win into Mark's heart, not a very difficult task once the lad learned that ministerial conversation was not confined to graphic pictures of eternal torment. And then, not quite realizing how this new interest eked out the Christian fortitude just mentioned, he set about to make Mark over. From Richard Courtney the blacksmith's son had had his Vergil and Xenophon and Homer, his Euclid and Quackenbos. What may have been best of all, he had had Richard Courtney.

In the intense, imaginative, quick-brained lad Courtney thought he discerned a rare spirit fitted to be a chevalier of the Lord, a fighter of others' battles, a bearer of others' burdens; thus we may read what Richard Courtney would have made his own life. He, the exile, had failed; but in the larger life from which he had been banished he would live again and be felt through a fine strong man of his making. For ten years he had jealously surveyed the prospect, patiently toiled and prayed that it might be.

But now, when the day for which he had prepared was come, he was not happy. The question continually recurred. How well had he builded?



"That's Where the Doctor Wants to Build His Sanatorium."

With suddenly clarified vision he beheld the youth at his side, raw, unshaped, the reaches of his soul as yet unlighted by purpose, unwarmed by inspiration. After ten years he was almost as Richard Courtney had found him.

"I have scoured the windows. I cannot give the light," thought the preacher sadly.

He became aware that Mark had broken the silence. "I—I owe you a lot," he had said.

"Not very much," Courtney sighed. "I wish it were more—much more."

"Oh, yes, it is much. You've taught me to read and talk and—and think." Courtney repressed an unhappy smile. "You've made me—see big. You've got me ready to go away from here. I—I appreciate it."

"I'd rather you could see true. But must you go?" The plea was without spirit; he knew its uselessness. "There's a life to be lived here, even by a man who sees big. I wish you would stay, at least for a while."

"No, I must go now. I've a reason you don't know."

The preacher felt a jealous pang.

After a while he said. "Did you by any chance hear my sermon this morning?"

Mark looked away, uncomfortable. "Only part of it. I was thinking pretty hard."

"Of yellow braids and a pretty complexion," Courtney said to himself bitterly.

Mark was frowning in an effort to recall and piece together detached phrases that had floated to him during the service and then, finding no welcome, floated away. "It was about," he said hesitatingly, "it was about a man finding his big idea."

"I am flattered." The dry droll inflection was a concealment.

"The big idea," said Mark vaguely, "does it mean—God?"

"It's His way of lifting the world forward. It's—" Courtney stopped abruptly, with a hopeless smile. He looked away across the hills.

Suddenly, with an oddly appealing gesture, he turned again to Mark. All the intense longing of the man who has dreamed and failed and yet clung to some fragment of his hope, painting his vision, breathed in his words.

"Some day you may remember I told you. It's the big purpose that sometimes comes to the big, passionate man, to accomplish some work for its own sake; that grips him, drives him, makes him ruthless to his own desires, forgetful of his failures and blind to everything but his task; that transforms him into a narrow zealot, a fanatic, but a power—always a power, because he is his purpose incarnate. It is that without which the big man is wasted, because he is that dangerous, useless thing, a force uncontrolled. . . . It's what I wanted you to have."

Mark stared. "I—I'm afraid I don't understand."

"And I," Courtney cried, "I can't make you understand! But you will know, when it comes to you." The fire began to die from his eyes and voice. "If it comes," he added.

For a while Mark considered perplexedly this outburst. Then he dismissed it as one of the incomprehensible moments of a man whom, despite oddities, he liked very much. He returned to the thought that had led to the moment.

A little timidly he made the offer. "I'm going to leave the brown mare with you, if you'd like her."

"It's good of you to think of it. But you can sell her well. And you'll need the money."

"I know. But I want you to have her. I traded to get her for you."

Courtney would not spoil his pleasure. "Of course, I—" His acceptance halted. "No, give her to Dr. Hedges."

Mark shook his head. "I want you to have her."

"He needs a good horse. The one he has—"

"It was a fair trade," Mark asserted defensively.

A turn of the road brought them within sight of a great hill that stood across the valley. Over its level top swept breezes filtered pure through many leagues of forest. "Hedges hill" the village called it, finding humorous matter therein.

Courtney pointed. "That is where the doctor wants to build his sanatorium for consumptives."

"I know. He's cracked over that. He'll never do it."

"Perhaps not. It would be too bad. It," Courtney added quietly, "is his big idea."

Mark looked long at the hill, as though from the site of the sanatorium in Spain might be gleaned some hint of the meaning of the "big idea."

After a while he said slowly, "Would you really rather he'd have the mare?"

CHAPTER II.

The Path of Youth.

Had Richard Courtney thought to look back to his own adolescence, he might have understood his failure.

Mark, whose life, the preacher supposed, was to be made over by many books and sermons on purpose, unselfishness and clean living, was in fact seeing a miracle of quite another sort unfold within him.

Companionship, once sought, had suddenly become distasteful. He was happy only when wandering alone in the woods, idle gun on shoulder, or drifting lazily in his canoe.

After a period, during which his body shot up to its full height, wholesome toil and study busied his thoughts and Richard Courtney began to nurture vain hopes, occurred an event of no small importance to many young gentlemen of Bethel. Unity Martin, proud possessor of a diploma declaring to those who cared to peruse that she had mastered certain arts, came home to exhibit in all its perfection the product of education.

He was returning late from an afternoon's hunt in the woods behind the Martin farm, when he unexpectedly came upon her one autumn day. She was standing on a little knob, gazing absently into the fading sky. His ever-ready imagination was touched. In the dusk, the pale glow of the dying day upon her, her pensiveness and apparent frailty gave her a seeming of soulfulness that abashed him, moved him strangely. He thought he beheld one far finer and purer than any of the clayey creatures his life had touched. She saw him and smiled faintly. That smile put him in an agony of confusion and awkwardness. Because he did not know how to depart, he found himself walking home with her, and when she praised the pheasants slung over his shoulder, on a sudden glad impulse he gave to her and she quite naturally accepted the trophy of his hunt. This was a prophecy, but he was no seer.

It was long before he lost that impression of her, the frail spirit-like girl of the dusk, even though riper acquaintance might have taught him that she was indeed a dweller upon the earth. He whispered her name to himself, thinking it finest poetry. His desire to "do something" became a burning impatience to do large and splendid deeds that would prove his mettle. He was, in a word, a boy who thought himself in love.

Came a night, a still winter's night when moonlight gleamed on the snow and the chimes of sleighbells added to the enchantment, when he kissed her, with a sense of sacrilege—and she did not resist.

No wonder, then, Richard Courtney preached purpose in vain! His pupil's horizon was filled with a purpose not his own. Even the preacher's incomprehensible outburst was forgotten, as the boy went to his tryst that Sabbath afternoon.

For a mile he drove carefully and then, letting out the mare, with a flourish of speed drew up before the house of Squire Martin. It was the most pretentious in the valley.

Soon Unity appeared, fresh and dainty in her white dress and pink hat, followed by her sister Susan bearing a heavy pasteboard box. While Mark awkwardly helped his lady into the buggy, Susan slipped the box under the seat. Mark got in and the brown mare, needing no command, started away.

"I put up some lunch," Susan called after them. "Don't forget to eat it!"

"And so," breathed Unity, "you're really going away—at last! How did you happen to decide to go just now?"

"I don't know. It just came to me the other day that I couldn't stay here any longer. Somehow, ever since we began to talk of the city, this place has seemed so small and shut in—until this morning."

"Until this morning?" in some alarm.

"Then it seemed kind o' cozy and—and protected. I hate to leave it. I hate to leave you, Unity."

"And I'll hate to have you go. But, of course, you must. And then, before very long, you'll come back—and take me away with you."

For a while in silence they gave this prospect the consideration it deserved. Then:

"Oh, Unity, how can you love me so?"

She was able to answer him on this point in a way to satisfy him and yet leave him humbly grateful for his vast good fortune.

The shadows were quite long when they espied a great flat rock in a clearing a little way from the road. And there, in a delicious intimacy that they solemnly asserted was but a foretaste, they remembered to eat the lunch put up by the thoughtful Susan. Afterward they spent a rapturous hour watching the sun glide down to meet the hills.

She broke a long silence to say, dreamily, "You're going to be very rich, aren't you?"

He laughed. "Maybe. It isn't always so easy to get rich, you know."

"But everybody says you will."

"Everybody—in Bethel—may not know." Then he added firmly, "But I will—for you. And then—"

He got down from the rock and lifted his arms to her. She stood uncertain, looking down at him. The glow of the sunset was still upon her; in her eyes was another glow, from within, for him.

She measured the distance to the ground—it was almost her own height—then, with a gasp for her daring, she sprang into his arms. He caught her and held her, kissing her again and again, thirstily. She began to respond; her arms tightened around his neck; she clung very close.

She cried tremulously, "Oh, Mark, you won't forget me—out there. I—I couldn't bear—that."

"I will not forget."

A last bright shaft reflected from the crimson west flooded their little clearing, fell upon her. And that was the picture of her he carried "out there"—Unity in the sunset glow, eyes and cheeks aflame with love, desiring him only and not that he would win.

"Little late, ain't ye?" Simon greeted Mark. But there was no reproof in the words, and no question; he assumed no right to pry into his son's affairs.

"I've been taking a drive," Mark answered.

Simon rose and went into the pantry. He returned, carrying a pitcher of milk and a plate piled high with buttered bread.

"I kept this ready fur ye. Thought ye might be hungry."

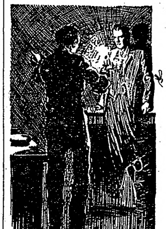
Mark was not hungry, but he ate with a show of great relish. Some instinct told him not to decline this little service.

"Guess ye're purty glad to git away from here?"

In the morning Mark would have answered with an unqualified "Yes." Now he said, "I am—and I'm not." He drew a long breath that was almost a sigh. "It's like going in swimming in April."

"Ye're right to go," Simon said. "I wouldn't want ye to stay. There ain't any prospect fur a young man round here."

He rose, and going to the cupboard, fumbled among the dishes. When he returned, he laid before Mark a worn pocketbook of leather. Mark opened it and glanced at its contents.



"If You Ever Get Rich—Come Back Here and Build a Steel Plant."

He looked up questioningly. "Why, there must be 'most a thousand dollars!"

"Jest that. I've been savin' it fur ye."

Impulsively Mark pushed it back toward Simon. "But I can't take it. It won't leave you anything, and I don't need it. I've got more'n five hundred of my own."

"I'd ruther ye'd take it," Simon insisted heavily. "It'll come in handy. If ye don't need it, ye can find a safe place fur it. An' ye can pay it back, if ye ever git rich. I," he repeated, "I've be'n savin' it fur ye. I knowed ye'd go away some day an' I wanted ye to take somethin'—frum me."

Mark's hand went slowly to the pocketbook. "All right, father." The words fell awkwardly. "I'll pay it back some day. And—thank you."

Fishes That Emit Sounds.

There is a fish in the Tagus that emits sounds resembling the vibrations of a deep-toned bell, gong or pedal pipe of an organ. Herrings, when the net has been drawn around them, have been observed to do the same, and similar accounts are given of the river bullhead. An amphibious siluroid fish on being taken into the hand, is said to shriek, and certain of the blennies emit similar sounds.—Field.

IN STERLING LIVES A GIRL

Who Suffered As Many Girls Do—Tells How She Found Relief.

Sterling, Conn.—"I am a girl of 22 years and I used to faint away every month and was very weak. I was also bothered a lot with female weakness. I read your little book 'Wisdom for Women,' and I saw how others had been helped by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and decided to try it, and it has made me feel like a new girl and I am now relieved of all these troubles. I hope all young girls will get relief as I have. I never felt better in my life."—Miss BERTHA A. PELOQUIN, Box 116, Sterling, Conn.

Massena, N. Y.—"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I highly recommend it. If anyone wants to write to me I will gladly tell her about my case. I was certainly in a bad condition as my blood was all turning to water. I had pimples on my face and a bad color, and for five years I had been troubled with suppression. The doctors called it 'Anemia and Exhaustion,' and said I was all run down, but Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound brought me out all right."—Miss LAVISA MYRES, Box 74, Massena, N.Y.

Young Girls, Heed This Advice.

Girls who are troubled with painful or irregular periods, backache, headache, dragging-down sensations, fainting spells or indigestion, should immediately seek restoration to health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Escapes in Heat of Battle.

Reports indicate it sometimes takes a lot to kill a modern soldier, the New York World states. Sergeant Fougere of France received eight bullet wounds, a broken arm and other injuries, and although shot in the calf, thigh and ankle, escaped being captured by Germans and limped ten miles to his regiment. Another French soldier received six bullet and three bayonet wounds and is recovering. The French war office estimates only two men are killed out of every one hundred hit. The penetration is so clean one soldier did not know he had been hit for three hours, and another bullet went through two soldiers and lodged in a cavalryman's saddle.

New Jersey's 1913 mineral production was valued at $40,715,061.

The Human Automobile

The human body, like an automobile, changes fuel (food) into power. When the fuel is too rich, or the mixers and valves are out of order, waste products clog the machinery and reduce the power.

The kidneys, like exhaust valves, should carry off the waste (uric acid), but weak kidneys can't. Uric acid in excess causes headache, weak eyes, rheumatic pains, gravel, dropsy and fatal Bright's disease.

A Minnesota Case

"Every Picture Tells a Story."

Mrs. Carl J. Leochler, 605 E. Second St., Wabasha, Minn., says: "My back was awfully lame and painful and I was all run down. I could hardly turn over in bed and my ankles got badly swollen. The doctors didn't think there was much help for me. Doan's Kidney Pills went to the root of the trouble and strengthened my kidneys. They fixed my back up in good shape and I have been in good health since."

SMALL WARS MEAN BIG POEMS

Greatest Battle Hymns Have Not Been Inspired by Titanic Struggles Like the Present One.

The greatest poems have been written about little wars. The Iliad was written around a siege carried on by a handful of barbarian chieftains against a city of the second class. The battle of Chevy Chase was a border skirmish following upon a cattle-stealing expedition. And Kipling's imperial muse is at her best when she sings of petty wars with colored tribesmen. Britain's far-flung battle line was far flung against Dervishers and Afridis; it was seldom brought into collision with field intrenchments and siege artillery. Little war, or else big wars in anticipation of retrospect, these are the rich soil for the poet.

A great war in the actual, the fate of an empire truly at stake, may make poets out of the common crowd, but subdues the poet to the level of the common crowd. There is a solemn tone about Kipling's latest verse which has its effect. Only it is not exhortation we wanted, but exultation; not an appeal, but a clarion call. When an entire nation is aflame the poet is apt to find his mission rather perfunctory.

Strong Man's Weakness.

Speaking of great feats of strength Franklin H. Lane, secretary of the interior, recalled an incident that happened in a western state.

One afternoon an elderly woman visited the penitentiary, and on pausing before a certain cell was told that the inmate had been imprisoned for stealing a piano.

"I am very sorry to see you here," remarked the woman turning to the convict. "Is it true that you stole a piano?"

"Yes, ma'am," was the frank admission of the convict. Then he added: "I did it in a moment of weakness."

"In a moment of weakness!" gasped the elderly visitor. "Mercy me! I presume that had you had your usual strength you would have walked away with the whole house!"

PIMPLES RUINED COMPLEXION

724 E. N. Ave., Olney, Ill.—"When my trouble first began I noticed little pimples coming on my face. They itched and burned so badly that I had to scratch them and that only made them worse. About a week later my face was so badly covered with pimples and blackheads that I was ashamed. My complexion was ruined. The pimples would sometimes bleed and fester.

"I bought a box of complexion cream and used it but without effect. One day I heard of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and I decided to give them a trial. So I got a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment, washed my face with the Soap and applied the Ointment and in two weeks I was completely well." (Signed) Chas. E. McGinn, May 5, 1914.

OFFICIAL BRITISH REPORT SAYS GERMANS FIRE ON OWN FORCES

London.—The official press bureau issued a descriptive account of the operations in France of the British force and the French armies in immediate touch with it, communicated by an eye witness present at the headquarters of Field Marshal Sir John French.

"Sept. 25, 1914—For four days there has been a comparative lull all along our front. This has been accompanied by a spell of fine weather, though the nights are now much colder. One cannot have everything, however, and one evil result of the sunshine has been the release of flies, which were torpid during the wet days.

"Advantage has been taken of the arrival of re-enforcements to relieve by fresh troops the men who have been on the firing line for some time. Several units therefore have received their baptism of fire during the week.

Germans Fire on Own Men.

"Since the last letter left general headquarters evidence has been received which points to the fact that during counter-attacks on the night of Sunday, the 20th, the German infantry fired into each other as the result of an attempt to carry out the dangerous expedient of a converging advance in the dark.

"Opposite one portion of our position a considerable massing of hostile forces was observed before dark, and some hours later a furious fusillade was heard in front of our line, though no bullets came over our trenches.

Many Dead in Trenches.

"This narrative begins with September 21 and covers only two days. On Monday, the 21st, there was little rain and the weather took a turn for the better, which has been maintained. The action was practically confined to the artillery, our guns at one point shelling and driving away the enemy, who were endeavoring to construct a redoubt. The Germans for their part expended a large number of heavy shells in a long range bombardment of a village.

"Reconnoitering parties sent out during the night of September 21-22 discovered some deserted trenches, and in them, or near them, in the woods, more than a hundred dead and wounded were picked up. A number of rifles, ammunition and equipment also were found. There were other signs that portions of the enemy's forces had withdrawn for some distance.

"Tuesday, the 22nd, also was a fine day, with less wind, and was one of the most uneventful days that has passed since we reached the Aisne—uneventful, that is, for the British. There was less artillery work on either side, the Germans nevertheless giving another village a taste of the 'Jack Johnsons.'

Bodies in "No Man's Land."

"The spot thus honored was not far from the ridge where some of the most severe fighting in which we have taken part has occurred. All over this 'no man's land' between the lines the bodies of German infantrymen are still lying in heaps where they have fallen at different times.

"Espionage plays so large a part in the conduct of the war by the Germans that it is difficult to avoid further reference to the subject. They have evidently never forgotten the saying of Frederick the Great: 'When Marshal Soubise goes to war he is followed by a hundred cooks; when I take the field I am preceded by a hundred spies.'

"Indeed, until about twenty years ago there was a paragraph in their field service regulations directing that the service of 'protection in the field'—outposts and advanced guards—should always be supplemented by a system of espionage.

Many Spies Give Signals.

"Though such instructions are no longer made public, the Germans, as is well known, still carry them into effect. Apart from the more elaborate arrangements which were made in peace time for obtaining information by paid agents, some of the methods which are being employed for the collection or conveyance of intelligence are as follows:

"Men in plain clothes signal to the German lines from points in the hands of the enemy by means of colored lights at night and puffs of smoke from chimneys by day. Pseudo laborers working in the fields between the armies have been detected conveying information and persons in plain clothes have acted as advanced scouts to the German cavalry when advancing.

Officers Remain Behind.

"German officers and soldiers in plain clothes, or in French or British uniforms, have remained in localities evacuated by the Germans in order to furnish them with intelligence.

"One spy of this kind was found by our troops hidden in a church tower. His presence was discovered only through the erratic movements of the hands of the church clock, which he was using to signal to his friends by means of an improved semaphore code.

"Had this man not been seized it is probable he would have signaled to the German artillery at the time of their arrival the exact location of the headquarters and staff. A high explosive shell would then have mysteriously dropped on the building.

"Women spies also have been caught; secret agents have been found at the railroads observing entrainments and detrainments.

"It is a simple matter for spies to mix with the refugees moving about to their homes; difficult for our troops, who speak neither French nor German, to detect them.

"The French have found it necessary to search villages and also casual wayfarers on the roads for carrier pigeons.

"Among the precautions taken by us to guard against spying is the publication of the following notice printed in French and posted:

"'1. Motor cars and bicycles not carrying soldiers in uniform may not circulate on the roads.

"'2. The inhabitants may not leave the localities where they reside between 6 p. m. and 6 a. m.

"'3. Inhabitants may not quit their homes after 8 p. m.

"'4. No person may on any pretext pass through the British lines without an authorization, countersigned by a British officer.'

Value of Secrecy Shown.

"Events have moved so quickly during the last two months that anything connected with the mobilization of the British expeditionary force is now ancient history. Nevertheless, the following extract of a German order is evidence of the mystification of the enemy and is a tribute to the value of secrecy, well and loyally maintained at the time in England:

"'Tenth Reserve Army Headquarters, Mont St. Guibert, Aug. 20, 1914, 23:40.—Corps order, Aug. 21: The French troops in front of the Tenth army corps have retreated south across the Sambre. Part of the Belgian army has withdrawn to Antwerp. It is reported that an English army has disembarked at Calais and Boulogne, en route for Brussels.'"

DEATH COMES SWIFTLY TO TWO GERMAN SPIES

London.—A story received from a point in France it is not permitted to specify says:

A soldier comes out from behind a pine tree with rifle and fixed bayonet:

"Ou allez vous?" he says, stepping before me and dropping his bayonet point a little toward me.

"Je vais me promener," I reply smiling, and anticipate his next demand by pulling out my case and displaying my special permit, also various other papers and an officially stamped photograph, which proves my identification with the name upon the special permit.

"Monsieur, permit me," says the soldier suddenly in very fair English. "Monsieur is ze man that writes. I shake you by ze hand with ver' great pleasaire. It is to me an honor!"

We "shake" with enormous empressment and I compliment him upon his English.

He smiles, gratified, and disclaims with great modesty. He beckons me back among the trees.

"One comes!" he says. "Ssh! Ze woods here have been many times set in flames. We have suspects these be done with intention."

See Spy Among Trees.

He ceased his whisper abruptly and we both bent forward together. A hundred yards down the narrow path among the pines a man in a workman's blue blouse is standing, looking quietly in every direction.

Suddenly he takes a couple of steps in among the trees, stoops and lifts a stone.

Far down the hillside at the end of the narrow vista among the trees, a second man was suddenly seen. So utter is the silence that I can hear him plainly as he coughs. He begins to haul on something, and I realize suddenly the meaning of the whole incident that I am watching. The two men have located the underground private telephone wire going up to the fort. They have been tapping it for any news they might pick up.

Death Is Painless.

The soldier is methodical. He takes the distant man first. Kneeling there behind him, I watch with a growing thrill and tension of tragedy and sickness his sunburned cheek cuddle against the stock of his rifle. Then very slowly it seems to me in that quiet, dreadful moment his stubby cigarette stained forefinger crooks back gently, gently on the trigger.

"Crack!" comes the sharp, snapping bang of the weapon, and the man down the vista of trees gives a queer little jump and then turns right around quickly and looks behind him. And thus looking, and seemingly unaware that he is the person who has been shot, his heart stops and he rolls over quite easily and gently on his side—a merciful enough death, as these violent deaths go, for some of them are so dreadful.

Shoots Second German.

And then, as I stare, the rifle goes "crack!" again and I jump; for I am still looking at the silent figure down the vista of trees.

But the soldier has been attending to his business and has snapped off a second shot at the nearer man, for the man had started to bolt. And because the shot was hastily aimed the second death is as cruel as the first was merciful.

An examination of both bodies shows that the men were German spies, in possession of "ciphered" information that would no doubt prove very helpful to our enemies.

Found He Was Mistaken.

A man from the country, in charity one will say from the country, although he may have been a Bostonese, entered a New York restaurant the other evening, and while waiting to be served, gave his attention to an electric fan revolving just above his head. It was a high pressure fan, noiseless, and almost, if not quite, invisible because of its rapid motion. The stranger gazed at it for some considerable time and was heard to mutter: "I don't believe there is anything there at all." With that he put up his hand to confirm his belief. Immediately there was a yell that almost threw the place into a panic. The man sprang into the air, rushed out of the door and, as he disappeared, was heard to say: "I monkeyed with the buzz-saw, all right."

"Przemysl."

"Przemysl" is one of the few really simple proper names that have secured notoriety in the Russian invasion of Galicia. It is pronounced "Pzhem-is-l," with the accent on the "pzhem." Just how easy this is one may appreciate by considering Przemyslany, in the first syllable of which the "r" is sounded, thus: "przhe," with the Austro-Hungarian variation of "miscellany" following. In pronouncing "Przemysl" you should carefully hold a "p" between your teeth while pronouncing "ahem" (which is a soft, mushroom, dumdum variety of "shem") and just as you are about to eject it deftly insert the "p" in the outer hook of the "z;" thus: "Pzhem." Nothing can be simpler.

Finally Captured Eagle.

After defying a score of traps and as many guns of farmers, who have sought vainly to impose summary sentence for the loss of hundreds of chickens over a period of six months, Old Baldy, a monster eagle, was caught by a man with a lasso. He lay waiting in the shadow of his chicken house for the chicken thief for more than eight hours. The bird swooped down shortly after daybreak. The lasso was thrown around the eagle's neck. The man wanted to capture the bird alive, but it fought so desperately that he was forced to shoot it. The eagle measures eight feet seven inches from tip to tip, and weighs 73 pounds.

Save the Babies.

INFANT MORTALITY is something frightful. We can hardly realize that of all the children born in civilized countries, twenty-two per cent., or nearly one-quarter, die before they reach one year; thirty-seven per cent., or more than one-third, before they are five, and one-half before they are fifteen!

We do not hesitate to say that a timely use of Castoria would save a majority of these precious lives. Neither do we hesitate to say that many of these infantile deaths are occasioned by the use of narcotic preparations. Drops, tinctures and soothing syrups sold for children's complaints contain more or less opium or morphine. They are, in considerable quantities, deadly poisons. In any quantity, they stupefy, retard circulation and lead to congestions, sickness, death. Castoria operates exactly the reverse, but you must see that it bears the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher. Castoria causes the blood to circulate properly, opens the pores of the skin and allays fever.

Pink Tights and Ginghams

A Business Adventure of Emma McChesney

By EDNA FERBER

Copyright by Frederick A. Stokes Company

Some one—probably one of those Frenchmen whose life job it was to make epigrams—once said that there are but two kinds of women: Good women, and bad women. Ever since then problem playwrights have been putting that fiction into the mouths of wronged husbands and building their "big scene" around it. But don't you believe it. There are four kinds: Good women, bad women, good bad women, and bad good women. And the worst of these is the last. This should be a story of all four kinds, and when it is finished I defy you to discover which is which.

When the red stuff in the thermometer waxes ambitious, so that fat men stand, bulging-eyed before it and beginning with the ninety mark count up with a horrible satisfaction—ninety-one—ninety-two—ninety-three — ninety-four! by gosh! and the cinders are filtering into your berth, and even the porter is wandering restlessly up and down the aisle like a black soul in purgatory and a white duck coat, then the thing to do is to don those mercifully few garments which the laxity of sleeping-car etiquette permits, slip out between the green curtains and fare forth in search of drafts, liquid and atmospheric.

At midnight Emma McChesney, inured as she was to sleepers and all their horrors, found her lower eight unbearable. With the bravery of desperation she groped about for her cinder-strewn belongings, donned slippers and kimono, waited until the tortured porter's footsteps had squeaked their way to the far end of the car, then sped up the dim aisle toward the back platform. She wrenched open the door, felt the rush of air, drew in a long, grateful, smoke-steam-dust laden lungful of it, felt the breath of it on spine and chest, sneezed, realized that she would be the victim of a summer cold next day, and, knowing, cared not.

"Great, ain't it?" said a voice in the darkness. (Nay, reader. A woman's voice.)

Emma McChesney was of the non-screaming type. But something inside of her suspended action for the fraction of a second. She peered into the darkness.

"'J' get scared?" inquired the voice. Its owner lurched forward from the corner in which she had been crouching, into the half-light cast by the vestibule night-globe.

Even as men judge one another by a Masonic emblem, an Elk pin, or the band of a cigar, so do women in sleeping-cars weigh each other according to the rules of the Ancient Order of the Kimono. Seven seconds after Emma McChesney first beheld the negligee that stood revealed in the dim light she had its wearer neatly weighed, marked, listed, docketed and placed.

"Gawd, ain't it hot!" she said, sociably.

"I wonder," mused Emma McChesney, "if that porter could be hypnotized into making some lemonade—a pitcherful, with a lot of ice in it, and the cold sweat breaking out all over the glass?"

"Lemonade!" echoed the other, wonder and amusement in her tone. "Are they still usin' it?" She leaned against the door, swaying with the motion of the car, and hugging her plump, bare arms. "Travelin' alone?" she asked.

"Oh, yes," replied Emma McChesney, and decided it was time to go in.

"Lonesome, ain't it, without company? Goin' far?"

"I'm accustomed to it. I travel on business, not pleasure. I'm on the road, representing T. A. Buck's featherloom petticoats!"

"On the road! Sellin' goods! And I thought you was only a kid. It's the way your hair's fixed, I suppose. Say, that must be a hard life for a woman—buttin' into a man's game like that."

"Oh, I suppose any work that takes a woman out into the world—" began Emma McChesney vaguely, her hand on the door-knob.

"Sure," agreed the other. "I ought to know. The hotels and time tables alone are enough to kill. Who do you suppose makes up train schedules? They don't seem to think no respectable train ought to leave anywhere before eleven-fifty p. m., or arrive after six a. m. We played Ottumwa, Ia., last night, and here we are jumpin' to Illinois."

In surprise Emma McChesney turned at the door for another look at the hair, figure, complexion and kimono.

"Oh, you're an actress! Well, if you think mine is a hard life for a woman, why—"

"Me!" said the green-gold blonde, and laughed not prettily. "I ain't a woman. I'm a queen of burlesque."

"Burlesque? You mean one of those—" Emma McChesney stopped, her usually deft tongue floundering.

"One of those 'men only' troupes? You guessed it. I'm Blanche LeHaye, of the Sam Levin Crackerjack Belles. We get into North Bend at six tomorrow morning, and we play there tomorrow night, Sunday." She took a step forward so that her haggard face and artificially tinted hair were very near Emma McChesney. "Know what I was thinkin' just one second before you come out here?"

"No; what?"

"I was thinkin' what a cinch it would be to just push aside that canvas thing there by the steps and try what the newspaper accounts call 'jumping into the night.' Say, if I'd had on my other lawnjerie I'll bet I'd have done it."

Into Emma McChesney's understanding heart there swept a wave of pity. But she answered lightly: "Is that supposed to be funny?"

The plump blonde yawned. "It depends on your funny bone. Mine's got blunted. I'm the lady that the Irish comedy guy slaps in the face with a bunch of lettuce. Say, there's something about you that makes a person get gabby and tell things. You'd make a swell clairvoyant."

Beneath the comedy of the bleached hair, and the flaccid face, and the bizarre wrapper; behind the coarseness and vulgarity and ignorance, Emma McChesney's keen mental eye saw something decent and clean and beautiful. And something pitiable, and something tragic.

"I guess you'd better come in and get some sleep," said Emma McChesney; and somehow found her hand resting on the woman's shoulder. So they stood, on the swaying, jolting platform. Blanche LeHaye, of the Sam Levin Crackerjack Belles, looked down, askance, at the hand on her shoulder, as at some strange and interesting object.

"Ten years ago," she said, "that would have started me telling the story of my life, with all the tremolo stops on, and the orchestra in tears. Now it only makes me mad."

Emma McChesney's hand seemed to snatch itself away from the woman's shoulder.

"You can't treat me with your life's history. I'm going in."

"Wait a minute. Don't go away sore, kid. On the square, I guess I liked the feel of your hand on my arm, like that. Say, I've done the same thing myself to a strange dog that looked up at me, pitiful. You know, the way you reach down and pat 'm on the head, and say, 'Nice doggie, nice doggie, old fellow,' even if it is a street cur, with a chawed ear, and no tail. They growl and show their teeth, but they like it. A woman—Lordy! There comes the brakeman. Let's beat it. Ain't we the nervy old hens!"

The female of the species as she is found in sleeping-car dressing-rooms had taught Emma McChesney to rise betimes that she might avoid contact with certain frowsy, shapeless beings armed with bottles of milky liquids, and boxes of rosy pastes, and pencils that made arched and inky lines; beings redolent of bitter almond, and violet toilet water; beings in doubtful corsets and green silk petticoats perfect as to accordion-plaited flounce, but showing slits and tatters farther up; beings jealously guarding their ten inches of mirror space and consenting to move for no one; ladies who had come all the way from Texas and who insisted on telling about it, despite a mouthful of hairpins; doubtful sisters who called one dearie and required to be hooked up; distracted mothers with three small children who wiped their hands on your shirt waist.

So it was that Emma McChesney, hatted and veiled by 5:45, saw the curtains of the berth opposite rent asunder to disclose the rumpled, shapeless figure of Miss Blanche LeHaye. The queen of burlesque bore in her arms a conglomerate mass of shoes, corset, purple skirt, bag and green-plumed hat. She paused to stare at Emma McChesney's trim, cool preparedness.

"You must have started to dress as soon's you come in last night. I never slep' a wink till just about half a hour ago. I bet I ain't got more than eleven minutes to dress in. Ain't this a scorcher!"

When the train stopped at North Bend, Emma McChesney, on her way out, collided with a vision in a pongee duster, rose-colored chiffon veil, chamois gloves, and plumed hat. Miss Blanche LeHaye had made the most of her eleven minutes. Her baggage attended to, Emma McChesney climbed into a hotel bus. It bore no other passengers. From her corner in the vehicle she could see the queen of burlesque standing in the center of the depot platform, surrounded by her company. It was a tawdry, miserable, almost tragic group, the men under-sized, bediamonded, their skulls oddly shaped, their clothes a satire on the fashions for men, their chins unshaven, their loose lips curved contentedly over cigarettes; the women dreadfully unreal with the pitiless light of the early morning sun glaring down on their bedizened faces, their spotted, garish cloths, their run-down heels, their vivid veils, their matted hair. They were quarreling among themselves, and a flame of hate for the moment lighted up those dull, stupid, vicious faces. Blanche LeHaye appeared to be the center about which the strife waged, for suddenly she flung through the shrill group and walked swiftly over to the bus and climbed into it heavily. One of the women turned, her face livid beneath the paint, to scream a great oath after her. The bus driver climbed into his seat and took up the reins. After a moment's indecision the little group on the platform turned and trailed off down the street, the women sagging under the weight of their bags, the men, for the most part, hurrying on ahead. When the bus lurched past them the woman who had screamed the oath after Blanche LeHaye laughed shrilly and made a face, like a naughty child, whereupon the others laughed in falsetto chorus.

A touch of real color showed in Blanche LeHaye's flabby cheek. "I'll show'm," she snarled. "I'll show'm I ain't no dead one yet. That hussy of a Zella Dacre thinkin' she can get my part away from me when I ain't lookin'. I wised she was gettin' too sweet to me the last week or so, the lyin' sneak. I'll show'm a leadin' lady's a leadin' lady. Let 'em go to their hash hotels. I'm goin' to the real inn in this town just to let 'em know that I got my dignity to keep up, and that I don't have to mix in with scum like that. You see that there?" She pointed at something in the street. Emma McChesney turned to look. The cheap lithographs of the Sam Levin Crackerjack Belles company glared at one from the bill-boards.

"That's our paper," explained Blanche LeHaye. "That's me, in the center of the bunch, with the pink reins in my hands, drivin' that four-in-hand of Johnnies. Hot stuff! Just let Dacre try to get it away from me, that's all. I'll show'm."

She sank back into her corner. Her anger left her with the suddenness characteristic of her type.

"Ain't this heat fierce?" she fretted.

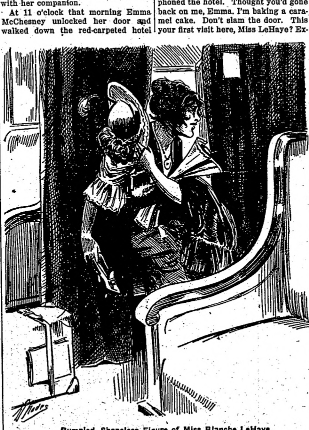
Now, Emma McChesney was a broad-minded woman. The scars that she had received in her ten years' battle with business reminded her to be tender at sight of the wounds of others. But now, as she studied the woman huddled there in the corner, she was conscious of a shuddering disgust of her—of the soiled blouse, of the cheap finery, of the sunken places around the jaw-bone, of the swollen places beneath the eyes, of the thin, carmined lips, of the—

Blanche LeHaye opened her eyes suddenly and caught the look on Emma McChesney's face. Caught it, and comprehended it. Her eyes narrowed, and she laughed shortly.

"Oh, I dunno," drawled Blanche LeHaye. "I wouldn't go's far's that, kid. Say, when I was your age I didn't plan to be no bum burlesquer neither. I was going to be an actress, with a farm on Long Island, like the rest of 'em. Every real actress has got a farm on Long Island, if it's only there in the mind of the press agent. It's a kind of a religion with 'em. I was goin' to build a house on mine that was goin' to be a cross between a California bungalow and the horticultural building at the world's fair. Say, I ain't the worst, kid. There's others outside of my smear, understand, that I wouldn't change places with."

A dozen apologies surged to Emma McChesney's lips just as the driver drew up at the curbing outside the hotel and jumped down to open the door. She found herself hoping that the hotel clerk would not class her with her companion.

At 11 o'clock that morning Emma McChesney unlocked her door and walked down the red-carpeted hotel corridor. She had had two hours of restful sleep. She had bathed, and breakfasted, and donned clean clothes. She had brushed the cinders out of her hair, and manicured. She felt as alert, and cool and refreshed as she looked, which speaks well for her comfort.



Rumpled, Shapeless Figure of Miss Blanche LeHaye.

Halfway down the hall a bedroom door stood open. Emma McChesney glanced in. What she saw made her stop. The next moment she would have hurried on, but the figure within called out to her.

Miss Blanche LeHaye had got into her kimono again. She was slumped in a dejected heap in a chair before the window. There was a tray, with a bottle and some glasses on the table by her side.

"Gawd, ain't it hot!" she whined miserably. "Come on in a minute. I left the door open to catch the breeze, but there ain't any. You look like a peach just off the ice. Got a gent friend in town?"

"No," answered Emma McChesney hurriedly, and turned to go.

"Wait a minute," said Blanche LeHaye, sharply, and rose. She slouched over to where Emma McChesney stood and looked up at her sullenly.

"Why!" gasped Emma McChesney, and involuntarily put out her hand, "why—my dear—you've been crying! Is there—"

"No, there ain't. I can bawl, can't I, if I am a bum burlesquer?" She put down the squat little glass she had in her hand and stared resentfully at Emma McChesney's cool, fragrant freshness.

"Say," she demanded suddenly, "whatja mean by lookin' at me the way you did this morning, h'm? Whatja mean? You got a nerve turnin' up your nose at me, you have. I'll just bet you ain't no better than you might be, neither. What the—"

Swiftly Emma McChesney crossed the room and closed the door. Then she came back to where Blanche LeHaye stood.

"Now listen to me," she said. "You shed that purple kimono of yours and hustle into some clothes and come along with me. I mean it. Whenever I'm anywhere near this town I make a jump and Sunday here. I've a friend here named Morrissey—Ethel Morrissey—and she's the biggest-hearted, most understanding friend that a woman ever had. She's skirt and suit buyer at Barker & Fisk's here. I have a standing invitation to spend Sunday at her house. She knows I'm coming. I help get dinner if I feel like it, and wash my hair if I want to, and sit out in the back yard, and fool with the dog, and act like a human being for one day. After you've been on the road for ten years a real Sunday dinner in a real home has got Sherry's flossiest efforts looking like a picnic collation with ants in the pie. You're coming with me, more for my sake than for yours, because the thought of you sitting here, like this, would sour the day for me."

Blanche LeHaye's fingers were picking at the pin which fastened her gown. She smiled, uncertainly.

"What's your game?" she inquired.

"I'll wait for you downstairs," said Emma McChesney, pleasantly. "Do you ever have any luck with caramel icing? Ethel's and mine always curdles."

"Do I?" yelled the queen of burlesque. "I invented it." And she was down on her knees, her fingers fumbling with the lock of her suitcase.

Only an Ethel Morrissey, inured to the weird workings of humanity by years of shrewd skirt and suit buying, could have stood the test of having a Blanche LeHaye thrust upon her, an unexpected guest, and with the woman across the street sitting on her front porch taking it all in.

At the door—"This is Miss Blanche LeHaye of the—er—Simon—"

"Sam Levin Crackerjack Belles," put in Miss LeHaye. "Pleased to meet you."

"Come in," said Miss Ethel Morrissey, without batting an eye. "I just phoned the hotel. Thought you'd gone back on me, Emma. I'm baking a caramel cake. Don't slam the door. This your first visit here, Miss LeHaye? Excuse me for not shaking hands. I'm all flour. Lay your things in there. Ma's spending the day with Aunt Gus at Forest City and I'm the whole works around here. It's got skirts and suits beat a mile. Hot, ain't it? Say, suppose you girls slip off your waists and I'll give you each an all-over apron that's loose and lets the breeze slide around."

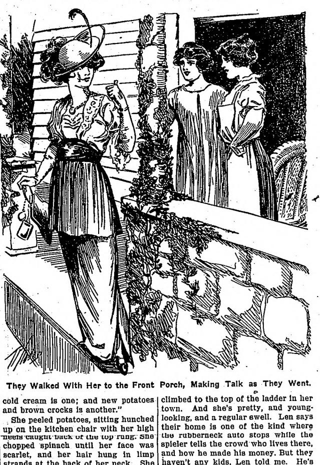
Blanche LeHaye, the garrulous, was strangely silent. When she stepped about it was in the manner of one who is fearful of wakening a sleeper. When she caught the eyes of either of the other women her own glance dropped.

When Ethel Morrissey came in with the blue-and-white gingham aprons Blanche LeHaye hesitated a long minute before picking hers up. Then she held it by both sleeves and looked at it long and curiously. When she looked up again she found the eyes of the other two upon her. She slipped the apron over her head with a nervous little laugh.

"I've been a pair of pink tights so long," she said, "that I guess I've almost forgotten how to be a woman. But once I get this on I'll bet I can come back."

She proved it from the moment that she measured out the first cupful of brown sugar for the caramel icing. She shed her rings, and pinned her hair back from her forehead, and tucked up her sleeves, and as Emma McChesney watched her a resolve grew in her mind.

The cake disposed of—"Give me some potatoes to peel, will you?" said Blanche LeHaye, suddenly. "Give 'em to me in a brown crock, with a chip out of the side. There's certain things always goes hand-in-hand in your mind. You can't think of one without the other. Now, Lillian Russell and cold cream is one; and new potatoes and brown crocks is another."



They Walked With Her to the Front Porch, Making Talk as They Went.

She peeled potatoes, sitting hunched up on the kitchen chair with her high heels caught back of the top rung. She chopped spinach until her face was scarlet, and her hair hung in limp strands at the back of her neck. She skinned tomatoes. She scoured pans. She wiped up the white oilcloth tabletop with a capable and soapy hand. The heat and bustle of the little kitchen seemed to work some miraculous change in her. Her eyes brightened. Her lips smiled. Once, Emma McChesney and Ethel Morrissey exchanged covert looks when they heard her crooning one of those tuneless chants that women hum when they wring out dishcloths in soapy water.

After dinner, in the cool of the sitting-room, with the shades drawn, and their skirts tucked halfway to their knees, things looked propitious for that first stroke in the plan which had worked itself out in Emma McChesney's alert mind. She caught Blanche LeHaye's eye, and smiled.

"This beats burlesquing, doesn't it?" she said. She leaned forward a bit in her chair. "Tell me, Miss LeHaye, haven't you ever thought of quitting that—the stage—and turning to something—something—"

"Something decent?" Blanche LeHaye finished for her. "I used to. I've got over that. Now all I ask is to get a laugh when I kick the comedian's hat off with my toe."

"But there must have been a time—" insinuated Emma McChesney, gently.

Blanche LeHaye grinned broadly at the two women who were watching her so intently.

"I think I ought to tell you," she began, "that I never was a minister's daughter, and I don't remember ever havin' been deserted by my sweetheart when I was young and trusting. If I was to draw a picture of my life it would look like one of those charts that the weather bureau gets out—one of those high and low barometer things, all uphill and downhill like a chain of mountains in a kid's geography."

She shut her eyes and lay back in the depths of the leather-cushioned chair. The three sat in silence for a moment.

"Look here," said Emma McChesney, suddenly, rising and coming over to the woman in the big chair, "that's not the life for a woman like you. I can get you a place in our office—not much, perhaps, but something decent—something to start with. If you—"

"For that matter," put in Ethel Morrissey, quickly, "I could get you something right here in our store. I've been there long enough to have some say-so, and if I recommend you they'd start you in the basement at first, and then, if you made good, they'd advance you right along."

Blanche LeHaye stood up and, twisting her arm around at the back, began to unbutton her gingham apron.

"I guess you think I'm a bad one, don't you? Well, maybe I am. But I'm not the worst. I've got a brother. He lives out West, and he's rich, and married, and respectable. You know the way a man can climb out of the mud, while a woman just can wade out of it? Well, that's the way it was with us. His wife's a regular society bug. She wouldn't admit that there was any such truck as me, unless, maybe, the Municipal Protective league, or something, of her town, got to waging a war against burlesque shows. I hadn't seen Len—that's my brother—in years and years. Then one night in Omaha, I glimmed him sitting down in the B. H. row. His face just seemed to rise up at me out of the audience. He recognized me, too. Say, men are all alike. What they see in a dingy, half-fed, ignorant bunch like us, I don't know. But the minute a man goes to Cleveland, or Pittsburgh, or somewhere on business he'll hunt up a burlesque show, and what's more, he'll enjoy it. Funny. Well, Len waited for me after the show, and we had a talk. He told me his troubles, and I told him some of mine, and when we got through I wouldn't have swapped with him. His wife's a wonder. She's climbed to the top of the ladder in her town. And she's pretty, and young-looking, and a regular swell. Len says their home is one of the kind where the rubberneck auto stops while the spieler tells the crowd who lives there, and how he made his money. But they haven't any kids, Len told me. He's crazy about 'em. But his wife don't want any. I wish you could have seen Len's face when he was talking about it."

She dropped the gingham apron in a circle at her feet, and stepped out of it. She walked over to where her own clothes lay in a gaudy heap.

"Exit the gingham. But it's been great." She paused before slipping her skirt over her head. The silence of the other two women seemed to anger her a little.

"I guess you think I'm a bad one, clear through, don't you? Well, I ain't. I don't hurt anybody but myself. Len's wife—that's what I call bad."

"But I don't think you're bad clear through," cried Emma McChesney. "I don't. That's why I made that proposition to you. That's why I want you to get away from all this, and start over again."

"Me?" laughed Blanche LeHaye. "Me! In a office! With ledgers, and sale bills, and accounts, and all that stuff! Why, girls, I couldn't hold down a job in a candy factory. I ain't got any intelligence. I never had. You don't find women with brains in a burlesque troupe. If they had 'em they wouldn't be there. Why, we're the dumbest, most ignorant bunch there is. Most of us are just hired girls, dressed up. That's why you find the Woman's Uplift union having such a blamed hard time savin' souls. The souls they try to save know just enough to be wise to the fact that they couldn't hold down a five-per-week job. Don't you feel sorry for me. I'm doing the only thing I'm good for."

Emma McChesney put out her hand. "I'm sorry," she said. "I only meant it for—"

"Why, of course," agreed Blanche LeHaye, heartily. "And you, too." She turned so that her broad, good-natured smile included Ethel Morrissey. "I've had a whale of a time. My fingers are all stained up with new potatoes, and my nails is full of strawberry juice, and I hope it won't come off for a week. And I want to thank you both. I'd like to stay, but I'm going to hump over to the theater. That Dacre's got the nerve to swipe the star's dressing-room if I don't get my trunks in first."

They walked with her to the front porch, making talk as they went. Resentment and discomfiture and a sort of admiration all played across the faces of the two women, whose kindness had met with rebuff. At the foot of the steps Blanche LeHaye, prima donna of the Sam Levin Crackerjack Belles turned.

"Oh, say," she called. "I almost forgot. I want to tell you that if you wait until your caramel is off the stove, and then add your butter, when the stuff's hot but not boilin' it won't lump so. H'm? Don't mention it."

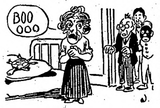
Woman Mourns Pet Tortoise, Strangled to Death

NEW YORK.—At Bretton hall an elderly woman has resided for several years. She never leaves her apartment, except for a daily ride in the park. At three o'clock each afternoon, the weather permitting, her victoria is announced, and shortly thereafter she may be seen with her maid emerging from the elevator and making her way through the Eighty-sixth street entrance of the hotel to her carriage. All of her business with the hotel office is carried on by means of the maid.



Returning from her drive the other day, she went directly to her apartment, as usual. A few minutes later a negro bellboy came tearing madly down the back stairs to the desk.

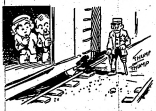
"Send Doctor Johnsing, quick, dair's sumbody daid. De lady's up in de hall wringin' her hands an' de maid's wus'n her!" The room clerk immediately summoned the house physician, and hurried to investigate. He found the elderly woman standing by her bed and weeping violently.

On the bed, lying on a silk sofa pillow, were the mortal remains of a small tortoise. In came the bellboy with the physician and the hotel manager.

"Oh, doctor! The poor little thing is dead, and I alone am to blame," the owner of the departed reptile exclaimed. "Instead of placing him in his cage when I went out, as I usually do, I left him sleeping on his pillow, not thinking he might wake up and become restless in my absence. When I returned I found him over under the dresser dead."

Thump of an Officer's Wooden Leg Dispels Dream

DETROIT, MICH.—It was the thump, thump, thump of the wooden leg of a railroad detective that furnished the thrills of romance which pretty Eva Pope, only fourteen years old, ran away from home in boy's clothes to find.



Eva was as romantic a little girl as ever lay in her bed nights reading Laura Jean Libbey long after her parents thought her deep in slumber. She was always hoping something exciting would happen to her, but somehow no fairy prince came her way until just a little while ago. Then came Leo Kelland, eighteen years old.

Leo wasn't much of a fairy prince, but he had led a wild, wicked life and, Othello-like, won her heart by tales of his exploits.

So they eloped. They made it as exciting as possible. Eva dressed herself in boy's clothes and, with Leo, boarded a freight train to Toledo. They got there in the evening and decided to make the box car their home for the night. Eva was sleeping—dreaming rosy dreams of romance come true when there entered into her dreams a thump, thump, thumping. She awoke Leo, who peered from the box car and saw a railroad detective with a wooden leg coming along the ties, peering into each car.

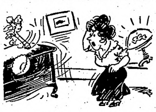
Her heart in her mouth, Eva followed Leo out of the door of the car on the side away from the detective. But she stumbled, gave a little scream, and sank breathless on the tracks. Leo stayed by her—to his credit, be it said.

And then the wooden-legged detective came up to her and poked a long black revolver in her face. He asked the pair many questions, but finally let them go with a warning to stay out of the railroad yards.

The next day, on queries from the Detroit police, the two were arrested.

Dancing House Causes a Husband to Leave Home

CHICAGO.—A house that dances around so it never is in the same place twice in two minutes is unusual. But Mrs. W. F. Scott of Oak Park complained the other day that she has to live in one. These are the results:



All the clocks in the house stop.

Little sleep in two years.

Cut glass bouncing off sideboards to the floor.

A clatter and clash of breaking bric-a-brac day and night.

AND—

All these troubles Mrs. Scott blames on the Chicago and West Towns railroad for not keeping its tracks in repair. She appeared before the village board and demanded that the road be ordered to nail down the rattling and banging rails which she declares are responsible for the constant vibration of her residence.

"It has made me so nervous that my husband left me and I am practically a widow," she said. "I could not blame him for not being able to live with a woman driven frantic by such diabolical things.

"The house rattles so that for two years I have been in constant dread that it would fall down on me.

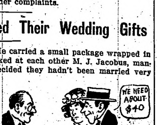
"One by one my cut glass dishes leaped off the sideboard and were smashed on the floor.

"It shakes the beds so that I have not had a decent sleep in two years and sometimes I have to hold on to the mattress to keep from being tossed out on the floor."

The board promised to investigate her complaints.

Texas Newlyweds Pawned Their Wedding Gifts

DALLAS, TEX.—She was blushing. He carried a small package wrapped in a newspaper. By the way they looked at each other M. J. Jacobus, manager of the Provident Loan society, decided they hadn't been married very long. And they hadn't. Outside the door of the society's headquarters they hesitated, then entered and stepped up to the counter.



"I want to borrow a little money," said the man with the package, "on this." And he unrolled the covering.

There were silver knives, forks and spoons, marked with initials.

"These are our wedding gifts," explained the man, "and we're hard up. I—well, the rent is due, and we can't make it."

Jacobus asked what he wanted. "About forty dollars will be enough, won't it?" He turned to the girl. Her brows wrinkled and she counted imaginary sums on her pink fingers.

"Yes," she agreed, "but when can we pay it back?"

Jacobus explained the installment plan of the society.

The couple agreed the six months' term would clear the debt.

"Wait a moment," said the girl; "let me see those things."

Blushing, she picked out a tiny spoon with a plain handle. With a quick glance at her husband she slipped it in his pocket. He laughed a little and then kissed her right in front of Jacobus.

"That spoon won't make any difference in the pledge, will it?" he asked.

"On the contrary," he replied, "I consider the security better than ever."

IN CHARGE OF BRITISH TROOP TRAINS

An American railroad man is directing the work of transporting British troops on the Great Eastern railway in England. He is Henry W. Thornton, who went from New York recently to take charge of the affairs of the Great Eastern.

In a letter to George D. Blau of New Castle, Pa., he writes:

"It is a wonderful but terrible experience for me. Terrible, not that we are in danger personally, but because it is pathetic to see the chap you dined gayly with last night, pick up his rifle, kiss his family good-by and calmly join his colors.

"The railways of England have been taken over by the government, but are operated by the existing staff and men. An executive committee of general managers acts as a medium between the war office and the roads and issues the necessary instructions for movements. We have worked out all our mobilization schedules and are now in the thick of the moving of the troops. We are doing our job on the Great Eastern splendidly, and I am proud of my gang. They are up on their toes and act like a bunch of Americans. The entire outfit is pulling like one man.

"I saw the German ambassador off yesterday. He is Prince Lichnowsky. The princess, his suite and about two hundred Germans accompanied him. It was a pathetic and historical sight. Many people were on hand. The ambassador and the princess arrived by motor. They passed between the rows of people to the platform, where the train started in absolute silence. There was not a hiss or 'boo.' Not a foot moved. There was nothing but a deadly, uncanny silence."

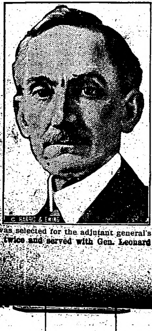
Hon. Myron T. Herrick, American ambassador to France at the time of the outbreak of the war, though he has been joined during the past week by his successor, whose appointment was made previous to the start of hostilities, was the only diplomat to remain in Paris after the French government removed its headquarters to Bordeaux. Mr. Herrick has been requested by the United States government to remain at the Paris embassy for a time, until his successor can get the run of affairs, and he has consented to do so, believing he can best serve the interests of the United States by remaining and looking after the welfare of Americans. Many banking institutions which have the money of Americans on deposit would have transferred their cash if he had not remained. In the event of the surrender of Paris Mr. Herrick, as the representative of the most powerful neutral power, will be of great help to the French. At present he is handling the affairs there of Great Britain, Russia, Germany, Austria, Servia and Japan. With him now in Paris are William G. Sharp, the new ambassador, and Robert Bacon, the former ambassador. Mrs. Herrick is also remaining with him in Paris. She has been ill, but according to recent dispatches is recovering. Mrs. Herrick is a native of Dayton, Ohio.

NATURAL BORN FIGHTING MAN

Winston Churchill, first lord of the British admiralty, has all the stamp of genius and high daring, and has crowded more into his forty years than any man of his day. He has been through five wars; he has written seven books, one of them being the biography of his father, which ranks among the first half-dozen in the English language; he was first elected to the house of commons as a Conservative, but has been a Liberal minister of the crown for nearly nine years, and he has proved himself one of the most active and powerful as well as sagacious and farseeing of modern English statesmen. He has journeyed in most parts of the world, spent long months in the saddle, and yet by some process that must be called genius combines the literary style of a ripe scholar with tho voracious habits of a man of action. This country he knows well, both by reason of his relationships and his visits here, especially his lecture tours which he undertook after the Boer war when at about the age of twenty-eight.

The key to his character is that he is a soldier. He is a natural born fighting man. He is a true Churchill, very different from his cousin, the present duke of Marlborough, whose heir to the dukedom he was until the birth of the two sons of the present duchess, still remembered as Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt.

NEW ADJUTANT GENERAL'S RECORD

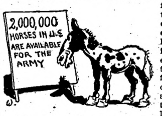


Gen. Henry P. McCain, the new head of the adjutant general's department of the United States army, has had rather an interesting experience. He was an infantry officer and was serving in Alaska when the Spanish war began. He was sent on the first expedition to the Philippines, and had only engaged in the first brush the troops had in the islands when he fell sick of the fever that affected so many of the Americans when they first went to the tropics. He was invalided home, and had concluded that his army career was over, as he saw little hope of promotion in the future. Then congress passed a law which provided that appointments to the adjutant and inspector general's departments should be by competitive examination. As they say at West Point and Annapolis, McCain began to "bone" for that examination. Being a student, and having been taught how to study at West Point, he was able to pass the best examination and was selected for the adjutant general's corps. He has been to the Philippines twice and served with Gen. Leonard Wood in fighting the Moros.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Horses Are Still Available for Army Purposes

WASHINGTON.—At the time of sending troops into Mexico for the holding of Vera Cruz, the cavalry branch of the army of the United States comprised 15 regiments, with a total of officers and enlisted men reaching nearly fifteen thousand men. Every one of these men, of course, has to be mounted. A large number of infantry officers also require horses. And the horses needed for the artillery service foot up to a big figure. The total enlisted strength prior to the occupation of Vera Cruz was about eighty-five thousand men, and for all branches of the service, including the hospital attendants, it is likely that at least twenty thousand horses were regularly required.



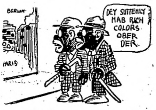
2,000,000 HORSES IN U.S. ARE AVAILABLE FOR THE ARMY

Now, with 20,000 horses, the mortality percentage must be constantly reckoned with. In fact, it is more certain than the mortality of the soldier himself. A horse cannot be buoyed up by enthusiasm, and when it's feed time a promise is of no value to him. So when the Mexico cloud came up one of the busy clerks of the war department was at once the horse arithmetician.

Uncle Sam's last census gave approximately as the horse population of the United States 20,567,000. The army arithmetician juggling with percentages sees that in time of absolute peace the army needs only one horse in every 1,000 in the country. But as every one of the horses listed is not the sort of horse for army purposes, nothing positive can be set down. Some army men have estimated that the total available horse population for army purposes can be set at about two million animals. This would make the draft on the number for use in time of peace, or as the army was before the occupation of Vera Cruz, one horse in every 100.

What the "Major Generals" Thought of a War Map

SHORTLY after a war map was put up by a local newspaper a couple of elderly darkies ambled by. They squinted at the map for a minute or more, fixing their eyes on the red and black disks that represent the allies and the Germans.



BERLIN
PARIS
DEY SUTTENLY HAB RICH COLORS OBER DER.

"What is dat?" inquired the first brother after a survey of the map.

"Dat," replied the second, "is "Yourope."

"Lawd!" said the first, "you don't say so."

He paused a moment reflectively. Then he summed up his thoughts.

"Alfred," he said to his companion, "dey certainly does have rich colors over thar, don't dey?"

Red disks (the allies) were pinned in a circle around Paris to indicate the army of defense there. One of those tacticians with whom Washington is so plentifully blessed drifted up to the map and his attention became instantly riveted on this circle. Clearly he was thinking, deeply and earnestly, for, like all of the city's major generals, he hated to see the leaders of the armies make mistakes.

Finally his voice rose, complainingly, as he addressed the world at large.

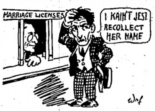
"No wonder they're getting beat," he said. "If they'd quit playing ring-a-round-a-rosy and go out and fight they'd git somewhere."

There are realists in the crowd. One of them stood for about two hours in front of the map, working out the problems of war with all the intensity of a field marshal. He had just marched across the Mons river and was getting along finely when one of the black disks attached to the map fell to the sidewalk. The realist looked up in disgust.

"Good night," said the realist. "There goes another army corps." Then he walked away.

Recalls Middle Initial and Guesses the Rest

DAN CUPID'S contempt for obstacles, little or big, was exemplified the other day when Richard B. Sutherland, twenty-four years old, of Tampa, Fla., obtained a marriage license after confessing that for the life of him he could not recall the first name of his sweetheart. He appeared not to be nervous, and was in full possession of his faculties, but the name refused to come into his mind despite long and serious cogitation.



MARRIAGE LICENSES
I KAIN'T JES' RECOLLECT HER NAME

The acting marriage license clerk, Mr. Dertzbaugh, was astonished when in response to his inquiry for the name of the bride-to-be for the record Mr. Sutherland had no answer.

"Cannot you think of the name?" asked the clerk. The applicant had to confess that he could not stimulate his memory to that extent.

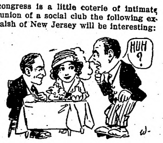
"I am sure her middle initial is E," he said, "and I think the first name is Mary."

Since the applicant was willing to take a license to marry "Mary" E. Tinder and run the risk of returning for a correction of the record, Mr. Dertzbaugh made out the necessary paper, reciting the age of "Mary" as twenty-one years and giving her residence as Tampa, Fla.

The clerk is awaiting with interest the return of the officiating clergyman to see what was the real name of the bride.

Is Doing Some Representing in Congress Himself

TO THE layman who thinks that congress is a little coterie of intimate souls who daily meet in the close union of a social club the following experience of Representative Allan B. Walsh of New Jersey will be interesting:



"I was taking luncheon with some friends in the house restaurant the other day," said he, "when at a table across the room I noted a young man, accompanied by a young woman, who, from the manner in which he looked over toward me, and finally bowed with a smile, evidently knew me.

"I returned the salutation, of course, and, as his face was familiar, I arose and made my way to his table, thinking that he was probably a constituent of mine on a visit to the capitol. 'Pardon me,' I said, as we shook hands warmly, 'but, although your face is very familiar, I cannot place you just now. I am Representative Walsh from New Jersey, and if you are from my district I shall be charmed to show you and your wife any attention in my power while you are in Washington.'

"'What district do you represent?' queried the man with a quizzical smile, while the eyes of his wife danced merrily.

"'The Fourth district of New Jersey,' I replied.

"'I hardly think I'm from your district,' returned the man, whimsically. 'You see my name's Fred Britten and I do some representing in congress myself—the Ninth district of Illinois!'"

ANTWERP OCCUPIED, TEUTONS ARE MARCHING ON OSTEND

GERMANS PUSHED BACK AT SEVERAL POINTS, ALLIES SAY

ASSERTED TEUTONS ARE DRIVEN BACK TEN MILES AT ARRAS, LOSING TWELVE THOUSAND MEN.

FINE OF $100,000,000 IS IMPOSED ON ANTWERP

Asserted Germans Have Levied Enormous Sum as a War Indemnity—Teutons Claim Great Quantity of Supplies Taken With Capture of Antwerp.

By International News Service.

London, Oct. 13.—The Germans, cheated of their chance of cutting off the retreating Belgian and British army of defense in its flight from Antwerp by the severe check administered in the surprise attack by Franco-British forces at Quatrecht, near Termonde, are now advancing rapidly on Ostend in the hope of capturing King Albert and the entire Belgian government.

Belgian Army at Ostend.

The Belgian field army, assisted valiantly by large detachments of British cavalry and infantry and the British naval brigade which eluded the German flanking movement near Selzeate, has made good its orderly retreat and the main body has succeeded in reaching Ostend safely and intact. It is now in a position to effect a consolidation with the allies. As soon as this junction is a fact the Belgians, the British and the French will form a new battle line to the south and east of Ostend.

Refugees Flock to Ostend.

Refugees from Bruges and Eecloo, including many women and children, are flocking into Ostend fearful of the coming of the Germans. They report large bodies of Uhlans scouting in the vicinity of these two cities and spreading terror as they advance.

Berlin dispatches report that the 200,000 troops who formed the besieging army before Antwerp, together with the heavy artillery used in the bombardment, will be immediately transported to France and that Antwerp will be made to serve as a base for a new campaign against England in which mines and submarines will play an important part.

These dispatches also state that the headquarters of the German general staff officially announces the capture of Antwerp and adds that they cannot estimate the number of prisoners taken.

Enormous Supplies Taken.

"We took enormous quantities of supplies of all kinds," says the official German statement, "that the German military commander of Antwerp has warned the people against committing overt acts against the Germans, which will be punished according to the laws of war, and," he adds, "may lead to the demolition of your beautiful city."

Personal protection and immunity from property loss are promised those who abstain from hostile acts.

Enormous War Fine.

Germany has, it is reported, imposed a fine of £20,000,000 ($100,000,000) on Antwerp as war indemnity.

The losses sustained by the Germans in the battle near Termonde, where they were forced to cross the Scheldt under heavy fire, were enormous. This is probably the first instance since the beginning of the war in which a surprise attack has been carried to a successful conclusion. The presence of the French and British allies in great force in this vicinity has been successfully hidden, even from the scouting aviators.

May Threaten Holland.

It is reported here that Germany is preparing to force its war demands against Holland and that it will lay claim to the mouth of the Scheldt on the ground that it is necessary as an emergency war measure against Great Britain. The Scheldt, which makes Antwerp one of the greatest ports in the world, is a neutral waterway because of the fact that it flows throuhg Holland to the North Sea.

Holland has an army of 250,000 men on the active list, with a reserve force of 100,000, which it can call upon to enforce its demand that its neutrality be respected. Utilization of the Scheldt for war purposes may draw Holland into the conflict.

Claim 12,000 German Prisoners.

London, Oct. 13.—A dispatch from France to the Daily Mail says that the Germans have been driven back ten miles and have lost 12,000 men in a fierce battle which has been raging at Arras since Friday.

The French Statement.

The French communication deals only with the battle, or rather series of battles, which have been in progress for four weeks from east to west in France with an ever extending line which now reaches northward from the elbow of Noyan to and across the Belgian border at Armentieres.

Allies Reported Holding.

The statement says that the allies have held their positions everywhere and that German cavalry, which was attempting to envelope the allies' left wing and had seized certain points of passage on the River Lys, to the east of Aire, was defeated and retired to the northeast into the Armentieres district.

At the same time, the Germans, it is claimed, delivered a vigorous attack on the right bank of the Ancre river, between Arras and the Oise, without making any progress.

Cavalry Range Large.

This indicates that the battle in Picardy, comprisong the department of the Somme and part of Oise, Pas De Calais and Aisne, in which the cavalry is participating on a scale not seen in previous modern wars, extends over a very considerable area. Here are many miles of open country, where horsemen can maneauver.

Between the river Oisne and Rheims and particularly in the region northwest of Soissons, where the British forces are entrenched, further progress has been made.

Apremont was taken by the Germans, but was retaken by the French and remains in their hands. The Germans apparently are determined to maintain as far as possible their positions here where they have pierced the line of fortifications between Verdun and Toul along the river Meuse. Should they be successful against the allies elsewhere, this doubtless would be the route by which they would endeavor to enter the heart of France.

Another Verdun Attack Likely.

A Berlin report says that the heavy German siege guns have ben sent to France. If this is so, probably the Verdun forts along the French frontier, which are hindering the German advance, are to be attacked with them. In this case, however, there is a big field army behind the forts, so that while the destruction of them would make progress easier for the German, it would not absolutely insure their advance.

Przemysl Likened to Antwerp.

London, Oct. 12.—The Przemysl fortress in Galicia, it is reported here, is undergoing a somewhat similar experience as the fortress at Antwerp for the siege there continues. The Russian ambassador at Rome, in a report, declares the whole town is on fire and that the capitulation of the stronghold is imminent.

Reported Russian Activities.

The Russians claim to have sent an army of invasion into Hungary, while another army is waiting for an attack of the Austro-German forces in Southwest Poland. A third Russian force is advancing towards Posen and Thorn, East Prussia, and General Rennenkampf's forces, which have done a lot of fighting since the war began, are trying to get into East Prussia.

Austrians Make Claims.

From the East Prussian frontier the only news received was from a Russian source which reported that the Russians had reached Lyck.

The Austrians claim to have driven the Russians from Hungary with immense casualties and that the Russians have been cleared from the greater portion of the Carpathians.

The Austrians also say they have forced the enemy out of Bosnia and that they have had successes here and there on the Drina. A Rome report has it that the Austrians are preparing to remove their capital from Vienna to Innsbruck.

Berlin Brands Story Lie.

Washington, Oct. 10.—The German embassy received the following wireless from Berlin:

"Official headquarters says that the report of an advance of Russian forces across the Niemen river in the district of Suwalki, Russia, is a lie. The battle took place near Augustowo, where the Germans, on Oct. 1 and 2, completely defeated two Russian army corps, made 3,500 unwounded prisoners, and took 20 guns, of which one was a heavy battery gun, and a number of machine guns. (Here part of the message was lost in transmission.)

Will Return Seat to Paris.

London.—The French government will return to Paris at once, according to the Paris correspondent of the Express, who makes this announcement on high authority. The visit of President Poincare to army headquarters is considered a good omen.

War 64 Days' Old.

The sixty-third day of the great European war has passed and no decisive conflict on land or sea has occurred. From Berlin and London came nothing in the way of German claims to progress or reverses.

Both in London and in Paris there is the greatest confidence, although some surprise is displayed at the success of the Germans in preventing the outflanking movement. There is a feeling, however, that the Germans cannot extend their lines much further north without weakening it at some point.

IMPORTANT DEVELOPMENTS

The Germans, cheated out of their attempt to cut off the retreating Belgian army by a surprise attack by Franco-British forces, are now marching on Ostend, where the allies, together with Belgians, are preparing to meet them.

German enveloping moment declared at a standstill in northwestern France. Uhlans driven back by French cavalry in the Armentieres region.

German aeroplanes again have made a dash over Paris, dropping bombs. Three persons were killed and 14 injured and considerable damage to property was done. One missile fell on the roof of the famous Notre Dame cathedral, but failed to explode. French airmen gave chase to the invaders, but whether they caught any of them is not known.

In the south the Montenegrins claim to have defeated with heavy losses an Austrian army operating against Sarajevo.

The Belgian legation at The Hague claims that a famine exists over a greater part of Belgium and that conditions in Brussels are serious. It is said that 600,000 Belgian refugees are now in Holland.

From the Far East Japan reports that they have silenced Forts Iltis at Kiao-Chow and otherwise are gaining ground on the Germans.

BIG BATTLE NORTH OF CRACOW

FIGHT RAGING ALONG VISTULA RIVER.

Russian and Austro-German Forces Begin Contest of Strategy That Has no Parallel.

Petrograd, Oct. 12.—The great battle between the Russians and Austro-German armies is in full swing along the Vistula river north of Cracow, according to reports received from the front. The war office is maintaining an unusual silence on the operations in that region of Russian Poland, but admits that great forces are engaged in conflict.

News of a raid by 10 Cossack regiments south of Tornow and southeast of Cracow indicates that the Russians are inaugurating a great flanking movement in Galicia that will force the Austro-German forces north of the Vistula to weaken the center of their line. Also advancing a large force to a point near Thorn, the big German fortress in East Prussia, the Russians are perfecting a wedge that is aimed to strike northwest and split the German forces in such a fashion that they will be unable to co-operate.

The Russians and German general staffs are now engaged in a battle of strategy that has had no parallel in history except the Manchurian campaign. There the Russians and Japanese had vast masses of men operating over a long battle front. In that campaign the Russian general staff was outpointed by the Japanese, but since that time there has been a vast change in the military system of Russia that promises better results.

On the Suwalki frontier the Germans are maintaining their positions on the west bank of the Rospuda river, but these are becoming untenable as a result of their trenches north and south of Bakalarzew being taken by bayonet charges. Both sides have suffered heavy losses.

SCORE OF BOMBS DROPPED ON PARIS; 4 KILLED, 20 HURT

GERMAN AVIATORS AGAIN MAKE DARING ATTACK ON FRENCH CAPITAL, DOING SLIGHT DAMAGE.

NOTRE DAME IS EVIDENTLY AIMED AT BY ONE AIRMAN

Paris, Oct. 12.—A score of bombs, launched on different quarters of Paris by two German aviators Sunday, killed four civilians and injured 20 others. The damage done to property was small.

The Various Attacks.

The airmen appeared soon after noon. One began the attack by dropping a bomb near the Northern railroad terminal, another in Rue St. Lazare and a third which landed at the rear of the Cathedral of Notre Dame. Three more bombs were hurled by the same airman in the vicinity of the Bourse. A house was set on fire, but the loss was not great.

One of the missiles struck within 100 yards of an office occupied by American newspaper men.

Attack on Cathedral.

The second aeroplane also flew over the cathedral, dropping four bombs, one alighting on the roof of the church, but failing to explode. A second fell in the square where the bishop's residence is located. A third struck the parapet of the Quai de Bourbon and glanced off into the Seine. The fourth disappeared in the Seine near the bridge of Notre Dame.

The second aeroplane appeared to aim at the cathedral, while the other machine attempted to hit the Northern & St. Lazare station.

Twenty Bombs Dropped.

Altogether 20 bombs fell. The Germans flew at a very low altitude. After they apparently had exhausted their supply of missiles French aeroplanes ascended and pursued them toward the east.

A pennant which was dropped at the same time as the bombs from the German airships Sunday bore the inscription in German:

"We have taken Antwerp; your turn will soon come."

Four persons were killed by the bombs and 20 injured, of whom 12 were women and girls.

Drops Bomb on Notre Dame.

London.—According to a late report of the aeroplane attack on Paris respondent, the bomb dropped on Notre Dame cathedral exploded and set fire to a beam in the roof.

JAPS CLAIM MORE PROGRESS

Assert Offensive Moves of Germans In Far East Are Unavailing—Sustain no Damage.

Tokio, Oct. 12.—The following official statement relative to the Japanese operations around Tsing-Tau, seat of government of the German concession of Kiao-Chow, was given out here:

"The German forts, warships and aeroplanes are trying vainly to arrest the Japanese advance. We are sustaining no damage.

"Japanese warships silenced Iltis fort and drove a warship out of range of their guns. Our aviators answered an unsuccessful attempt by German airmen on Japanese draggers by flying over Tsing-Tau and dropping bombs."

Seven Bishops in War.

Rome, Oct. 12.—According to reports received at the Vatican more than sixty-three thousand ecclesiastics are serving with the armies in the field, especially with the Belgian, French and Austrian forces. Most of these clergymen are engaged in hospital work. They include seven bishops and 19 other prelates.

Germans Occupy Courtrai.

London, Oct. 12.—The correspondent of the Times at Ostend reports that 5,000 Germans have occupied Courtrai, on the River Lys, 26 miles southwest of Ghent, and near the French border.

M'ADOO CRITICISES PLAN FOR FEDERAL AID FOR PLANTERS

SECRETARY OF TREASURY DECLARES SCHEME, TO BOLSTER COTTON CROP IS NOT FEASIBLE.

ASSERTS OTHER SUFFERING INDUSTRIES AS DESERVING

Democratic Policy of "Equal Rights to All, Special Privileges to None" Involved, Cabinet Official Holds in His Letter to Congressman Henry.

Washington, Oct. 12.—The plan for direct federal aid to cotton growers to the extent of $400,000,000 was the subject of sharp criticism in a letter to Representative Henry of Texas, made public by Secretary McAdoo. The letter is in reply to recent statements to the house by Mr. Henry.

Calls Scheme Impractical.

Mr. McAdoo announces that the proposal to sell $250,000,000 of Panama canal bonds to bolster the cotton crop is not practicable. He calls atention to the fact that those who deal in tobacco, naval stores, copper, silver and other commodities, have sought government aid.

"If we disregard every suffering interest except cotton," he said, "and make it the sole beneficiary of government favor, what becomes of the Democratic principles of 'equal rights for all, special privileges to none'?

Would Have to Aid All.

"If we enter upon the course you suggest you must help every distressed industry impartially."

Representative Henry introduced in the house a compromise loan proposition which would reduce the proposed loan to $250,000,000.

While Mr. McAdoo was writing his letter, the committee of St. Louis jobbers and bankers, headed by F. J. Wade, was in conference with a committee of the federal reserve board, over the proposed $150,000,000 cotton loan fund to take care of the surplus cotton crop. No decision was reached.

Much Aid Already Extended.

Mr. McAdoo's letter to Mr. Henry went exhaustively into the aid so far extended by the treasury to national banks in the cotton states, showing that it has issued to them since the war begun $68,000,000 in currency; that its crop funds there amount to $11,337,000; that its regular deposits in the South total $16,065,000, and that there is available for southern banks in compliance with law, $151,000,000 more in additional national bank currency.

Inquiry Held Irretrievable.

"What is really wanted," said the letter, "is a restored market for cotton. The value of cotton has been injured this year by the European war. This injury cannot be retrieved nor the market restored by legislation any more than the injury to corn which was caused by drought last year in the great corn states of the West could have been repaired by legislation."

WILSON GETS GOOD REPORTS

Hears That Business Is Improving Generally—Democrats Will Use This as Campaign Argument.

Washington, Oct. 12.—Business conditions throughout the country are improving, according to reports reaching President Wilson and Democratic speakers are to be instructed to dwell on this fact during the fall campaigns in answer to the expected charges by Republicans and Progressives that the new tariff has brought financial disaster.

The president was informed many orders for American goods were being received from abroad and that the first bad effects of the European war on American industry had passed.

As a part of the Democratic campaign, the president probably will issue a statement when he signs the Clayton anti-trust bill, now before him, calling attention to the completion of the program of trust legislation started with the passage of the trade commission bill.

War Office and Press Bureau Clash.

London, Oct. 10.—The British official press bureau announces reports stating Canadian trooops had heached England were inaccurate. In this connection there are rumors of a clash between the press bureau and the war office. Earl Kitchener is said to have given the press bureau officials a jolt by informing them that they were telling too much about troop movements.

U. S. Assists 10,000 in London.

London, Oct. 12.—During the past two weeks, the American relief committee has given financial assistance to 241 persons, making a total of 9,595 to date. During this period something like 6,000 Americans embarked from these islands for the United States, bringing the total of departures up to 10,000 since war was declared. "It is evident that the American tourists have pretty well returned home," said H. C. Hoover, chairman of the committee.

COUNT MACCHI DI CELLERE

Count di Cellere is the new Italian ambassador to the United States. He arrived in Washington recently with the countess and their little son and daughter and has taken the beautiful Thomas Nelson Page home. The count, who comes of a very old and wealthy family, is a man of brilliant diplomatic attainments and in Italy is spoken of as a probable future minister of foreign affairs.

TO PROTECT AMERICAN BORDER

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS ARE MADE BY U. S.

Carranza and Villa Delegates to Conference Can't Agree on Purpose of Assembling at Aguas Calientas.

Naco, Ariz., Oct. 10.—Warlike preparations are being made in the camp on the American border to protect the neutrality of the boundary.

The siege of Naco, Sonora, where General Benjamin Hill is entrenched with his Carranza troops, and Governor Maytorena, the Villa partisan, has for six days amounted to a practical bombardment of the Mexican town. Colonel Guilfoyle, Ninth United States cavalry, states that at one time his troops evidently were mistaken for the enemy by both of the fighting factions.

Barricades have been thrown up by the American troops. A string of American flags now marks the international line.

Col. C. A. P. Hatfield, Thirteenth United States cavalry, from Douglas, Ariz., is in charge of the American troops, Colonel Guilfoyle commanding the Ninth and Colonel Brown the Tenth cavalry.

The troops comprise about 1,800 men with a machine gun platoon.

Further reinforcements are expected.

No Agreement Between Leaders.

El Paso, Tex.—While no definite reports came from the south regarding the pending conference at Aguas Calientas, it was apparent from the expressions of local officials of both factions that the Carranza and Villa delegates had not yet agreed upon the matters to be discussed or the actual status of the meeting.

The Villa faction held that the convention was to have been a meeting of all chiefs to decide on the matter of who should serve as provisional president until the holding of elections.

The Carranza agents insisted the five delegates sent north from Mexico City merely formed a permanent peace commission, which would treat with Villa only regarding his insubordination to the Constitutionalist commander-in-chief; that the Mexico City conference already had decided the matter of the provisional presidency by rejecting Carranza's resignation.

Senate Votes Mediators Medals.

Washington, Oct. 12.—A joint resolution extending the thanks of congress to the South American diplomats who acted as mediators between the United States and the Huerta government in Mexico, was passed by the senate. The resolution provides also for an appropriation of $3,000 for the purchase of gold medals to be presented to the three mediators, Ambassador da Gama, representing Brazil; Minister Naon of Argentina and Minister Suarez of Chile.

Talk Commission for Mexico.

Washington, Oct. 12.—A commission form of government for Mexico until order is restored and the resumption of full constitutional functions by the people is possible, has been suggested at the informal discussions at Aguas Calientes, preceding the formal meeting between representatives of Carranza and Villa. This was reported to the state department here and met with prompt recognition as a possible solution of the vexing problems of the southern republic.

American High Record Broken.

San Diego, Cal., Oct. 10.—Flying an American aeroplane, driven by an American-made motor, Captain H. LeR. Muller of the First Aeroplane corps, U. S. A., broke the American altitude record here, when he ascended to a height of 17,441 feet. Captain Arthur S. Cowan, in command of the corps, who is a representative of the Aero Club of America on the Pacific coast, read the barograph on Captain Muller's machine and announced that the army officer had broken the record of 15,137 feet.

The Ambition of Mark Truitt

HENRY RUSSELL MILLER

"THE MAN HIGHER UP," "HIS RISE TO POWER," Etc.

(Copyright, 1913, by The Bobbs-Merrill Company)

SYNOPSIS.

He went again to the cupboard and took down a battered tin candlestick. He lighted its candle and started toward the inward door. Half-way, he stopped abruptly and turned, his mouth working strangely.

"If ye ever git rich," he dragged the words out slowly, even painfully, "come back here an' build a steel plant. There's a heap of fine coal an' iron in these hills, an' the river an' railroad'll give ye good transportation. This valley's meant fur it. I was jest a little too early—an' a little too ignorant, I reckon. But ye're smarter an' better schooled than me, an' the time's comin'. I'd like to see a Truitt build it."

Never before had Simon Truitt spoken of his dream and failure to his son.

"Why, yes," Mark answered, on a sudden pitying impulse, "I'll think about it."

"Yes. Keep thinkin' about it. It's—it's a big idea."

Mark started. The phrase again! Simon went to the window and peered out into the silvery night—toward the south. Then he moved heavily toward the door. He turned again; the flickering light from the candle threw the lined, patient face into sharp relief.

"Good night, Mark."

"Good night, father."

The door closed. For many minutes Mark, left alone, absently fingered the pocketbook and thought of the man who had given it to him. Then he blew out the lamp and rose from the table.

He, too, paused at the window and looked out into the night, toward the south. He tried to see the sleeping valley as his father had dreamed it, alight with the fires of many furnaces, palpitant with the rumble of many engines. He thought he saw it.

The picture faded. He saw only a vague shadowy mass in a moonlit meadow, the dismantled forge, silent witness that for those who march upon the battlefield that is called industry is no third choice. They must conquer—or be conquered!

CHAPTER III.

The Masters.

He found himself, a lonely foreign figure knowing not whither he would go, somehow in the city's heart.

Chance led him to the principal thoroughfare. The city had begun to quit its toil, and the released toilers were pouring into the street, an endless unordered horde, heedless of him as they were of one another. Never before had he seen so many people.

He had a confused sense of being sucked into a narrow, gloomy canyon through which poured a flood of humanity, a treacherous, dangerous torrent, with many cross-currents. Countless faces, wan in the unnatural twilight, streamed by him; a stranger type to him, fox-featured, restless of eye.

Full darkness fell. He paused under a fiery sign, The Seneca. Through a great plate-glass window he saw a gaudy red-and-gold interior broken by many columns that to the inexpert eye somewhat resembled marble. Uniformed pages scurried to and fro. Well-dressed men lounged in easy chairs or sauntered leisurely about. Many lights burned brilliantly. He looked within longingly.

While he debated whether or not to enter this expensive-looking hostelry, a porter swooped upon him and snatched from his hands the ancient carpetbag that held his slender wardrobe.

"This way, suh!"

He followed the porter to the desk, painfully conscious of the figure he cut, uncouth, out of place. A clerk of lofty mien placed an open register before him.

"Write your name here."

Mark wrote it.

"And your town."

Mark hesitated—and then, with a dogged lowering of his head, firmly wrote the name of that city.

In the dining room that night many smiles were cast at the raw country youth. He did not regard himself as a subject for mirth. As he attacked the strange viands the waiter set before him, a little of his self-confidence returned. The vivid sense of a cruel, overpowering entity faded. Homesickness for Bethel, the refuge, subsided.

He began to take in details of the novel scene around him.

His ears strained to catch the remarks that floated to him from the neighboring tables. It was a strange tongue he heard, lightly dismissing topics that would have busied the gossips of Bethel for a moon. There was a young man who wore diamonds and talked in a loud and impressive fashion.

". . . Elizabeth, I see, broke the record again." (Elizabeth, it developed, was not a race horse, but one of the Quinby Steel company's blast furnaces.) "Yes, sir! More'n forty thousand tons. Henley says—I think so myself—we're going to have the biggest steel year yet. —No-o, I don't just exactly know him, but I know people that do.—And Tom Henley's going to be the biggest steel man in the business—gets his fifty thousand a year already. . . . MacGregor and Quinby? Oh, they're the richest. They let the others make the steel while they make the money. See? Ha! ha! . . . Tom Henley's the brains of the Quinby crowd. And he's the d——dest speculator. . . . Worth his half-million, they say, and ain't over thirty-five. . . ."

And this was the city from another angle. Tom Henley, evidently, had the monster well in hand.

The name had a familiar ring. Mark drew from his pocket a letter Richard Courtney had given him that morning. Upon it was inscribed, "To Thomas Henley, Esquire."

"He may be willing to help you find work," Courtney had said, "if he remembers me."

Mark regarded the letter thoughtfully. He wondered what was in it. After a moment's hesitation he opened—it was unsealed—and read it.

"My Dear Henley," the letter ran, "I am sending you one who is the work of my hands. He is a young man of parts, 'good friends,' as we say up here in Bethel, 'with work.' Also he 'has a nose for money.' They are qualities for which you, perhaps, can help him find a market. . . . I say he is my handiwork; but he is an unfinished product. What, I wonder, will the new life that succeeds me as his mentor make of him? Perhaps I should let him strike out for himself and learn at once the ugly cruelty of the struggle that now seems to him so glorious. But we oldsters have the habit of helping youth to the sugar-plums of which we have learned the after-taste. . . . And this introduction is the last thing I can do for a young man who means much to me."

After many minutes' study Mark came to his decision. He would present himself and the letter to Thomas Henley. He would do it that very night. He rose from his dinner.

"Where," he inquired of the supercilious clerk, "does Thomas Henley live? I must see him tonight."

The directions brought Mark at length into the heart of a small community from which the city still kept at a humble distance. Not so the fog, which was no respecter even of gilded colonies. From a tall iron fence sloped a wide sweeping lawn dotted at exact intervals with trees and shrubbery. And in its center loomed a great shadowy mass, punctured by many windows shooting broad luminous bars into the fog. It was the castle of the tamer.

He proceeded with a boldness proper to adventurers in Eldorado, past the waiting carriages that lined the graveled driveway, to the wide veranda. There he halted. From within came the strains of music and a gay clamor of voices. He could not know that on this night the tamer gave a feast, a formal dedication of the new castle to the entertainment of his kind. But he felt the hour to be ill-suited to his purpose.

Yet it was effected.

Curiosity to look within carried him to a window. To his wondering gaze unfolded a vista of Irish point and damask satin, carved mahogany and marble figures, gilt-framed pictures and silken rugs.

And amid this lavish display of beauties paraded a bevy of creatures seeming to his excited fancy to have stepped out of "Arabian Nights."

"Unity," he said, "will like that."

While he stood there a troop of men, garbed in a monotony of black and white, marched into the room. At the same time voices came from another wing of the veranda.

And then he, son of the blacksmith of Bethel, became a spectator at the birth of a project that for a brief but brilliant period was to move the world to hosannas!

"Henley," said the first voice, deep, yet softly flowing as honey, "I have come to the time of life when a man of sense puts away the lusts of the flesh—"

"Is your digestion out of order?" interrupted the second, sharper, less musical and with a sardonic quality that delighted the listener. "I noticed you didn't eat much tonight."

"Ah! It is more than stomach. It is soul!" the mellow voice flowed on. "My labors and investments have been blessed with good fortune. So I am now able to turn my energies to the higher duties, to doing large things for humanity. And lately my thoughts have dwelt much on—philanthropy and paleontology."

The speaker, like Brutus, paused for a reply.

"Mmm! Two 'p's," it came. "Quite alliterative. Go on."

"Henley, you are the first to whom I have spoken of my purpose. It is fixed. In what nobler work, what more fertile philanthropy, can a man of wealth engage than in the development of the science of paleontology? Think, Henley—to add to humanity's knowledge of the extinct life that came before our own! It is a labor to fire the imagination. And that is my purpose. I shall build and endow in this city the most complete paleontological institute in the world, and before I lay aside the project, a branch institution in each of the largest cities of the nation." The voice trembled with emotion.

There was a sound as of two hands sharply meeting. "Good! I see! Let the Scotchman look to his laurels! MacGregor may build his libraries, but Quinby shall have his paleontological institutes!"

Mark wondered at the patience of the answer. "Ah! You are pleased to jest. But the project is new to you. And," sighingly, "the young think only of wealth and power."

"My dear Mr. Quinby," the other purred, "no man in his senses could jest at paleontology. — What the devil!"

The speakers had turned the corner of the veranda and come upon the eavesdropper. Thus for the first time Mark Truitt looked upon the two men in whose legions he was to conquer.

Who has not in fancy's gallery a portrait of Jeremiah Quinby, taken from the prints of the day when his star swept so brilliant through the sky? The lofty brow seems to shelter a very ferment of noble projects. The grave eyes and mouth speak to us of a great soul anguished by the sight of suffering humanity's needs, which he is bravely, self-effacingly seeking to relieve.

Photography has been less kind to Thomas Henley. No philanthropy has claimed him as its apostle. And then he was a less promising subject for the art. His body was squat and heavy; his face was bony and ugly and arrogant, often still further marred by a cold, cynical sneer. A lesser man, thus presented, would have been repulsive. Yet from Henley radiated a tremendous vitality that made him magnetic or compelling as he chose—the dynamic quality that could galvanize a man or a regiment to the mad effort he demanded. After the first glance Mark looked no more upon Quinby; he understood why the philanthropist had so meekly swallowed the insolence.

"This," he thought, "is a man."

Henley charged upon him, gripping his arm.

"What the devil," he repeated, "are you doing here?"

"Looking into the window."

"What are you doing that for?"

"Because," Mark answered simply, "I never saw anything like it before."

"Probably," the philanthropist-to-be suggested nervously, backing away, "he is some sneak thief. Perhaps you'd better hold him while I get help."

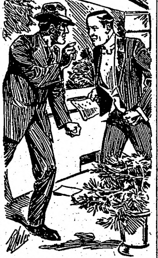
"Oh, don't be frightened," Henley replied protectively. "I won't let him bite you."

The sardonic note was again uppermost. Mark, looking down at Henley—he had the advantage of his captor by half a head—grinned involuntarily, and was himself led into impudence.

"No, I won't bite you, Mr. Quinby."

Quinby took another step backward, his nervousness becoming more manifest. "He knows my name! He may be some crank who—"

"My dear sir!" This time there was a touch of impatience in the words. "Gentlemen of your importance must expect their names to become household words. If you'll feel easier, step inside while I attend to this Peeping Tom."



"If That's All You Want, What Are You Good For?"

The philanthropist, still insensible—it seemed—to the thinly veiled insolence, accepted the suggestion.

"Now then," Henley demanded sharply, "what do you want here? You don't look like a sneak thief."

"I brought a letter to you."

"Who from?"

"Dr. Richard Courtney."

"Who's he?"

"He's our preacher in Bethel."

"Bethel? Elucidate Bethel."

Mark defined the village geographically.

"Humph! Let me see the letter."

Mark gave the missive to him, and Henley, opening it, began the perusal.

"How many letters like this do you suppose I get every day?"

"A good many, I expect."

"Dozens!" Henley snapped. "Dozens! Enough, if I gave 'em all jobs, to cover the Quinby mills three deep with incompetents in a year."

He completed the perusal of the letter.

"Well," he sneered, "you who peep through windows, I suppose you want a nice, fat job you're not fit to fill? They all want that."

Suddenly Mark felt anger, hot anger, at this arrogant young man, not so many years his senior, who baited philanthropists with as faint scrupling as he rough-handled the seeker of work. Henley saw him stiffen.

"No, I don't," Mark cried hotly. "I only want a chance to work. A chance to show what I'm good for."

"If that's all you want—what are you good for?"

"I'm a blacksmith, but I can do anything."

"Humph! We can use fellows who can do anything—to swing pick and shovel. Do you know where we're building our new plant?"

"I can find out."

"Go to the labor boss and tell him to give you a job with the construction gang. If you're good for anything, you can work up the way I—no, not the way I did, but the way you'll have to if you want to get along where I'm running things."

"All right," Mark said shortly and turned on his heel.

CHAPTER IV.

The Service of the Strong.

To the nation had come a rare passion for building. It was tearing down its old barns, to build anew, bigger and stronger. There were cities to be raised in the deserts; and they must be made stanch and lasting. The pioneer and his harvest must be carried, not by crawling conestoga and mule train, but by the power of steam. Men would go down to the sea no longer in ships of wood, but in floating palaces that mocked the storm. Those who made war were to be sheltered behind impenetrable ramparts and, again, equipped with engines and missiles before which stoutest defenses crumbled. Toilers on land and sea must find in their hands new weapons, hard and keen and sure, to bring nature, her forces and treasures, into bondage and service.

Therefore, steel!

And, therefore, the army of steel workers.

A strong west wind had sprung up during the night and the sun shone clear on the line of that day's recruits. One by one they passed before a keen-eyed youth—only the young officered this army—who, after one glance, accepted or rejected. The enlisted were turned over to the timekeeper, who gave them numbered cards and assigned them to various waiting squads.

A big Swede, a wiry little French-Canadian and a slow-moving Pole were passed.

He nodded curtly to the next applicant. "All right! Get your card."

And this recruit was he who had accepted Thomas Henley's challenge. The latter had already forgotten the incident, but Mark was still hot with the determination to prove his mettle to the tamer.

He gave his name to the time-clerk and received his card, also the command, "Go with Houlahan's gang."

Thus, he reflected, he had taken the first step in his campaign of conquest—he was a private in Houlahan's squad.

"Git a move on!" thundered a voice in his ear. "D'ye think yez arre a prathy shtuck in th' grround? Marrch!" It was the voice of Houlahan. Mark marched.

Corporal Houlahan had no romantic conception of his duties, and his tyranny was of a sort to give his underlings the realistic point of view.

"Here, ye Oly—"

"Ay bane Johann."

"Ye're Moike, 'f Oi say ut," bellowed Houlahan. He enlarged upon Johann's dishonorable pedigree. "Dig in!"

The Swede, the best worker in the gang, began to shovel in a nervous haste that added nothing to his efficiency. Mark saw the red creep into the fair skin.

"Shtir it up, ye Frinch loafer!" the corporal addressed the next in line. "We're runnin' no barber shop here. F'r two cints Oi'd bate some worruk into yez."

It was a tired and sadly fretted gang the noon whistle relieved. Mark stretched himself out on the ground, closing his eyes on the dinner pails his comrades produced; in his eagerness to be enlisted he had not thought of his midday meal, and he was very hungry.

He felt a hand on his shoulder and opened his eyes. The Frenchman and the Swede sat beside him.

"M'sieu ees 'ongree, eh?" The Frenchman carefully broke a loaf of brown bread—all his meal—in the middle and proffered Mark one-half.

"Un' t'irsty?" The Swede held out a bottle filled with cold coffee.

Mark looked covetously at the gifts, but he shook his head.

"M'sieu 'ate dat dam' 'Oula'an?" the Frenchman inquired.

"I do," Mark responded with fervor.

"Dat mak' fr'en's out of us, eh? Eat, m'sieu."

Hunger overcame scruples. Mark ate the bread and drank the coffee.

"Much obliged. I was hungry. You're all right—" He paused inquiringly.

"Marcel Masquelier," the Frenchman completed the sentence.

"Johann Johannsen," rolled from the region of the Swede's stomach.

Mark identified himself.

"Dat ver' good name.—Br-r-r!" The exclamation was for the corporal, who, with the labor boss, approached. The latter glanced over the excavation.

"How many loads have you taken out?"

"Thirty-nine, sor."

"Only thirty-nine?" the boss rejoined sharply. "It ought to be fifty."

"The dom'd loafers won't worruk," Houlahan defended himself angrily.

The boss cast his swift appraising glance over the resting groups.

"It's a good gang," he said shortly. "And it's your business to make 'em work." He passed on.

"We'll get it now," Mark muttered. "That Irish bully'll never know how to get work out of men. I'd like to tell the boss so."

Johann's face began to work. "Ay skoll kill Mister Houlahan," came his slow growl, "mebbe so."

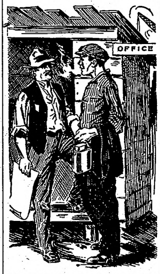
"Mebbe so not." Marcel shrugged his shoulders. "One mus' leeve. An' one mus' work. Eh?"

"Steady, Johann!" counseled Mark. "Don't let him rattle you."

"You 'ear, Jo'ann?" Marcel added earnestly. "I 'ave respec' for w'at my fr'en, M'sieu Mark Truitt, say."

They "got it," indeed, that afternoon. The Irishman, under the sting of his boss' reproof, raged and cursed endlessly in the effort to get more work out of his men. The gang, irritable and sullen, worked erratically, with feverish spurts that brought inevitable reaction; the men became demoralized, interfered with one another.

Mark, some whim of the boss making him a special target for the fusillade of profanity, was hard put to keep his temper in leash; he was harder put to restrain the mutinous Swede, who itched with a desire for assassination. Toward the end of the day even the philosophic Marcel grew ill-natured and snarling. Somehow Mark felt their hospitality of the noon hour had put upon him a responsibility for them, though they were his seniors by at least ten years.



"Would You Mind Saying That Again?"

"One must live, you know," he reminded Marcel. "And one must work."

"One mus' not be treat' like a dog, m'sieu." Marcel ripped out a long French oath. "Jo'ann, you 'ave my consen' to keel dat 'Oula'an."

Suddenly the Swede dropped his shovel. "Ay bane by endt. Ja!"

Johann was too slow in his mental processes to be shamed into patience.

"Pick up that shovel and get to work," Mark commanded sharply.

The Swede blinked stupidly for a moment, then slowly obeyed.

"You our boss, hein?" Marcel sneered.

"No, Marcel, since noon—your friend," Mark responded.

Marcel, too, stared and then, with a gesture of contrition, bent himself doggedly to his task.

Mark thought he heard a chuckle. He looked up to meet the eyes of the tamer. As to the chuckle, he may have been mistaken; in the keen impersonal glance was no sign of recognition. Henley, with the labor boss, departed on his tour of inspection. Mark gave himself anew to his work, with a sudden inner expansion. Not Henley, but the submissiveness of his malcontent "friends," was the cause of that expansion.

Mark learned that there are a right method and a wrong of doing even the simple task of plying a shovel; that there is a fashion of handling even so common an animal as the day laborer which brings out his highest efficiency. He found, moreover, that he had the gift—granted as often to the false and the foolish as to the true and the wise—of popularity. Men liked him; they laughed at his jokes; on a day's acquaintance they confided to him their troubles—squalid tragedies they were, alas! only too often. Marcel always called him "m'sieu," a distinction he accorded not even to Blair, the labor boss.

One chill, foggy evening, as the whistle blew, he looked about him and realized that the excavation for the new mill was completed.

"Why, we're through!" he muttered.

Johann stared stupidly.

"Mebby dat Meestair Blair 'e geev us anudder job, you t'ink so, eh?" ventured Marcel hopefully.

"No. We're the rottenest gang on the work. It's Houlahan's fault. And I haven't had my chance. D——n him!"

"D——n!" The impending calamity was becoming clear to Johann.

"M'sieu 'as los' 'ees chance. Dat ver' bad. Jo'ann an' me, we 'ave los' a job," Marcel sighed.

But the fear was not justified. At the tool-shed they were ordered to report next morning a half hour earlier than usual. And:

"Truitt," said the time clerk, "the boss wants to see you."

Mark made his way to the rude shanty that was Blair's office.

"Truitt," the latter demanded, "what's the matter with Houlahan's gang?"

"Too much bullying," Mark answered directly.

"I thought so. Report tomorrow morning."

"Yes, sir. Of course."

"I'm going to put your gang on the new coke oven beds. It's a rush job. I give you three weeks for it."

"Give me?"

"Yes. I'm putting you in charge of the gang."

For an instant Mark stared foolishly. Then he grinned. "Would you mind saying that again?"

Blair complied. "Look here," he added boyishly, "I'm taking a chance on you, because you look and talk intelligent. Are you?"

Mark admitted it.

"Then prove it. I want to make a record on this job and so you've got to. Houlahan," Blair added, "didn't—and he loses his job. See?"

Mark saw.

In the morning Houlahan reported, happily unaware of a new order of things.

"Houlahan," Blair announced casually, "Truitt will take your gang today."

Houlahan glared malevolently at Mark.

"And where'll Oi go?"

"You can take Truitt's old place—or quit," said Blair curtly.

"My God!"

There was no resistance. As if dazed, the Irishman shouldered his pick and shovel and with the gang followed Mark to the new job.

You have seen a sensitive horse become docile and eager when a master takes the reins. So it was with Houlahan's, now Truitt's, gang. They were, since they had survived the weeks of bullying, no mean type; and they responded gratefully to the changed leadership. Where they had been sullen and resentful, they now became willing and promptly obedient. As the day advanced, the pace, instead of slackening as under Houlahan's command, grew faster; the last hour's record was the best of all.

Often Mark went home to his lodging by way of the mills. Then he began to spend his evenings studying them, sometimes in company with Blair, who when the day's work was done sunk his rank in a frank liking for his new lieutenant.

At first Mark saw only a vast spectacular chaos; a Brobdingnagian ferment of unordered and unrelated enginery and consuming fires. No guiding hand appeared, no purpose was felt. Some awful mischance that must bring the whole fabric crashing to earth seemed always to impend. It was unbelievable that this creation had been brought forth from the mind and by the hand of man.

Gradually to his accustomed eye the chaos resolved itself into a system—rather, a marvelous system of systems that worked with a single purpose, each unit fitting precisely into the ordered whole.

"God!" he exclaimed one night, overcome by the splendor of it all. He and Blair were standing on the bridge over the blooming mill, watching the half-naked troop that with hook and tongs worked a two-ton ingot over the rolls.

"What is it? What's happened?" Blair looked around for an accident to explain the ejaculation.

"Nothing. I was just thinking how—how big it is." Mark laughed at the feebleness of his words. "What would you give to be down there?"

There is such a thing as luck. A man—himself an artist who had not yet become exploiter—who had just come unnoticed on the bridge, heard, and with a half smile, saw the eager face.

Blair shrugged his shoulders. "Yes, it's big. But it's hard work. Good pay, though."

"I suppose so," Mark answered carelessly. "I wasn't thinking of that."

The man spoke. "Good evening, Blair."

"Oh! Good evening, Mr. Henley." Blair struck a respectful attitude. "A bad night, sir."

Henley looked at Mark. "I don't just place you. Where have I seen you before?"

Mark flushed at the recollection.

"I took a letter I had for you and you caught me—"

"So you're Peeping Tom, eh? Did you get a job?"

"Yes, sir. With a pick-and-shovel gang. I'm boss now."

Henley seemed not unduly impressed.

"He's the man that dug the new oven beds," Blair interposed generously. "He did it in two weeks and three days."

"Two weeks and two days," Mark corrected eagerly.

"So long?" Henley continued indifferent.

"I had a spoiled gang. It took a week for me to shape 'em up."

"Humph! That's what we pay bosses for. We gave you credit for that job, Blair."

"I took him out of the gang and put him on the job. But he did the work. He knows how to get work out of men."

And that was high praise—the very highest, Henley thought. He turned again to Mark.

"Are you satisfied with your job?"

"No," cried Mark. "I don't want to be just a Hunky-driver. I want to learn how to make steel."

"It's easier to learn how to make steel than to be a Hunky-driver," Henley said dryly. "However, I think we can find you another job."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Lattimore says he is not a democrat. All right John, we will take your word for it.

We were invited to be present to hear the answers to our criticisms of D. P. O'Neill at Goodridge last Sunday. The roads were so bad that we did not feel like driving our horses that had been working on the plow all the week that distance to hear Dan talk, for when he gets wound up he usually talks the hall empty before he runs down. The farmers in former years used to sit and listen to him spread the soft soap by the hour, but they have found out the difference between D. P. O'Neill as a school house orator, and D. P. O'Neill as a Representative of their interests after he gets elected and begins to hobnob with the city dudes of St. Paul and Minneapolis, and attend the banquets given by Jim Hill,

A BOLD HOLD UP.

W. G. Hunt, the farmer publisher of THE SUNBEAM attempted to hold up County Auditor Fasel for $25.00 on July 27th, so says an affidavit by A.H. Fasel published in the Eleven Towns. Auditor undoubtedly escaped by hiding behind ditch contract extensions. Fasel tries to shield his carcass from the wrath of the ditch tax paying farmers by trying to discredit the statements made by THE SUNBEAM.

THE FACTS OF THE CASE

On July 27th, we had some Probate Court matters to attend to and called at the office of Wm. Michelet to see him. When we were coming out of the Court House by the office of A.H. Fasel he spoke to us about publishing his announcement in our paper. We told him that we did not think an announcement would do him much good up this way, unless he explained to the farmers some of them extensions on ditch contracts. He asked us what we meant, or something like that, and we told him that we had not looked the matter up ourselves, but judging from the complaints we had heard, some of the drainage laws would have to be published, and what he had done regarding them extensions granted to contractors, which would cost him about $25.00 to get put into type, before an ordinary announcement would do him any good. That we ever asked Mr. Fasel to give us $25.00 is not true. That we ever offered to support Fasel for re-election is not true. That we ever told him that we would carry the town of Highlanding is not true, and we will bet that the old officials of the town of Highlanding will laugh at such rot. We have voted in this township of Highlanding for eight years, and we never have been guilty of working to get votes for any candidates, or any proposition, at the polls on election day. As to holding up Fasel for what he might call "boodle," we respectfully refer our readers to the numerous other candidates, who we are publishing announcements for. Ask them and all of them if we ever made any attempt to "hold them up" for $25.00 or any other sum, aside from the regular price charged for the publication of their announcements.

The trouble with Fasel is that he sees the opportunity to establish any more banks out of the revenue of that County Auditor's office slipping through his fingers, as he realizes that T. P. Anderson is on his trail, and that the ditch tax paying farmers are behind him.

We have only two more issues to get out before election, and we will certainly be glad when the row is over.

The October prayers of the American people for peace in Europe do not seem to have availed much, as the killing goes steadily on.

D. P. O'Neill claims that there is no fight being made for the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment limiting any one county to a representation of not more than seven senators. He voted against the passage of this proposed amendment, but if he only gets as many votes as there is against it, in this district he would have a slimmer show than he now has for election for State Senator.

We have refrained up to the present time from expressing any opinion as to the election of a County Superintendent of Schools for this county, but as election day is approaching and there must be an election made for this important position, we will call the attention of the people to a few facts: First, we have been a resident of eastern Pennington formerly Red Lake County for nine years, and have been one of the school officials of the Highlanding school district for nearly all that time, and have had a lot of experience with County Superintendent of Schools. In this connection we wish to say, that E. A. Mostue the present County Superintendent of Schools is the only superintendent that we have had that has complied with the letter of the law. Mr. Mostue has visited the schools as the law requires that he should do. He has taken a personal interest in the upbuilding of the country schools, has driven through storm and sunshine to look after the interests of the country school children. Do you my country neighbor feel like exchanging a man who has grown gray in the service of our country schools for a lady of pleasing appearance? We think not, and when the votes are counted on November 3rd, E. A. Mostue will be our next Superintendent of Schools.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

The undersigned respectfully solicits the support and vote of the electorate, men and women, of Pennington county at the November election for re-election to the office of SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS.

Being mindful of past favors I pledge anew my best efforts for the upbuilding of our rural schools.

Respectfully Submitted,

Building a Fire.

In building a wood fire in an open fireplace shake out a double sheet of newspaper and crush it tightly, leaving the edges loose, that it may ignite easily. The back log should be of the greatest size that the fireplace will hold and may be of green wood, as this is the slowest to burn out, and the draft and fire are strongest in the back. The log should be shoved against the wall. If it is a split log the inside of it should be turned toward the front. Three logs are a good number to start a fire with the back log, a smaller one in front and the third log on top of these. All of the ashes of the first three or four should be left on the hearth, as they make a fine bed for keeping the embers hot after they have fallen through the andirons. The wood should be mixed in order to have an ideal fire—green wood with dry, and the harder varieties, oak and pine, with the wood of old fruit trees that have died. Apple wood gives a mellow, soft light.—New York Sun.

Connecticut Taverns of 1644.

Taverns came early, and under order of the general court in 1644 they were established not only in Hartford but others in each town upon our river. An old authority tells what a guest might expect:

"Clean sheets to lie in wherein no man had been lodged since they came from the landresse and have a servante to kindle his fire and one to pull off his boots and make them clean and have the hoste and hostess to visit him and to eat with the hoste or at a common table if he pleases or eat in his chamber, commanding what meate he will, according to his appetite. Yea the kitchen being open to him to order the meat to be dressed as he liketh it best."

The landlord was not to allow a person to be intoxicated in his house or to drink excessively, or to tipple after 9 o'clock at night.—"A History of Connecticut," by George L. Clark.

THE LOCAL NEWS

E. K. Gjernes, of Oklee, was looking up his collections in this locality Wednesday.

If Mr. Singer lost his last copy of the Eleven Towns, during the rush of the fire, we have a copy of it, that we might send him. But, most likely he had it carefully preserved, so that no harm came to it.

The people of Thief River Falls should not be allowed to vote on a County Superintendent of Schools, but as they do vote they should not bunch their votes for any one candidate, but give the country a chance to make their choice.

We would suggest that O'Neill get a phonograph to take down that legislative lingo of his, then go around to the farmers and let them listen from the phonograph about what great things he did not do while a member of the last two sessions of the legislature.

Lattimore can afford to publish long winded articles in support of of the re-election of A. H. Fasel as he is soon to leave the town of Highlanding, and has no ditch taxes to pay. While we have a mile and a half of them to pay, and have got to break mosskeg and raise flax to pay them, and you bet we do not want to pay any extra.

County Superintendet Mostue is making a record for visiting rural schools, having made 294 visits up to date. He certainly is doing his work faithfully and well, and the floating enthusiasm for the election of Miss Goodwin to succeed Mostue is begining to subside, when the people consider this question from a business stand point, and for the best interests of our country schools.

We do not think that anybody would hold A. H. Fasel up for $25.00, especially ourselves. When we dunned him for his subscription for THE SUNBEAM, which is the small amount of about $1.50, he did not seem to have enough left from building that bank at Goodridge to pay for it. Now why would we want to hold him for $25.00, when we could not even get $1.50 from him, that was honestly due us for subscription.

On the last page of this issue we publish the proposed constitutional amendments in full, and we ask our readers to read them over carefully and be sure to vote for or against them on election day. The fifth proposed amendment should have the solid support of the farmers, as it will lower the rate of interest on farm loans, about one half. The seventh amendment should have the solid support of the country people, except O'Neill, as it proposes to limit the number of State Senators to only seven for each county, which will provent the cities from getting more senators from Hennepin and Ramsey counties than they now have.

The farm residence of George Singer, at Rhoda, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday evening. The fire started from a lamp explosion, the same way as the one started in his house at Gully, some nine years ago, which he had heavily insured. The insurance company made a careful investigation of the origin of the fire, and finally refused to pay the insurance. We understand that this house was heavily insured in the Farmers Mutual Insurance Company of Bray. State Fire Warden Edward Singer was present, but while he was the one that fell down with a lamp, and set the house on fire at Gully. We hear it was one of the younger boys who had the accident at this time.

We had two hogs recover from the cholera, and lost seven.

Julius Halverson bought a car load of cattle in this locality the past week.

The weather has been very fine the past week, and we seem to be having our Indian summer.

Fire Warden Singer drove down to Kratka on yesterday's mail, to look up fires in that locality.

The husks on the corn are very light this year, which used to be the old time sign for an open winter.

We are not troubled much with visits from candidates for office, as they can find out how we feel about election every Friday.

We understand that there wes a very small attendance of farmers at the Goodridge political rally last Sunday, but there was a good attendance of candidates.

Owing to our being busy thrashing this week, we have to get out our paper a little early, so the entire printing force can assist about thrashing to-day.

GRAND POLITICAL RALLY

There will be a big political rally, at the Auditorium in Thief River Falls, next Monday evening October 19th, All are invited.

The ferry at Highlanding is out of order, and is so posted by the Creamery Association. A good steady team can be farryed with safety, but a skittish team is likely to land in the river.

DO NOT FORGET the last half of your real estate taxes. They must be paid this month to avoid the 10 per cent penalty.

Very Respectfully,
Andrew Trovaton.
County Treasurer.

It will be a dire calamity for the Normal School boomers, of Minneapolis and Bemidji if O'Neill is defeated for State Senator, and they can make up their minds that he is defeated, for the people up this way are "dead next to him." He should have moved up into the Bemidji district, and run for State Senator from there.

NEXT WEEK! NEXT WEEK!

Next week we shall publish from the official county records, where A. H. Fasel has collected over $700.00 in extra fees from the ditch tax paying farmers. Watch for the facts next week, taken from the county records.

All these political announcements are paid for, or to be paid for at regular rates.

Having received the nomination for County Treasurer of Pennington County, I respectfully solicit your support and vote at the General Election November 3rd 1914.

German Airmen Slain in Duels.

Paris.—Jules Vedrines, the French aviator, has engaged in two duels in midair with German aviators, whom he brought to earth.

The latest German victim was daringly reconnoitering the position of the allies when Vedrines ascended.

Moving swiftly upward until he was above the German, Vedrines gave chase, and as he skimmed along fusilladed the air scout with his automatic gun.

The German machine was riddled and the aviator killed, the machine collapsing to the ground within fifteen minutes from the time Vedrines took the air. Vedrines had accomplished a similar feat three days ago.

Now Gets Bouquets.

London.—Instead of being hooted and jeered Christabel Pankhurst is now receiving bouquets. She was presented with fourteen on the night she opened her patriotic campaign at the London Opera house.

STATE BREVITIES

Hastings.—Mr. and Mrs. John Feipel, old and prominent residents, celebrated their golden wedding last week.

Winona.—Rt. Rev. Patrick R. Heffron, bishop of the diocese of Winona, has abandoned his intention of making a trip to Rome because of the European war.

Bertha.—Four business houses of Bertha were burglarized one night last week. The postoffice was robbed of $20 and the losses in other places were small.

Brainerd.—Carrying a shotgun while running a mowing machine resulted fatally to Leroy Whirley, 18 years old. The gun slipped into the mower and was discharged.

Hastings.—Hastings has joined the League of Minnesota Municipalities, and Mayor J. G. Sieben will appoint delegates to the annual convention at Mankato on Oct. 21 and 22.

Windom.—On Thursday the railroad and warehouse commission visited Windom to take up with the commercial body the project of a new station for Windom. Citizens assert that the station fails to meet the needs of the community.

Brainerd.—The Chamber of Commerce is planning for a municipal Christmas tree 50 feet high, decorated with colored lights and with presents for all the little folks, the festivities to last a week. A municipal skating rink is also projected. The club now has over 400 members.

Le Sueur Center.—The heaviest hailstorm in many years passed over here last week. Hail fell for fifteen minutes and the ground was white with the stones. Lightning and heavy thunder accompanied the storm, which approached from the southwest. Foliage was cut from the trees in large quantities.

Bemidji.—Democrats have formed an organization to further the candidacy of Winfield Scott Hammond, democratic candidate for governor. A. P. Ritchie was named as chairman with R. E. Fisher secretary and H. Mayne Stanton treasurer. Plans are being made to have Mr. Hammond speak in Bemidji.

Duluth.—Rev. Robert Yost, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, has tendered his resignation to take effect January 1. He will devote his future to educational and religious work among the mountaineers of the South. He announced that a friend has offered to finance him for life in that work. He has been pastor here for four years. He came from Joliet, Ill.

Fergus Falls.—James Wolf, William Griffin, John Anderson and Michael Dempsey, accused of having murdered James Wallace and injured two of his companions in a holdup near Perham, had their preliminary hearing in the justice court here and were bound over to the grand jury without bail on a charge of murder in the first degree.

Red Wing.—Ten thousand visitors from all parts of southern Minnesota attended the street fair and harvest festival in Red Wing under the auspices of the Merchants' association. The event was featured by a horse show and agricultural exhibition. Balloon ascensions, water pageants and free street shows were amusement features.

Byron.—Entering the office of the station here for the avowed purpose of telling fortunes, two gipsy women stole $31 of the railway funds. The loss was discovered after they had gone and the sheriff was notified. The gipsies were overtaken and the men in the party made full restitution in order to save the women from arrest and prosecution.

Willmar.—The body of a strange man was found in a mangled condition on the tracks by section men. From letters found on the body it is evident the man was Clarence A. Ernest and that he had been working at Columbus, N. D. No arrangements for burial have been made, pending further investigation as to his identity. It is evident he had fallen off a freight train.

Brainerd.—The Sherlund company has been incorporated by Louis W. Sherlund, Roy W. Sherlund, Charles N. Sherlund, O. M. Hansyn and W. H. Crowell, all of Brainerd. It will carry on a general engineering business. The American Specialty company has filed its articles of association, the incorporators being R. R. Livingston, L. Z. Livingston, C. A. Miller, Charles C. Russell and F. B. Winslow of Brainerd and F. G. Ostland and E. A. Ostland of Crosby.

Pipestone.—Hills is the first of the small towns in this section to install electric lights. At a special election at Lake Wilson only six votes were cast against the proposition of granting a ten-year franchise to two residents of that place for an electric light system there. Slayton is considering granting a franchise. Trosky, Hatfield, Edgerton and Jasper, all towns in this county, are talking of having a line extended from Pipestone for the purpose of furnishing electric light and power.

Luverne.—The explosion of a large acetylene tank wrecked the home of Henry Bierkamp and broke window lights for several blocks around. Mrs. Wm. Rathjen and daughter, who were visiting at the home, were injured severely by flying glass. The cause of the explosion is unknown.

Sleepy Eye.—The 12-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. August Kroschel, Sr., has been missing from home since Oct. 2. No trace of him has been found, though the whole country has been scoured. He was a devoted reader of novels and it is thought they influenced him to leave home.

WHAT HE REALLY DID SAY

Remark Might Almost Be Construed as a Slur on a Most Noble Profession.

One morning Gifford met his old friend, Hall. After they had greeted they did under pretense of studying each other, Gifford said:

"Say, Will, I heard today that your son, Thomas, was an undertaker. I thought you told me he was a physician."

"Oh, no," replied Hall, positively, "I never told you that."

"I don't like to contradict you, old friend," insisted Gifford, "but, really, I'm positive you did say so."

"No, you probably misunderstood me," explained Hall, "I told you he followed the medical profession."—Exchange.

What a Cold Can Do

Many a fatal case of kidney disease starts from a simple cold or chill. Congestion clogs and weakens the kidneys. Uric poisons collect, damage the kidneys and cause backache, rheumatic pain, headaches and urinary disorders.

When doctoring a cold, think of the kidneys. Drink water freely to help flush out the poison. Take Doan's Kidney Pills to relieve congestion of the kidneys, give up a heavy meat diet and take plenty of rest. Nature will assist in the cure. Doan's Kidney Pills are used with success and are publicly recommended all over the civilized world.

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

C. P. Belin, 613 Potter St., Red Wing, Minn., says: "Work on the police force fourteen years weakened my kidneys. The secretions passed too frequently, obliging me to get up at night and there was much sediment in them. Sharp pains seized me in my back and I couldn't move. Doan's Kidney Pills were just what I needed; they toned up my kidneys and I have never been bothered by my back since."

Sick Women Attention

Is it possible there is a woman in this country who continues to suffer without giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial after all the evidence that is continually being published, which proves beyond contradiction that this grand old medicine has relieved more suffering among women than any other one medicine in the world?

We have published in the newspapers of the United States more genuine testimonial letters than have ever been published in the interest of any other medicine for women—and every year we publish many new testimonials, all genuine and true. Here are three never before published:

From Mrs. S. T. Richmond, Providence, R. I.

Providence, R. I.—"For the benefit of women who suffer as I have done I wish to state what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I did some heavy lifting and the doctor said it caused a displacement. I have always been weak and I overworked after my baby was born and inflammation set in, then nervous prostration, from which I did not recover until I had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. The Compound is my best friend and when I hear of a woman with troubles like mine I try to induce her to take your medicine."—Mrs. S. T. Richmond, 199 Waldo Street, Providence, R. I.

A Minister's Wife Writes:

Cloquet, Minn.—"I have suffered very much with irregularities, pain and inflammation, but your wonderful medicine, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, has made me well and I can recommend the same to all that are troubled with these complaints."—Mrs. Jennie Akerman, c/o Rev. K. Akerman, Cloquet, Minnesota.

From Mrs. J. D. Murdoch, Quincy, Mass.

South Quincy, Mass.—"The doctor said that I had organic trouble and he doctored me for a long time and I did not get any relief. I saw Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound advertised and I tried it and found relief before I had finished the first bottle. I continued taking it all through middle life and am now a strong, healthy woman and earn my own living."—Mrs. Jane D. Murdoch, 25 Gordon St., South Quincy, Mass.

Watermen and Uniforms.

Watermen—who were also firemen—enjoy the distinction of being the first public servants who ever wore a uniform. "Long before our army and navy adopted any distinguishing garb," writes Mr. Guy Nickalls, "Thames watermen were known by their uniform and badge, a plaited coat, knee breeches and stockings and hat, according to fashion, but always a plate on the arm, either of the Waterman's hall to denote that they had the freedom of the river, and were licensed, or the badge of their employer. Any person rowing or working any boat, wherry or other vessel, who had not served seven years as apprentice, incurred a penalty of £10."—London Chronicle.

I Want Some US CARTRIDGES

Test after test after test of ammunition has proved the value of the U. S. non-mercuric primer. No mercury in the primer means no harmful, corrosive fouling of the barrel, no destroying action on the brass cartridge case, no varying time of ignition. The U. S. primer is a strictly chemical compound that acts with perfect uniformity.

Where fulminate of mercury is used, ground glass is also used. Ground glass is difficult to mix with mercury and its effect is not only to wear down the rifling, but also to cool the primer flame by absorbing about 16% of the heat.

World's Championship Rifle Teams habitually use U. S. Cartridges.

DISFIGURED WITH ERUPTION

2406 Copeland St., Cincinnati, Ohio.—"For one year my right wrist and left arm from elbow to shoulder were disfigured with sore eruption. The eczema broke out with a rash and looked like raw beef steak. It itched and burned continually and I had to keep my arms covered with soft linen cloths. I could not sleep at night.

"I was told it was chronic case of eczema and got medicine but it had no effect. Then I sent for a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and the first application seemed to help me. I purchased two cakes of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment and in six weeks my arms and wrists were thoroughly healed." (Signed) Mrs. John Clark, Jan. 26, '14.

YOUR BLOOD is the canal of life but it becomes a sewer if clogged up. All life consists of building up and tearing down and just in the same manner that the blood carries to the various parts of the body the food that the cells need for building up, so it is compelled to carry away the waste material that's torn down. These waste materials are poisonous and destroy us unless the liver and kidneys are stimulated into refreshed and vigorous life.

THEIR FIRST LOVE

By H. M. EGBERT.

The two houses had formed one in more spacious days, but where the stout brick chimney reared itself through the center of the frame building a brick wall had been built in, extending from the cellar to the roof, and converting the one home into two. The only symbol of communion between the disunited parts of what had been organically one was that, on windy days, smoke from a stove set against the chimney on either side would issue down the flue into the stove in the adjacent room. And sometimes, too, if any one listened at the sheet iron, one could hear words spoken upon the other side.

When Frank Barton and Ida Norris were children they had played at this game; but that was long ago. The intimacies of the old house were not evoked by childish play any more. Both were immeasurably old—each was twenty.

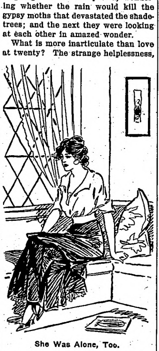
The double house stood in a small town, just such a town as may be seen almost anywhere in New England, neither rich nor poor, and proud of its history. Greenfield folks prided themselves on being ordinary Americans. Immigration had hardly touched them, for there was only one factory, and the French Canadian hands had something of the colonial tradition about them.

The Bartons and the Norrises had lived there for fifteen years, and had known each other for fifty. Sometimes the elders looked at each other from their opposite sides of the double piazza and smiled, when the boy came home, carrying the girl's schoolbooks for her, while she stepped at his side with all the assurant ownership that a small girl feels for her childish sweetheart.

But that was years before. The change of adolescence had set a barrier between the young people's lives. Frank was in the local bank now. Perhaps he earned $12 a week. Ida stayed home and helped her mother.

The thing that happened came all in a moment. The girl had pictured it a thousand times, the boy never; but it was just as surprising to each. One moment they were friends, chatting together on the piazza, wondering whether the rain would kill the gypsy moths that devastated the shade-trees; and the next they were looking at each other in amazed wonder.

What is more inarticulate than love at twenty? The strange helplessness, the sense of some tremendous power that holds one in terror of self-revelation; caprice and shyness, as inexplicable to one as to the other! For instance:



She Was Alone, Too.

"I'm not coming, Frank."

"Aw, why not, now? You said you would. This is the last night of the week, and there won't be another in town for an age."

"I don't care; I'm not coming," she anwered, snatching her hand away as he pulled at her wrist coaxingly. "Leave me alone!"

"Why, Ida!" exclaimed the boy, looking in wonder at her flushed face, "I didn't mean—honest, I didn't—say! You aren't mad at me?"

But the girl had flung into the house, leaving him standing outside and gaping after her. He could not understand what was the matter with her. As he stood there Mrs. Norris came out with the big watering can. She had a box of asters, which she was raising from seed; or, rather, it had been Ida's but she had ceased to care for the tender shoots.

"Say, Mrs. Norris, Ida's all right, isn't she?" asked the boy.

The old woman looked at him, pursing her lips. "I guess there's nothing wrong with her," she answered, and began sprinkling the plants. There was a wise smile on her lips, and her face was faintly flushed.

"They're too young, Jim," she said that night to her husband, when the old couple were alone.

Outside, at the Barton end of the piazza, Frank was waiting. He had meant to go to the picture show alone. He had wished that he had some other girl to take with him. They would stroll past the double house together, their voices slightly raised, and Frank laughing. The thought pleased him; but he only sat sullenly at the end of the piazza, his chin on his hands, staring out into the dusk.

Ten yards away the girl sat by the window in the living room. She was alone, too; her father had gone out upon some errand, and her mother was making up accounts in the kitchen. From the corner of the window she could just see the Barton end of the piazza. She had a book in her hand, but she was not reading.

She had been trying hard not to cry, and she was exceedingly angry, because it was not about Frank Barton—and yet it was, too, in a sort of way. But what had he done? Nothing. That was just it; he was only a boy and couldn't understand. But what was there to understand, except that she hated him?

She went up to her room at last, and then she crouched down by the window and cried in earnest. Presently a slight squeaking sound inside the chimney made her tiptoe over to the stove. It had not been lit since the warm weather began, a month before. Something like a mouse was squeaking and scurrying behind the place where the stovepipe entered.

Frank Barton, at the end of the piazza, saw the girl's shadow thrown on the lawn. He was not going to look up at her. But he looked up, and saw that she had pulled the stovepipe from its place and was bending over something.

"She's found a mouse's nest," he thought, and a wave of disgust surged over him. He had heard the little beasts scurrying to and fro at night. He had thought of pulling out the pipe and drowning them. How like a girl!

He almost hated Ida then. He hoped she had not been angry with him because—because she guessed! The shame of that would make him hang his head the rest of his days. He saw Ida clearly again, a pale young woman whose twin pigtails had changed into fluffy, straw-colored hair. He did not even want to take another girl to the picture show now.

"Aren't you getting cold, Frank? It's turning quite chilly," said his mother, from the window of the living room.

"I guess not," he answered.

"Shall I light the fire in the stove?" she asked.

He hesitated. "Yes, it might warm up the house," he answered.

The boy was in his room and it was morning. He leaned over the window sill. Underneath a lilac tree was beginning to blossom and the scent came up to him. The world was very fair that soft spring morning. Why was his heart aching so?

In the next house, but shut off as by a thousand leagues, was Ida. Sometimes she would lean from her window and wave a good morning to him, and he looked for today. But there was no sign of her.

"She's still mad at me," he thought, and the old sense of resentment began to stir in him again.

Suddenly he heard a sound of sobbing. It came from the next house. He heard it through the chimney, and put his mouth to the stovepipe.

"Ida!" he called. "Ida! Ida!"

There was no answer, and he went downstairs. He stood beneath the lilac tree. The beauty of nature seemed suddenly to have become accursed and dreary. He leaned against the trunk and idly plucked a spray of lilac. Then he saw a girl coming along the piazza and went toward her, a little sheepishly, not yet decided in what spirit to approach her. But he saw the tears in her eyes, and his heart leaped with remorse. And in her hand she was carrying something. She held it out indignantly.

It was three little dead birds—chimney swifts, which had been killed by the fire he had let his mother kindle.

"Aw, say, Ida! I didn't know. I thought they were mice," he protested.

"You have killed them for wantonness, just like a boy!" she said indignantly.

Her eyes were wet. She stroked the limp little wings, and then suddenly burst into passionate tears. Frank stood by helplessly. He was sure now that she would never speak to him again.

"I'm sorry, Ida—honest, I am," he muttered.

She raised her eyes to his, but there was not anger in them any more. There was something he had never seen there. It was not love; it was more like humility—that which is born of sudden understanding. Something of the tragedy of life had gripped them both, and the seriousness of it when one puts aside childish things.

"You didn't know—did you, Frank!" she said. And she slipped her arm through his, and in that moment the new life lay before them, though they only dimly realized what was happening in their souls. For when the butterfly emerges from the cocoon it at once forgets and only rejoices in its new happiness.

TOOK SPEECH IN THE DARK

Stenographer Says It Was Not Difficult to Follow Remarks of "Uncle Joe."

"Sometimes a man gets a reputation that is undeserved," said Sam Gray, a member of the stenographic corps of the house of representatives, at the Willard, according to the Washington Post. "It happened to me a few years ago when I was traveling with former Speaker Cannon in a political campaign. 'Uncle Joe' made a lot of speeches in that particular campaign, and I was there to make a stenographic report and transcript of them. In one western city the speaker was talking to a tremendous crowd of people, when suddenly, without warning, the electric lights went out, leaving the house in total darkness.

"For fifteen minutes, perhaps, the speaker talked on in the darkness. It was up to me, of course, to make a report of his speech, and I did. Naturally, I had to feel my way, and I made my notes unusually large, so I would have no trouble in reading them. When the lights were restored I was right there with the speaker, and made an accurate transcript of his speech. Some of the newspaper boys heard of the story and published it as a marvelous feat.

"The fact is, it was not at all difficult to follow the former speaker. He is not a rapid talker, and I had no trouble in taking his remarks."

Heavy Pasturing Condemned.

Heavy pasturing of alfalfa is not advised. The number of animals per acre should be so regulated that two or three small cuttings of hay may be taken from the field. This is necessary to insure tender green growth for grazing. When little buds begin to shoot at the base of the stalk the alfalfa should be cut. In a very few days a fresh new growth makes its appearance. Overpasturing, without occasional cutting, also tends to injure the crowns of the plant and eventually destroys the stand.

THE ELEVEN
Proposed Amendments
to the Constitution of the STATE OF MINNESOTA

Submitted by the Legislature at Its General Session, 1913, Together With a Statement of the

PURPOSES AND EFFECTS,

Prepared by Hon. Lyndon A. Smith,
Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to
Julius A. Schmahl
Secretary of State.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, ST. PAUL.

April 25, 1914.

Honorable Julius A. Schmahl,
Secretary of State,
Capitol.

SIR: As required by Section 46, General Statutes of the State of Minnesota for the year 1913, I have the honor to furnish you herewith a statement of the purposes and effects of the respective amendments proposed to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota by the Legislature of 1913, and which are to be submitted to the electors of said State at the general election in 1914.

FIRST PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The first proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 584 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is sought to enable the electors to submit by petition to the Legislature constitutional amendments and likewise to propose legislation, and in the event the Legislature fails to submit any such constitutional amendment or fails to enact any such proposed law, then such amendment or proposed law may be submitted directly to the voters; also, to permit the electors to cause any law or laws enacted by the Legislature to be submitted to the electors and if a majority of the votes cast thereon be opposed to such law, the same shall be repealed.

This is an amendment to Section 1 of Article 4 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Section 1. The legislature shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such time as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety (90) legislative days; and no new bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the governor, during the last twenty (20) days of such sessions, except the attention of the legislature shall be called to some important matter of general interest by a special message from the governor."

"Sec. 1. TWO HOUSES—SESSIONS.—The Legislature shall consist of the senate and house of representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the state, at such time as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety (90) legislative days, and no bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the governor, during the last twenty days of such session, except the attention of the legislature shall be called to some important matter of general interest by a special message from the governor; but the people reserve to themselves direct power, as follows:

"a. CONSTITUTIONAL INITIATIVE.—When at any time prior to the commencement of any session of the legislature, there shall have been filed with the secretary of state a petition proposing an amendment to the constitution signed by two per centum of the electors of the state, the secretary of state shall transmit the same to the legislature not later than ten days after the commencement of the session. If the amendment so proposed be not submitted to the electors by the legislature at such session, or if it be submitted in an amended form, then upon a further petition or petitions, each signed by eight per centum of the electors of the state, filed with the secretary of state within six months after the adjournment of the legislature, the amendment proposed in the first petition, or one or more amended forms thereof, shall be submitted to the electors for their approval or rejection at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of any such further petitions. Any amendment proposed by initiative petition and, in its original or in an amended form, submitted to the electors by the legislature or by a further petition, shall become a part of the constitution, if approved by a majority of the electors voting at said election, or by four-sevenths of the electors voting on the proposed amendment; provided not less than three-sevenths of the electors voting at said election voted for the proposed amendment. This section shall be construed as a means in addition to Section one, Article fourteen of the State Constitution for amending the same.

"b. STATUTORY INITIATIVE—When at any time prior to the commencement of any session of the legislature, there shall have been filed with the secretary of state a petition proposing a law, signed by two per centum of the electors of the state, the secretary of state shall transmit the same to the legislature not later than ten days after the commencement of the session. If the law so proposed be not passed by the legislature at such session, or if it be passed in an amended form, then upon a further petition or petitions, each signed by six per centum of the electors of the state, filed with the secretary of state within six months after the adjournment of the legislature, the law proposed in the first petition, or one or more amended forms thereof, shall be submitted to the electors at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of any such further petition or petitions, and if approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon, the same shall become law and go into effect thirty days after such election, and shall supersede any amended form of such law which may have been passed by the legislature. No law proposed by initiative petition and approved by the electors shall be subject to the veto of the governor. The authority of the people to enact laws, as provided in this subdivision, shall extend only to laws authorized by the provisions of the constitution.

"c. THE REFERENDUM.—If within ninety days after the final adjournment of any session of the legislature, a referendum petition, signed by six per centum of the electors of the state, shall be filed with the secretary of state against any law, or any part of a law, passed by the legislature at such session, such law, or such part of a law, shall be submitted to the electors at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of said petition. If a majority of the vote cast thereon be in the negative, such law, or such part of a law, shall thereby be repealed. Provided, that if a referendum petition is signed by fifteen per centum of the electors of the state, the law or part of a law, against which such petition is filed shall be suspended pending the referendum vote thereon.

"Any law providing for a tax levy or appropriating money for the current expenses of the state government or state institutions, any act of the legislature submitting a constitutional amendment or other question to the electors of the state, or any emergency law necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, shall go into effect immediately upon its passage and approval by the governor, and such laws, except emergency laws, shall not be subject to a referendum vote. All other laws shall go into effect ninety days after the adjournment of the legislature. A bill proposing an emergency law shall contain a preamble briefly setting forth the facts constituting the emergency. A separate vote shall be taken upon the preamble of such bill by a call of the yeas and nays, and if the preamble be adopted by a two-thirds vote of all the members of each house, it shall be an emergency law.

"d. GENERAL PROVISIONS.—All petitions provided for in this section shall contain a title indicating the subject and purpose of the proposed law or constitutional amendment, or the law, or part of a law, to be referred, and if a change is proposed in an existing constitutional provision or statute, in addition to referring to the same, it shall state the general effect of the proposed change, and also the full text of the proposed law or amendment to the constitution or of the law, or part of a law, to be referred. Any initiative or referendum petition may be signed in separate parts, but each part shall conform to the provisions herein contained. All petitions shall be signed and verified before a person authorized to administer an oath, and shall be in such form that a person signing a petition thereby states under oath, the date of his signature, his residence, that he is a qualified elector, that he has not previously signed any part of such petition, and that he has signed the petition with knowledge of the contents thereof. To each part of such petition shall be attached the affidavit of the person before whom the same was signed, which affidavit shall contain a statement of the number of signers thereon, that each of the signatures attached to such part was made in the presence of the affiant, that to the best of his knowledge and belief each signature is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be, that he believes the persons who have signed such petition to be electors, that they signed such petition with knowledge of the contents thereof, and that each person signed the same on the date stated opposite his name. The circulation of the petitions provided for herein, or the prohibition of the circulation thereof, may be regulated by law, and in case the circulation of any petition is prohibited by law, the percentage of signers required on any petition provided for in this section shall be one-half of the percentage specified in subdivisions A, B and C of this section.

"The percentage in any case shall be based upon the total number of votes cast for governor at the next preceding election. All petitions provided for in this section shall contain the signature of not less than one-half of the designated percentage of the electors in not less than one-fourth of the counties of the state. In initiating a law or constitutional amendment, electors who have signed the first shall be qualified to sign the second petition. The sufficiency of all petitions shall be decided by the secretary of state subject to review by the court. If the secretary of state decides that any petition is insufficient, he shall permit a reasonable time for making corrections or for filing additional signatures. In the event of legal proceedings in court to prevent giving effect to any such petition on account of insufficiency, or any other ground, the burden of proof shall be upon the person attacking the petition. No law or amendment to the constitution initiated and approved by the electors as herein provided, shall be held unconstitutional, or void on account of the insufficiency of any initiative petition; nor shall the repeal of any law submitted by referendum petition be held invalid for such insufficiency.

"All initiative laws and constitutional amendments shall be so submitted to the electors as to permit an affirmative or negative vote upon each measure submitted. If conflicting proposed laws or conflicting proposed amendments to the constitution be approved at the same election, the one receiving the highest number of affirmative votes shall prevail as to conflicting provisions.

"The style of all legislative measures and amendments to the constitution initiated by the people under this section shall be: 'Be it enacted by the people of the State of Minnesota.'

"The provisions of this section may be enforced by appropriate legislation, but until such legislation has been enacted, this section shall be self-executing."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to give to the electors the privilege of submitting directly to the voters constitutional amendments, proposed legislation and the right to suspend and annul laws enacted by the Legislature.

SECOND PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The second proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 585 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose and object of this amendment is to add two Associate Justices to the Supreme Court; to require the concurrence of five Justices of the Supreme Court before any law shall be declared unconstitutional by such court, and make the office of Clerk of the Supreme Court appointive, and is an amendment of Section 2 of Article 6 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, but the number of the associate justices may be increased to a number not exceeding four, by the legislature, by a two-thirds vote, when it shall be deemed necessary. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the State, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified, and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and six associate justices. Five shall constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of at least four shall be necessary to a decision, but no statute shall be declared unconstitutional unless five members of the court shall concur in the decision. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions, and a clerk of the supreme court."

EFFECT: The present constitution provides that the number of Associate Justices of the Supreme Court shall not exceed four in number, while the amendment, if adopted, will increase the number to six. A majority of the Supreme Court may now declare a law unconstitutional, but if this amendment is adopted, it will require the concurrence of five members. The office of clerk of the Supreme Court is now elective, but if this amendment is adopted, the clerk of the Supreme Court will be appointed by the court.

THIRD PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The third proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 586 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is sought to authorize the State to construct roads, ditches, fire breaks through and around unsold state school and swamp lands, and a $250,000 revolving fund, realized and kept up from the sale of such lands, is to be set apart for such purpose. This is an amendment of Section 2 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Section 2. The proceeds of such lands as are or hereafter may be granted by the United States for the use of schools within each township of this State shall remain a perpetual school fund to the State; and not more than one-third (⅓) of said lands may be sold in two (2) years, one-third (⅓) in five years, and one-third (⅓) in ten (10) years but the lands of the greatest valuation shall be sold first; provided, that no portion of said lands shall be sold otherwise than at public sale. The principal of all funds arising from sales or other disposition of lands or other property, granted or entrusted to this State in each township for educational purposes, shall forever be preserved inviolate and undiminished; and the income arising from the lease or sale of said school lands shall be distributed to the different townships throughout the State, in proportion to the number of scholars in each township, between the ages of five and twenty-one years and shall be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations.

"Investment of Funds.—Suitable laws shall be enacted by the legislature for the safe investment of the principal of all funds which have heretofore arisen or which may hereafter arise from the sale or other disposition of such lands, or the income from such lands accruing in any way before the sale or disposition thereof, in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, or of the State of Minnesota, issued after the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty (1860), or of such other state as the legislature may, by law, from time to time direct.

"Swamp Lands.—Division of proceeds. All swamp lands now held by the State, or that may hereafter accrue to the state, shall be appraised and sold in the same manner and by the same officers, and the minimum price shall be the same, less one-third (⅓), as is provided by law for the appraisement and sale of the school lands under the provisions of title one (1) of Chapter thirty-eight (38) of the General Statutes. The principal of all funds derived from sales of swamp lands, as aforesaid, shall forever be preserved inviolate and undiminished. One-half (½) of the proceeds of said principal shall be appropriated to the common school fund of the state. The remaining one-half (½) shall be appropriated to the educational and charitable institutions of the State in the relative ratio of cost to support said institutions."

and adds thereto the following:

"A revolving fund of not over Two Hundred Fifty Thousand Dollars ($250,000) may be set apart from the funds derived from the sale of school and swamp lands, to be used in constructing roads, ditches and fire breaks in, through and around unsold school and swamp lands, such fund to be replenished as long as needed from the enhanced value realized from the sale of such lands so benefited."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to permit the State to improve the school and swamp lands of the State out of moneys derived from the sale of such lands, and to bring the State into line with the conditions of the Swamp Land Grant as to drainage of such lands, by providing a revolving fund therefor, pending the ultimate application of the avails of such grant to the common school fund of the State and the educational and charitable institutions thereof.

FOURTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The fourth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 587 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is proposed to repeal the provisions of Section 11 of Article 9 of the Constitution, which section now reads as follows:

"Section 11. There shall be published by the treasurer, in at least one newspaper printed at the seat of government, during the first week in January in each year, and in the next volume of the acts of legislature, detailed statements of all moneys drawn from the treasury during the preceding year, for what purpose and to whom paid, and by what law authorized; and also of all moneys received, and by what authority and from whom."

EFFECT: The Constitution requires the treasurer to publish yearly a detailed statement of the moneys drawn from the treasury during the preceding year, giving the names of the persons to whom paid and the purposes for which it was expended. It also requires a like statement of the names of the persons, and the sources, as to money received, and in both cases a statement of the law under which payments were made, or money paid into the treasury. The effect of this amendment, if the same be adopted, will be to repeal the section of the Constitution mentioned and insofar relieve the treasurer from such publication and the State from the expense thereof. This change in the Constitution, however, would not prevent the Legislature from directing by law that such, or a different publication, of the same or other information, should be made by the treasurer.

FIFTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The fifth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 588 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to permit the permanent school and university funds of this State to be invested in first mortgage loans upon improved and cultivated farm lands of the State. This amendment would change Section 6 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which now reads as follows:

"Sec. 6. The permanent school and university fund of this state may be invested in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this state, but no such investment shall be made until approved by the board of commissioners designated by law to regulate the investment of the permanent school fund and the permanent university fund of this state; nor shall such loan or investment be made when the bonds to be issued or purchased would make the entire bonded indebtedness exceed fifteen (15) per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable real property of the county, school district, city, town or village issuing such bonds; nor shall such loans or indebtedness be made at a lower rate of interest than three (3) per cent per annum, nor for a shorter period than five (5) years, nor for a longer period than twenty (20) years, and no change of the town, school district, city, village or of county lines shall relieve the real property in such town, school district, county, village or city in this state at the time of the issuing of such bonds from any liability for taxation to pay such bonds."

"Section 6. The permanent school and university fund of this state may be invested in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this state, and in first mortgage loans secured upon improved and cultivated farm lands of this state. But no such investment or loan shall be made until approved by the board of commissioners designated by law to regulate the investment of the permanent school fund and the permanent university fund of this state nor shall such loan or investment be made when the bonds to be issued or purchased would make the entire bonded indebtedness exceed 15 per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the county, school district, city, town or village issuing such bonds; nor shall any farm loan or investment be made when such investment or loan would exceed 30 per cent of the actual cash value of the farm land mortgaged to secure said investment; nor shall such investments or loans be made at a lower rate of interest than three per cent per annum, nor for a shorter period than five years, nor for a longer period than thirty years, and no change of the town, school district, city, village or county lines shall relieve the real property in such town, school district, county, village or city in this state at the time of issuing of such bonds from any liability for taxation to pay such bonds.

EFFECT: The present Constitution authorizes the investment of the permanent school and university funds of this State in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this State. This amendment, if adopted, will permit in addition to the foregoing investments, said school and university funds to be invested also in first mortgage loans secured upon improved and cultivated farm lands of this State. The present Constitution provides that no investment shall be made for a longer period than twenty years, while the proposed amendment extends the period to thirty years.

SIXTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The sixth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 589 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to make the term of office of the Judge of Probate four years. This is an amendment of Section 7 of Article 6 of the Constitution, which now reads as follows:

"Section 7. There shall be established in each organized county in the State a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and be held at such time and places as may be prescribed by law. It shall be held by one judge, who shall be elected by the voters of the county for the term of two years. He shall be a resident of such county at the time of his election, and reside therein during his continuance in office; and his compensation shall be provided by law. He may appoint his own clerk where none has been elected; but the legislature may authorize the election, by the electors of any county, of one clerk or register of probate for such county, whose powers, duties, term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. A probate court shall have jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship, but no other jurisdiction, except as prescribed by this Constitution."

"Section 7. Probate Court—Judges to be Elected—Jurisdiction. "There shall be established in each organized county in the state a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and be held at such time and places as may be prescribed by law. It shall be held by one judge, who shall be elected by the voters of the county for the term of four years. He shall be a resident of such county at the time of his election, and reside therein during his continuance in office; and his compensation shall be provided by law. He may appoint his own clerk where none has been elected; but the legislature may authorize the election by the electors of any county, of one clerk or register of probate for such county, whose powers, duties, term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. A probate court shall have jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship, but no other jurisdiction except as prescribed by this Constitution."

EFFECT: The present Constitution provides that the office of Judge of Probate shall be two years and if this amendment is adopted the term of such office will be four years.

SEVENTH PROPOSED ADMENDMENT.

The seventh proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 590 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of said amendment is to fix and limit the number of State Senators.

Section 2 of Article 4 of the Constitution now reads as follows:

"Section 2. The number of members who compose the Senate and House of Representatives shall be prescribed by law, but the representatives in the Senate shall never exceed one member for every 5,000 inhabitants, and in the House of Representatives one member for every 2,000 inhabitants. The representation in both houses shall be apportioned equally throughout the different sections of the State, in proportion to the population thereof exclusive of Indians not taxable under the provisions of law."

It is proposed to substitute therefor the following:

"Section 1. That Section 2 of Article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota be amended so as to read as follows:

"Section 2. In the next and succeeding reapportionments of Senators and Representatives, the Senate shall be composed of sixty-three (63) members and the House of Representatives shall be composed of such number of members as may be prescribed by law. The representation in both Houses shall be apportioned as nearly as practicable, throughout the different sections of the states in proportion to the population thereof, exclusive of Indians not taxable under the provisions of law. Provided, however, that a County may be divided into several legislative districts, but no County or any of the parts thereof shall ever constitute or be a part of more than seven (7) Senatorial Districts and not more than seven (7) Senators shall ever be apportioned to any one County."

EFFECT: The object of this amendment is to limit the State Senate to sixty-three members and to prevent any one county having more than seven senators.

EIGHTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The eighth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 591 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to encourage the planting, cultivation and protection of useful forest trees and it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 9 of the Constitution, to be known as Section 17A, and which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article Nine (9) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, is hereby proposed to the people of the State of Minnesota, for their approval or rejection, which amendment, when adopted, shall be known as Section 17a of said Article Nine (9), that is to say:

"'Section 17a. For the purpose of encouraging the planting, cultivation and protection of useful forest trees in this state, laws may be enacted providing for the payment by the State of an annual bounty of not more than Two Dollars and Fifty Cents ($2.50) per acre, for a term, in each case of not more than Ten (10) years, and not exceeding Ten (10) acres, to any one person who shall plant, cultivate and protect useful forest trees upon his own land'."

EFFECT: This amendment, if adopted, will permit the Legislature to enact laws providing for the payment by the State of a limited bounty for a limited term, to persons who shall plant, cultivate and protect useful forest trees upon their own land.

NINTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The ninth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 592 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 8 of the Constitution to be known as Section 7 and which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article eight (8) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota is hereby proposed to the legal voters of said state for their approval or their rejection, which amendment when so approved shall be known as Section seven (7) of said Article eight (8) and shall read as follows:

"'Such of the school and other public lands of the state as are better adapted for the production of timber than for agriculture, may be set apart as state school forests, or other state forests as the legislature may provide, and the legislature may provide for the management of the same on forestry principles. The net revenue therefrom shall be used for the purpose for which the lands were granted to the state'."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will authorize the Legislature to set apart for state school forests or other state forests, state public lands which are better adapted for timber than for agriculture, and to manage the same upon forestry principles.

TENTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The tenth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 593 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

By this amendment it is proposed to add to Article 7 of the Constitution an entirely new section, providing for a recall, which shall read as follows:

Section 1. That Article Seven (7) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota shall be and the same is hereby amended by adding thereto, at the end of said Article, a new section, which shall be numbered Section 10 of said Article Seven (7) and which shall read as follows:

"Section 10. Every public official in Minnesota, elective or appointive, shall be subject to recall from office by the electors of his official or electoral district as herein provided. A petition demanding his recall setting forth the reasons therefor, signed by such number of electors in his district as shall be provided by law, which number shall not be less than twenty per centum or more than thirty per centum of the total number of votes cast for governor in such district at the last preceding election, shall be filed in the office where petitions for nomination to such office are filed, or in such other office as may be provided by law, and the officer in whose office such petition is filed, shall order a special election for such recall. If such official shall resign within five days after such petition is filed, the vacancy thereby created shall be filled as may be provided by law; but if he shall not so resign, such special election, to be held within twenty-five days after the filing of the petition, shall be called to determine whether such official shall be recalled. On the official ballot at such election shall be printed, in not more than two hundred words, the reasons for demanding the recall of such official as set forth in the petition, and in not more than two hundred words such official's justification of his course in office. Such official shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of such election shall be officially declared. No such petition shall be signed or filed against any official until he shall have held office six months; and no petition shall be signed or filed for the recall of any judicial official within sixty days of the decision, ruling or act complained of in the petition. Such additional legislation as may aid in the operation of this section and proceedings thereunder shall be provided by law. At such election no person shall be voted for, and the only proposition submitted shall be the recall of such official. Any person recalled, as provided in this section, shall be ineligible to fill the vacancy caused by his recall."

PURPOSE AND EFFECT: The purpose of this amendment is to enable a certain number of voters to petition and cause to be submitted to a vote the question of removing from office any elective or appointive public official.

ELEVENTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT

By this amendment it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 9 of the Constitution, to be known as Section 18, which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article 9 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota is hereby proposed to the people of the State for their approval or rejection, which amendment, if approved, shall be known as Section 18 of Article 9 of the Constitution and shall read as follows:

"'Section 18. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of dogs on a basis other than the value of the dog, and from the fund derived from such tax, authorizing payment of the damages sustained by the owners of other domestic animals by reason of injuries caused by dogs.'"

PURPOSE AND EFFECT: The present basis for taxing dogs is upon actual value. The proposed amendment, if adopted, will permit the Legislature to enact laws changing this basis. It is proposed to create a fund out of which owners of domestic animals may be reimbursed for loss sustained by reason of injuries caused by dogs.

Yours respectfully,
LYNDON A. SMITH,
Attorney General.

St. Paul, May 6, 1914.

Mr. Julius A. Schmahl,
Secretary of State.

Dear Sir: Referring to proposed Constitutional Amendment No. 4 would say: As state expert printer I have given the publications involved in this proposed amendment special thought, and am of opinion both these publications are entirely superfluous. The extensive annual publication "in a daily newspaper published at the capital city" attracts absolutely no attention. The annual report of the state treasurer is published in book form, and to an extent that makes it easy for every person specially concerned to secure a copy. To conform strictly with the law as it is at present, means the expenditure, under reasonably favorable printing contracts, of approximately $8,000, a sum which can be used to excellent advantage under conditions which ordinarily suggest the greatest care and economy upon the part of those under whose direction the printing fund is expended.

Yours respectfully,
J. T. MANNIX,
State Expert Printer.

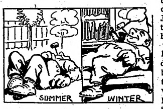
Tales of GOTHAM and other CITIES

It Is Either Too Hot or Too Cold for This Man

CHICAGO.—Jim Boyle is up against it. Jim was born with an unfortunate temperament peculiarly averse to temperatures. In fact, temperature, it might be said, is the bane of Jim's existence. It doesn't matter what kind of temperature. There seems to be only one degree of temperature at which Jim feels well enough to work and that degree isn't on the Chicago brand of thermometer.



Jim's misfortune was explained to Municipal Judge Fry in the court of domestic relations. It was explained by Mrs. James A. Boyle, who came all the way from her home at 1884 Milwaukee avenue especially for that purpose. Mrs. Boyle has wintered and summered with Jim for many years and therefore is qualified to tell the effects of heat and cold on his temperament.

"In the summer he lies out on the lawn, your honor," she said. "He complains of the heat and says it's too hot to work. Then we hope for winter, but when it comes he lies around the house and warms a lounge all day while I and the children suffer. He says it's too cold to venture out."

"How about it, Boyle?" asked Assistant State's Attorney Eugene O'Reilly.

"Well, you know that heat expands and cold contracts," Jim said. "My muscles seem to be governed by the temperature. They become loose and flabby in summer, so flabby I'm too weak to work. I just can't stand the heat. Then in winter they get cramped into hard knots when I go out of doors just like the rheumatism. Then when I stay inside by the fire where it's warm they get flabby again just like summer. Then I contract colds easily and the snow and hail and ice—"

"Is pretty thin," commented Judge Fry. "Pay your wife $4 a week, Boyle, and get a job, and get it quick. I'm going to keep tab on you."

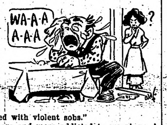
Champion Weeper Vanishes in Passion of Grief

DETROIT, MICH.—As a weeper, George Hughson was a success—which made him a distinct failure as a husband, his wife told Judge Mandell when her suit for divorce was tried. He wept and sobbed and talked about a secret sorrow during six years of married life, but he never would tell what it was that weighed down his heart.



"He was from the first a lugubrious man," said Mrs. Hughson. "He seemed to be thrusting a gnawing heartache into the background all the time he courted me, I thought, and he said that the happiness of being my husband would dispel his melancholy.

"But the morning after we were married he began to cry at the breakfast table. Great big tears rolled down his cheeks and he nearly choked with violent sobs."

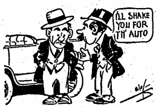
As time wore on George grew more and more addicted to weeping. A melancholy strain of music or a lively one—the sight of a hearse or an underdone steak were equally efficacious in starting him off on a mad career of sobs and tears that would continue by the hour. Mrs. Hughson said there was a certain awful fascination in watching that man weep. He did it so well. She never saw a woman who could weep like her husband. And he seemed to take pride in his accomplishment. He could get more agony out of that secret sorrow than most men could out of a bad case of hives.

Many a time did Mrs. Hughson ask George to unburden his heart. George never took the hint.

But one day his sorrow became an exhausting drain on his well-developed weeping abilities and he just up and left home.

Wall Street Men Are Raffling Their Automobiles

NEW YORK.—Nothing doing in Wall street? Don't you believe it. To be sure, brokers are not busy buying and selling stocks, because the exchange is closed. But they are busy raffling automobiles, placing bets on the date of the opening of the exchange, throwing dice—anything for excitement.



I'LL SHAKE YOU FOR TH' AUTO

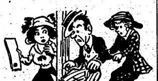
Wall and Broad streets are busy market places for secondhand cars. What is better than a spirited raffle when business is dull in the regular line? For a five or a ten-dollar bill it is possible to buy a chance on a $2,000 car. Even chances at $1 each are being sold. Forrest O. March put up his American underslung at auction last Wednesday, but being unable to get a satisfactory price he is going to raffle it off at $2 a chance and then start on his fall vacation.

Placing bets on the date of the reopening of the exchange is another favorite pastime. Although it was announced semi-officially that the exchange would not reopen until January 1, several brokers are betting that the doors will swing in November.

But the greatest activity of the brokers' brigade is in killing time. Brokers arrive at their offices just as early as in the days of heavy trading. They remain just as late. Even the curb brokers are on the asphalt from ten until three. J. Robinson Duff, who has been on the curb for years, declares he wouldn't know where to go if he didn't take his accustomed place.

Woman Didn't Believe in Taking Any Chances

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—They had just obtained their marriage license at the courthouse. The prospective bride, with the license in hand and a smile on her face, started to leave the courthouse entrance to the right of the corridor. The prospective bridegroom started to go out of the entrance to the left, thereby putting a post which divides the doorway between himself and his bride-to-be.



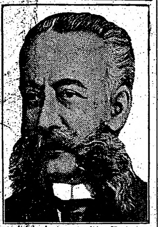
But Mr. Bridegroom-to-be never got past that post. A woman who accompanied the bride-to-be grasped the situation in an instant. The thought evidently flashed through her mind of the "bread and butter" days of her childhood when she saw the couple flirting with fate by ignoring the post.

So she acted. She grasped Mr. Bridegroom-to-be by the coattails so vigorously that all visions of matrimonial bliss, if he had any, must have scattered to the winds. Then she put the prospective bride and bridegroom together and saw that they both went on the same side of the post.

The bride-to-be laughed as her friend said: "I don't believe in taking any chances in getting started right anyway, do you?"

Mr. Bridegroom-to-be let a half-smile play on his lips. But he seemed to be thinking of something that wasn't, in his opinion, funny. Possibly he was picturing himself in the future trying to slip out of his door some night when he was stopped by a vigorous jerk on his coattails by his wife, who had taken the advice of her friend, and didn't believe in taking any chances in getting started right.

PRACTICAL HEAD OF RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT

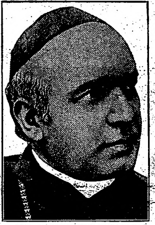


The government of Russia is practically in the hands of Prime Minister Goremykin. When he was made prime minister, February 13 of the present year, the rumors of approaching war began to spread in every capital of Europe. Goremykin has for many years been one of the leaders of the Nationalist party in Russian politics. The Nationalists stand for Pan-Slavism. They are the bitter foes of the Pan-Germanic doctrine which unites the Teutons of Germany and Austria. The Nationalists of Russia have, for some time, been openly in favor of a war which would make the Slavs supreme in Europe and check the growing encroachments of the Teutons in the Slav territory of the Balkans.

Goremykin was a member of the Russian cabinet when Nicholas II ascended the throne 20 years ago. He has been in the confidential counsels of his sovereign ever since, sometimes as a member of the cabinet and sometimes in a private capacity. He is now a man of seventy-five, enormously rich, having made his money largely through business affairs connected with the government which do not particularly redound to his honor. He was born to the hereditary principle of autocracy, was educated in it and has served it with conviction re-enforced by keen intellect all his life. He is an aristocrat in thought and adopts the pose of the aristocrat in his manner, apparently seeking to emphasize his condescension to the people when he appears before their representatives.

He succeeded Count Witte, the famous leader of the Liberal party, who was Russia's representative at Portsmouth, N. H., to settle the terms of peace which closed the Russo-Japanese war.

NEW PAPAL SECRETARY OF STATE

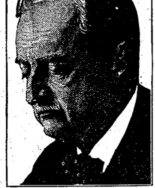


Cardinal Domenico Ferrata, secretary of the congregation of the holy office, whom the new Pope Benedict XV has appointed secretary of state, is regarded as the member of the Sacred college best fitted to occupy this office, second only in importance and influence to that of the papacy itself just at this time, because of the heavy burden resting upon the Vatican due to the war. He succeeds Cardinal Merry Del Val, secretary under Pope Pius X.

Cardinal Ferrata has had a diplomatic influence such as comes to few of the college of cardinals. He has had exceptional experience in ecclesiastical matters, and he has always manifested a friendly disposition toward the leading statesmen of Italy and the reigning house of Savoy. His choice of secretary is most pleasing to the Italian government, and it is prophesied he may do much to heal the breach between it and the Vatican.

The new secretary is sixty-seven years old. He was the papal legate to the world's eucharistic congress on the island of Malta in April, 1913, and on his return gave Pius X an extensive account of it. The cardinal was born at Montefiascono, diocese of Gradoli. He was created and proclaimed a cardinal June 22, 1896. He is archpriest of the Patriarchal Lateran Arch-Basilica. He was much mentioned as a possible successor of Pius X and has long been talked of for secretary of state.

REDMOND'S NOBLE SENTIMENT

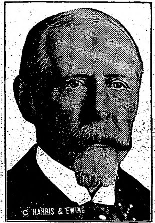


John Redmond, the Irish leader, in a manifesto issued recently, gives expression to noble sentiments. He declares that the Irish people appreciate the fact that the British democracy have decided to give them back their national liberties; that Ireland has promised that a concession of liberty would change dissatisfaction to friendship and good will, and that Ireland would be false to her history did she not willingly bear her share in the burdens and sacrifices of the present European war.

Finally he makes the following appeal:

"I would appeal to our countrymen of a different creed and of opposite political opinions to accept the friendship we have so consistently offered them and to allow this great war, as to which their opinions and ours are the same, to swallow up all the smaller issues in the domestic government of Ireland which now divide us. That as our soldiers are going to fight and shed their blood and die at each other's side in the same army and against the same enemy for the same high purpose their union in the field may lead to union in the home and that their blood may be the seal that will bring all Ireland together in one nation and in liberties equal and common to all."

HOLDS IMPORTANT POST

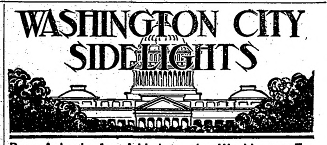


© HARRIS & EWING

Secretaries of state have come and gone, administrations have changed, but for more than a quarter of a century Alvey A. Adee, second assistant secretary of state, has stood at the helm of Uncle Sam's foreign relations and steered it into safe waters.

Mr. Adee is commonly credited with carrying the state department around in his head, so thoroughly versed is he in diplomatic precedent and requirement. Through long practice and good judgment the succeeding secretaries of state have come to rely implicitly on Mr. Adee's word in diplomatic matters.

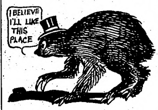
The war caught Mr. Adee on his annual leave, bicycling in France. He returned immediately. The sigh of relief that went up in the state department when the venerable secretary walked in, hung up his hat and started to work, was prodigious. Much of the work of handling matters with the war territories and that relating to stranded Americans has been handed over to Mr. Adee's jurisdiction, and everybody is happy at the state department now Mr. Adee is back in Washington.



WASHINGTON CITY SIDELIGHTS

Rare Animals Are Added to the Washington Zoo

WASHINGTON.—From the almost impenetrable wilds of South America have been brought to the Washington Zoological gardens a number of specimens of fauna and fowl, regarded as among the most interesting and rare of the present collection. Though it is impracticable to take in many birds and beasts at the present time, due to the crowded accommodations, officials say the new specimens were admitted on account of their rarity and their experimental worth, in determining whether they can withstand this climate and thrive on the food the zoologists are prepared to give them.



I BELIEVE I'LL LIKE THIS PLACE

Perhaps the oddest of the new acquisitions is a Venezuelan sloth, "as large as a tomcat," distinguished by the absence of teeth. The animal is described as inhabiting forests and feeding on the juices of fruits. It is a sluggish creature, and is a nocturnal prowler, seldom seen by day, as it hides in the hollows of the trees. Long claws and a soft coat of fur of protective coloring completes his characteristics. The animal was caught by William Feville, a collector of New York city, who makes periodical visits to the southern jungles in quest of animals to supply American zoos.

Another of the late additions is a Guiana weasel, slightly larger than the familiar American weasel. The possession of the latter completes a pair of these animals, as one was already in the local collection.

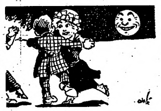
Other specimens supplied by Mr. Feville were a large number of birds from South America, all of them marked by luxuriant and beautiful plumage.

Rarest of these are a pair of motmots, so called from the character of their cry. They are related to the American kingfisher, and are distinguished by a growth of tail feathers of unusual length. They inhabit the densest forests and feed on insects and lizards. Their plumage is green and reddish brown, relieved by a prominent blue band across the forehead.

Considerable doubt is felt among their new guardians as to whether they can be kept here, unused as they are to the food and climate of this part of the world. They are the first the local zoo has had, and are regarded as extremely rare birds.

Moonlight Tango Under Monument a Capital Fad

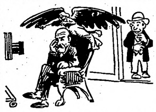
SOCIETY folk of the nation's capital have at last found something new. It is the "moonlight harvest tango," an outdoor affair, danced on the green sward surrounding the Washington monument. Here is the formula: One or two automobiles filled with women and their partners, dancing kind preferred. Add plenty of wraps to prevent dancers taking cold. One dash through the Speedway to a secluded spot on the Mall, where the headlights from the automobiles are used for illumination purposes. Spread laprobes carefully on the ground in Turkish fashion, for use after the dances. Use leather seats for tables. Carry full supply of grapejuice, lemonade, sandwiches and other refreshments. Turn on Victrola and tango. Several of these parties have been held recently. Congressional circles are all agog about the idea and it is hinted that the fad will even permeate into diplomatic and other circles.



The spot selected for the new dance is one of the most beautiful in Washington. Directly back of the White House is the wonderful Mall. It extends south of the executive mansion to the Potomac river, one or two miles. Beautiful drives skirt its boundaries.

Senator McCumber Sees Funny Side of Things

SENATOR PORTER JAMES M'CUMBER of North Dakota has a keen sense of the ridiculous, though to look at the serious expression of his smooth-shaven face one would never suspect it. But if there is anything funny on the horizon he will see it, even though he has to borrow a marine glass.



In a fashionable photographer's studio in town is an exquisitely carved chair used much for the posing of celebrities of the feminine sex in evening dress. The top is surmounted by a richly carved angel bending forward in a graceful attitude. It is a beautiful piece of work, but scarcely appropriate for the setting in which to place a Tammany alderman.

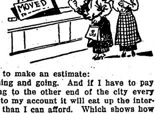
One day McCumber went to the studio to attend to a bit of business, and on his way out passed the "operating room," in which place Charles W. Fairbanks, then the vice-president, sat as the victim. He was posed in this elaborate chair, and just over his tall form hovered the wooden angel in its airy attire.

When McCumber went out he began to laugh, and a friend who saw him chuckling inquired the cause.

"Why, one of the richest sights I ever saw was just now up in Blank's photograph gallery," the senator replied, "for there sat Fairbanks looking as solemn as an owl in a big chair with an angel pecking at his bald spot."

How Uncle Sam Got in Bad With Capital Woman

OUR UNCLE SAM is in bad with one woman in this town, and there may be others. This one particular woman—so particular that she had drawn her little three hundred out of a first mortgage to put it in postal savings, so that she could feel that she "needn't worry, no matter what happened"—this woman went over to the postal grating at the Avenue post office and found the window closed. The department had been removed to the new building next to Union station.



Her companion—another woman—accepted the transfer with the equanimity of one who has no savings to bother over.

"I don't mind going with you. The car here will take us right to the door."

But the postal woman had paused to make an estimate:

"That means four car tickets, coming and going. And if I have to pay fare and lose so many minutes running to the other end of the city every time I want to add a couple of dollars to my account it will eat up the interest and cost more good working hours than I can afford. Which shows how stupid I was to sell that mortgage. Come along."

"All right. But we can't possibly walk it, you know. It's an awful distance to that new post office, and the doctor told me not to—"

But the postal woman intended neither to walk nor ride to any new postal window.

"Sorry I've got to move that money again, but— Want to go with me to see Mr. Blank about a new mortgage?"

GREAT BATTLES NOW RAGING IN BELGIUM AND POLAND

TWO IMPORTANT SUCCESSES ARE CREDITED ALLIES

ASSERTED ARMENTIERES HAS BEEN RE-OCCUPIED AND ADVANCE ON DUNKIRK CHECKED.

GERMAN REINFORCEMENTS ARE BEING BROUGHT UP

May Be Used for Purpose of Resuming Offensive Action in Attempting to Capture Calais—Reports Concerning Russia's Movements Disagree Very Much.

London, Oct. 20.—Two important successes in the battle of Dunkirk and Calais, for the possession of which the Germans are striving, are credited to the allies in the official communication issued in Paris.

Two Reported Victories.

The French are said to have reoccupied Armentieres, an important railroad junction on the Belgian frontier northwest of Lille, and to have repulsed an attempt of the Germans to cross the River Yzer, which flows through that little corner of West Flanders, which is all of Belgium that remains in Belgian hands.

This would mean a check to the German attempt to reach Dunkirk by the coast route. The French are said to have pushed back still further the German army which is advancing along the Belgian Frontier to the coast. The battle, which culminated in Armentieres again coming under French influence, lasted for a week, during which the fighting was hard and continuous.

Importance of Town.

The town was seized by the Germans a week ago owing to its importance as a railway center, lines diverging from it in all directions. Besides, it is on the road to Lille, which the Germans still hold, despite reports to the contrary.

The battle opened with cavalry fighting, which gradually developed into a general battle, which indicates the French are advancing in force towrd Lille.

The allies also have made an advance north of the La Basse canal, between that line and Arras, and at certain points between Arras and the Oise. This latter is a rather long front, but the claims in the French official communication are taken here to mean that the German movement westward has been checked.

For German Reinforcements.

The Germans, however, are bringing up reinforcements, seemingly determined to resume the offensive either toward Calais or at some other point of the long front.

In the center and in the Vosges the situation is stationary. This is not taken to mean that no fighting is taking place and it is considered likely that the battle on the Alsace frontier which has been going on for some days has yet to reach its end.

Russians Claim Repulses.

Again the Russians and the Austrians flatly contradict one another as to the progress of events in the east. The Austrians claim that the operations are progressing favorably for them, while an official report from Petrograd says that attempts by the Austrians to cross the river San failed and that in the fighting south of Przemysl, which took the form of bayonet charges, they captured 15 Austrian officers and 1,000 men.

It would appear from reports of correspondents at Petrograd that the Germans made repeated attempts to cross the Vistula at Josefow, but were driven back with heavy casualties. The correspondents say this fighting was part of the general attack on the Russian positions on the Vistula and that they proved a failure.

Teutons Plan Siege of Belfort.

From the Battle Front, Oct. 20, via Paris.—What in previous wars would have been called great battles were fought on the eastern wing of the fighting line stretching from the Belgian coast to Switzerland. In this great battle of nations, however, these fights are regarded merely as incidents.

Sanit-die, on the Meurthe, 32 miles northeast of Epinal, was the center of the attac which resulted in a repulse for the Germans with heavy casualties.

The Germans have brought up 19-inch mortars, supposedly for an intended siege of Belfort.

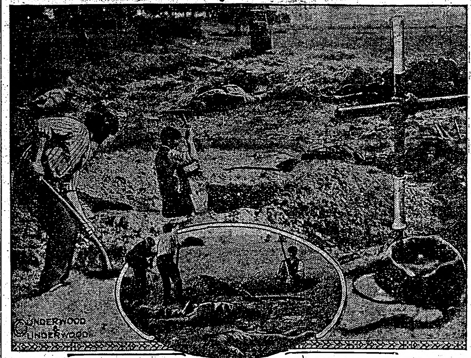
Servians Defeat Austrians.

Paris, Oct. 20.—Austrians again have been defeated in Servian territory near the Drina, says a Havas agency dispatch from Nish. "They attacked the Servian right with infantry and artillery on Mount Goutchevo, but were met by a terrible fire and retired. They came back three times. Finally, the Austrian infantry was in part annihilated and the remainder put to rout.

Fire Proves Annihilating.

"A column of their infantry in the ravines of the Save river fell under a cross fire from the Servian artillery and perished. At the same time the Servians, taking the offensive to the north, threw the enemy back on the Drina. Many were drowned and 600 were taken prisoners."

GATHERING THE HARVEST OF DEATH IN EUROPE



All along the valley of the Marne and the country round about over which the immense armies of Germany and the allies fought as the former advanced toward Paris and then fell back the French peasants have been busy with the grim task of burying the dead soldiers. Scenes like those in the illustration were repeated endlessly. At the right is seen the simple cross marking the grave of a French soldier, his cap and scarf at its foot.

Appearance Excites Commotion.

London, Oct. 19.—The entrance of the Germans into Ostend is described by the Daily Mail's correspondent who left that port at the moment of the German occupation.

"Their appearance excited a tremendous commotion among the hundreds of refugees who had been unable to get away and stood panicstricken on the quays," says the correspondent. "There was an outburst of groans and hoots mingled with scream and cries."

Alarm at Bordeaux.

Bordeaux, Oct. 19.—The war situation on the northern frontier of France is understood to be viewed with increased apprehension in well informed circles. It is reported that the Germans are extending their control of the north coast toward Dunkirk and Calais.

With its battle line from the German frontier to the English channel thus shortened, the German front will gain in weight, and as the French army has been unequal to the task of turning the Germans' flang when thinly extended, it is now feared that the entire German line may eventually advance successfully on Paris.

Pressure Not Relieved.

London, Oct. 19.—Fulfillment of the promise that pressure would be taken off France and Belgium when the big battle commenced in the East again has been delayed. The Germans are before Warsaw—in fact fighting has taken place only eight miles from that city.

Germans Retrieve Austrian Losses.

While their advance to the Niemen was a failure, the forces of Emperor William apparently have retrieved some defeats of the Austrians in Galicia and advanced as far as Jarozlau, 17 miles northwest of Przemysl. The German plan seems to be to have two armies advancing along the left bank of the Vistula river while two other armies swing around on the right bank to take the defenders of Warsaw on their flank.

This, according to Russian accounts, suits the Russian general staff, who are said purposely to have withdrawn to the Vistula so that they would have the railways at their back while the Austro-German forces would have to advance great distances on roads which at this time of the year are little more than quagmires.

Both Claim Advantage.

Both sides claim to have gained advantages in the preliminary fighting, but these victories and defeats can have little effect on the general result of the battle in which it is estimated that nearly 5,000,000 men are engaged. The Russians, it is said, have 2,500,000 men and the Austro-German force is declared to total nearly 2,000,000. The armies cover a front of nearly 300 miles.

Russia Explains Withdrawal.

London, Oct. 15.—Advices received from Petrograd assert the withdrawal of the czar's troops into the Warsaw region was for strategical reasons to lure the Germans into positions favorable to the Russian army before giving battle. The German army is now said to be in possession of all of Poland with the exception of the territory immediately surrounding Warsaw.

Germans Occupying All Belgium.

This final change followed quickly upon the German westward advance, which was begun immediately after the fall of Antwerp. Success in taking the chief port of Belgium opened the way for a new plan of campaign which embraces the occupation of the whole of Belgium, including the coast town and, if possible, some of the northern French ports. In accordance with this plan, the German invaders have begun to sweep across northern Belgium.

IMPORTANT DEVELOPMENTS

The official Paris statement claims two important successes for the allies. It was reported the French had re-occupied Armentieres and the allied armies had repulsed the Germans attempting to cross the river Yzer. These, together with further advancement along the Belgian frontier, claimed in the French communique, are declared to check the German coast advances toward Dunkirk and Calais.

Field Marshal Sir John French, commander of the British expeditionary force, has sent two highly interesting reports to the war department relative to the battle on the Aisne and other matters connected with the operations of his troops in France. He describes the valiant work of his generals and incidentally tells of severe British losses. An idea of these can be obtained in the figures which he gives, showing that during the period between Sept. 12 and Oct. 8, 561 officers and 12,980 men were among the killed, wounded and missing.

The steamer Brindilla, flying the American flag, but a former German hull, has been seized by British ships and conducted into Halifax. It is claimed she carries contraband of war.

* * *

Throughout their sphere of operations, Servia reports says, the Servians are sweeping everything before them. It is not believed here, however, that very serious fighting has been taking place there recently, as the weather and condition of the roads must have been against it.

* * *

In the eastern theater of war the Germans are reported within eight miles of Warsaw, but late reports do not tell of any notable battles. It is claimed that the Russians have purposely fallen back to have the rollroads at their backs, while the Austro-German troops must advance over veritable quagmires.

Great Aerial Exploit.

By International News Service.

Paris, Oct. 16.—The most dashing exploit of the French airmen since the beginning of the war was the complete rout of a divsion of German cavalry which they shelled from the air. The official communique says the aviators pursued the cavalrymen all day, ceaselessly pouring bombs upon them and inflicting heavy losses.- reached here from the north show that the Germans had crossed the frontier and were advancing towards the Hazelbouck region when they were met by a stronger French force. The preliminary skirmishes went in favor of the French, and the Germans, seeing the road absolutely barred, began an orderly retreat.

BRITISH SHIP AND 400 LOST

GERMANS SCORE ANOTHER VICTORY IN NORTH SEA.

Hawke Struck Amidships By Torpedo Is Immediately Destroyed—Full Particulars Withheld.

London, Oct. 17.—Great Britain has lost another cruiser through the activity of the German submarine fleet. The cruiser Hawke, utilized for scouting purposes off the German naval base in the North sea, has been torpedoed and sunk with a loss of from four to five hundred officers and men.

The disaster took place at a point in the North sea whose location is withheld by the admiralty. The Hawke was steaming along when it was struck almost amidships by a torpedo sent by a submarine and almost torn to pieces.

The admiralty has given out the following announcement concerning the loss of the Hawke:

"His majesty's ship, Theseus, Captain Hugh Edwards, was attacked by a submarine in the northern waters of the North sea yesterday but was missed. His majesty's ship, Hawke, Captain H. P. E. T. Williams, was attacked about the same time and was sunk.

"The following officers with 49 men of the crew have been landed at Aberdeen from a trawler: Boatswain Sydney Austin, Gunner James Dennis and Acting Gunner Harry Evitt. The remaining officers and men are missing.

"Further particulars will be published as soon as available.

"The Hawke was a cruiser built in 1889."

FREE STATE COMMANDANTS WOULD CRUSH UPRISING.

Boers Reported to Have Denounced Maritz's Revolt as Blot on Honor of Country—Action Considered Significant.

London, Oct. 19.—"At a meeting of commandants representing all the Free State north of Bloenfontein held at Kroonstad," a dispatch to the Reuter Telegram company from Pretoria says, "a resolution was unanimously adopted denouncing as a blot on the honor of the Free State the rebellion started in the northwest of the cape provinces by Colonel Maritz. The resolution pledged the fullest support of the commandants to the government and requested a mobilization of the burghers to crush the rebellion.

"General Jan Christian Smutz, minister of defense, thanked the commandants for their tender of support. He said, however, a mobilization was unnecessary as it would put more men in the field than needed.

"The action taken by the Kroonstad meeting is considered significant, as heretofore the people of the Congo Free State were lukewarm concerning the campaign against the Germans."

Attack Germans in London.

London, Oct. 19.—Anti-German rioting here seems to have been more general than was at first supposed. Seventy bakeries, butcher shops and saloons were wrecked. The police were called out and 20 arrests were made.

FINANCING OF BIG COTTON CROP NOW SEEMS ASSURED

$150,000,000 FUND APPARENTLY MADE CERTAIN BY PLAN PERFECTED BY PLANTERS AND NEW YORK BANKERS.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD IS TO DIRECT LOANING

Secretary McAdoo Said to Have Indorsed This Course—New York Financiers to Subscribe $50,000,000 Upon Condition That Country Take Remainder.

New York, Oct. 16.—The raising of a $150,000,000 fund by bankers and representatives of Southern cotton planters to finance the country's cotton crop is virtually assured, it is announced here, and the federal reserve board at Washington will be called upon to manage the fund and direct the loaning of it.

New York Raises $50,000,000.

New York bankers at a conference with cotton planters' representatives here during the day, agreed, it is stated, to furnish $50,000,000, if the rest of the county would supply $100,000,000 or more under conditions agreed to at the conference.

Festus J. Wade, president of the Mercantile National bank of St. Louis, and a member of the St. Louis Clearing House association, issued a statement announcing the plan. Mr. Wade said that "the task put upon the federal reserve board, while onerous, was readily accepted by Secretary McAdoo, who recognized the gravity of the situation."

Mr. Wade attended the conference and later went to Washington to discuss the plan with members of the federal reserve board. Several prominent St. Louis business men, who came to New York with Mr. Wade, accompanied him to Washington.

A Definite Conclusion.

Mr. Wade set forth that a definite conclusion was reached between the St. Louis committee and New York bankers,

"By the action of the New York bankers," the statement says, "it may be safely assumed that the fund undoubtedly will be raised within the next few days.

"The difficulty encountered was to determine how the syndicate could be managed and money loaned at the least possible expense to the borrower, and after many conferences and telephonic communications between Washington and New York it was finally concluded to turn over the entire fund to the federal reserve board at Washington, who would act as managers of the same and direct the loaning of the fund. The outline of the plan agreed upon is as follows:

The Plan in Brief.

"Organize $150,000,000 cotton fund throughout the United States, which fund shall be turned over to and managed by the federal reserve board at Washington and loaned to the national currency association or to the federal reserve banks. All loans to be made payable on or before one year at the option of the borrower, with the right to the federal board to extend any or all such loans made for two periods of six months each, interest on such loans to be at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"All loans to be made at not to exceed 6 cents per pound, middling basis, to be secured by approved warehouse receipts for cotton property insured.

Fund Called For As Needed.

"The fund to be called for by the federal reserve board in such installments as may be necessary.

"New York financial institutions will subscribe $50,000,000 under above conditions toward such fund, provided the balance of the country subscribes not less than $100,000,000.

"The details are to be worked out by a committee to be appointed by the federal reserve board which will unquestionably have the support of every part of the country.

"It is recognized that the caring for the surplus cotton crop is a national problem, one which interests all manufacturing industries commercial establishments, agricultural resource transportation companies and financial interests, and which undoubtedly will receive universal support throughout the nation."

Progressive Editor Slays Man.

San Bernardino, Cal., Oct. 16.—Howard E. Davis, secretary of the Progressive county central committee and editor of the Evening Index, shot and killed Ben Emerson, a local sportsman. Davis says Emerson attacked him.

Canal Blocked Over Week.

Panama, Oct. 19.—Colonel George W. Goethals, governor of the Panama canal zone, said it would be ten days before the canal would be ready again for traffic, which has just been suspended as a result of the landslide on the east side of the waterway, north of Gold hill. Colonel Goethals said he would have the channel ready for 30-foot draft ships by Oct. 27, barring accidents. It is planned by then to have the channel 100 feet wide and 30 feet deep along the west bank, where channel was least affected.

Miss Callie Hoke Smith, daughter of the senator from Georgia, is aiding the campaign to help the cotton raisers of the South by giving prizes to the three school children who write the best essays on cotton.

WOUNDED BROUGHT TO U. S.

THOSE INJURED AT NACO TRANSFERRED ACROSS BORDER.

American Government Permits Removal After Carranza Makes Pledge—Feared Atrocities. Atrocities.

Naco, Ariz., Oct. 20.—Two hundred and fifty Mexicans, wounded during the attack on Naco, Sonora, were brought to this city through special permission from the Washington government. The Carranza government has promised they will be attended without expense to the Amelrcan state or national government.

This action came as a result of an appeal made through Governor Hunt, in which it was asserted that if the Mexican town was taken by Governor Maytorena's Indians the wounded would be killed,

Only 47 patients were allowed to remain, the permission for their reception conveying only those seriously wounded. The examination by the American army surgeons caused the rejection of most of the cases. One of those received died later. His body was returned to Naco, Sonora, for burial.

Three of the patients are Yaqui Indians, whose execution was prevented by a Mexican nurse.

It was planned to send the wounded to Douglas, where there are better hospital facilities, but so far authority to do this has not been given.

Provost Marshal Captain Cowan has taken charge of the hospital in the Naco opera house.

Both sides during the prolonged battle have been threatening to execute the wounded.

WOMEN'S CLUBS ARE MERGED

Seventeen National Organizations United—Memorial to Late Wife of President.

Pittsburg, Pa., Oct. 19.—Delegates representing 17 national organizations of women decided on the permanent organization of a national central body to be known as the Council of National Organizations of Women.

The organization will be completed at Washington in November of next year. It will take the place of the National Council of Women of the United States and will include more organizations than the present council.

Mrs. Archibald Hopkins of Washington asked the delegates to have their organizations give financial support to the movement for a memorial in Washington to Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, late wife of the president.

The memorial will take the form of a block of sanitary dwellings with an interior playground and model park.

Aid for "Christmas Ship."

Washington, Oct. 16.—American railroads may transport free of charge, if they decide to do so, gifts made by the children of the United States for presentation on Christmas day to the children made orphans by the European war. This ruling was announced by the interstate commerce commission to aid the sending of a "Christmas ship, abroad.

Carman Murder Trial On.

Mineola, N. Y., Oct. 19.—Mrs. Florence Conklin Carman, wife of Dr. Edward Carman of Freeport, was placed on trial in the supreme court here, charged with the murder on June 30 last of Mrs. Louise Bailey. Forty-three witnesses have been subpienaed. In her cell Mrs. Carman held a final conference with her attorneys and with her husband, in whose office Mrs. Bailey was shot and killed. Mrs. Carman said she was anxiously awaiting the opportunity to tell her story.

STATE'S BUSINESS SHOWS BIG GAINS

AMOUNT PASSING THROUGH THE STATE TREASURY MORE THAN DOUBLES IN 5 YEARS.

$43,358,955 HANDLED IN 1914

Funds Alone Involve More Than $3,000,000 This Month—New Year Began August 1 and Cash Balance of $2,749,578 Shown.

St. Paul.—The total annual amount of receipts and disbursements of the office of Walter J. Smith, state treasurer, have increased about $25,000,000 in the last five years, according to a report.

Enormous Business Transacted.

In the last year the total business of the state treasurer's office increased about $7,000,000 over the fiscal year ending July 31, 1913. From these figures may be realized the enormous amount of business being conducted by the state and the prosperity of Minnesota.

The total receipts and disbursements for the last five years follow:

1910	$18,133,907.06
1911	$31,976,838.00
1912	32,126,368.12
1913	36,769,163.37
1914	43,384,955.21

Faces Heavy Month.

This month the state treasurer will handle $3,447,852.60 for schools of the state alone. Part of this is apportioned to schools from the general school fund and part comprises state aid, which is paid from the general revenue fund. Following are the amounts sent out for aid of high and graded schools and for semi-graded and rural schools on August 1 of each year:

1912	$1,219,800.00
1914	1,962,975.00

1912	$1,331,520.30
1913	1,450,974.30
1914	1,484,877.60

Will Spend $12,000,000.

The amount of appropriations made available for the year beginning August 1, 1914, by the legislature of 1913, is $9,363,075. The total amount of balance carried over from 1913 was $2,749,578.39, making a total of $12,112,653.39 available for disbursement. This money is all handled and accounted for by the state treasurer.

PRISONERS BATTER WAY OUT

Four Escape From St. Cloud Prison—Two Other Inmates Immediately Recaptured.

St. Cloud.—Battering a hole through the old wooden stockade around the state reformatory here four inmates of the institution escaped.

Two were recaptured an hour later in the woods near the institution where they were hiding, but the others are still at large.

The escape came as the men were being called in from their work. The four used an iron bar to break through the wall. The spot chosen was near the wall guard's post and more than one hundred shots were fired at the fleeing inmates, none taking effect. It also was near the new granite wall being built around the prison.

It is said to be the first time in the history of the reform school that so many have escaped at one time.

Notifications have been sent out and guards are searching for the men. It is believed they will be captured soon.

William Parker, 25 years old, of Ontario, sentenced for grand larceny from Polk county, and Vernon R. Leach, 20 years old, of Princeton, sentenced for grand larceny from Mille Lacs county, are still at large. Sloren Townsend and E. C. Brown were captured within an hour after they escaped.

Popcorn Seller Robbed.

Winona.—Hold-ups continue in Winona. The latest was the holding up in Windom square of Bernard Williams, 12 years old, a popcorn seller. The man who held him up took 65 cents he had in his pocket. A good clew as to the thief's identity is being followed up by the police.

Governor's Motion Denied.

Duluth.—Governor Eberhart has failed i his effort to get a change of venue from St. Louis county to Ramsey county for the trial of a mandamus proceeding instituted against him by Willis J. Holmes. Holmes bought a tract of land at a county auditor's sale, May 12, which was sold for delinquent taxes. When he presented the certificate of sale to the governor, June 10, and asked that a deed be executed to him, the governor refused, he alleges.

PARDON BOARD HEARS PLEAS

Five Pardoned and Terms of Thirteen Shortened at Last Meeting—Application of Martin Rejected.

St. Paul.—August Carlson Ferm, who was committed to Stillwater prison for seven and one-half years after being convicted of killing his cousin on a hog farm in Golden Valley in the summer of 1909, is a free man by the grace of the state pardon board. The two men had quarreled following a drinking bout. Ferm was one of five men in prison restored to liberty by the board. Thirteen others received commutation of sentence, which either gives them immediate liberty or makes them eligible to parole.

Cyril Bolduc, sentenced from Minneapolis, for six months, charged with intoxication and obtaining money under false pretenses.

Horace Parsons, sentenced from Wadena county, May 25, 1914, indeterminate sentence for abandonment of wife and family.

John M. Harris, sentenced from St. Louis county, August, 1911, to four years' imprisonment for grand larceny, first degree.

Terms are Shortened.

Commutations of sentence were granted to the following:

Daniel Jernberg, sentenced from Sherburne county, Nov. 19, 1909, to the state prison for 15 years, commuted to 10 years.

Hardy Nory, sentenced from Minneapolis, March 19, 1907, to state reformatory for grand larceny in second degree, commuted to five years.

George W. Donley, sentenced from Stearns county, April 5, 1913, to prison on indeterminate sentence for grand larceny in second degree, commuted to two years.

Bradford Vorshall, sentenced from St. Louis county, March 9, 1911, to prison for 10 years for assault in first degree, commuted to seven years.

William O'Hagan, from Wright county, Dec. 18, 1913, to the state reformatory, arson third degree, commuted to two years.

John Kondolis, sentenced from Clay county, Dec. 12, 1913, to prison on indeterminate sentence for manslaughter in first degree, commuted to be eligible for parole.

Oral John Herrick, from Chippewa county, Dec. 6, 1913, to reformatory, forgery second degree, commuted to two years.

Noah Kirkpatrick, from Ottertail county, April 29, 1914, to reformatory for grand larceny in second degree, commuted to six months.

Tom Tomczyk, from Stearns county, April 15, 1914, to reformatory for forgery in the third degree, commuted to two years.

Emanuel Valverde, St. Paul, Aug. 7, 1914, Ramsey county workhouse for 90 days for petit larceny, commuted to 65 days.

Horace Schloss, from Ramsey county, Sept. 23, 1913, to reformatory for grand larceny, commuted to 18 months.

Henry Cloega from St. Louis county, December, 1912, to prison for five years for forgery in the second degree, commuted to three years.

Harry S. Brown, from Sherburne county, Nov. 10, 1908, to prison for 10 years for assault in the first degree, commuted to be eligible for release in the sgring.

NEW APPEAL FOR FORESTS

Governor and University President Join in Plea for Support of Amendment 9.

Minneapolis.—An appeal signed by Governor A. O. Eberhart and President George E. Vincent and Dean A. F. Woods of the University of Minnesota, and State Forester W. T. Cox was issued by the Minnesota Forestry association to the public, under the heading, "An Appeal to Save our Forests." The appeal urges the public to take memberships in the association and so contribute to the fund for advertising "amendment No. 9," the state forestry amendment to be voted on Nov. 3.

The appeal begins:

"An emergency faces the friends of our forests. On Nov. 3 will be decided the fate of the forests still owned by the state. Shall we allow this small remainder to be ruined as in the past, or shall we adopt a better method?

"This better method will be submitted to popular vote on election day. It is embodied i the state forests amendment, the ninth on the ballot.

"As most of the amendments usually fail, the Minnesota Forestly association is attempting to inform every voter of the crisis at hand. We dare not let this measure follow the fate of the others."

May Know of Murderer.

Owatonna.—Four witnesses are being held here in the belief that they know the whereabouts of H. Lucas, wanted for the murder of Philip Meehan. The police believe the men are conspiring to withhold information. Advices from Rochester indicate that a suspect resembling the description of Lucas is being held there. Local authorities will investigate.

Winona Pastor Is Moderator.

Duluth.—Rev. Robert Brown, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Winona, was chosen moderator of the Presbyterian synod of Minnesota at the opening meeting at the Glen Avon Presbyterian church here. One hundred and fifteen delegates were present. Mr. Brown succeeded Rev. Samuel P. White of Bemidji, who was moderator last year.

Pet Tarantula Disrupts Home.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Declaring that her health has been shattered by the conduct of her husband, whom she alleges has made a pet of a tarantula, Mrs. Grace B. Wallen has filed suit in district court for divorce from C. E. Wallen. A month ago Mrs. Wallen had her husband examined before Court Commissioner W. E. Bates as to his sanity. At that time Mr. Wallen said he had no fear of the trantula and brought it home merely to frighten his wife.

SAYS CUYUNA ISN'T 'SPOTTY'

Mining Men Deny Withdrawal From Field of Big Range Concern.

Brainerd.—Reports that Jones & Laughlin have surrendered thir Cuyuna range options are denied by many mining men who have a knowledge of range conditions. Jones & Laughlin are drilling properties having low grade concentrating ores in section 18, township 46, range 29, owned by George H. Crosby.

There are some lean and some low grade ore bodies on the Cuyuna range, but talk of the range being "spotty" is unfair. However, it is too much to expect the Cuyuna to be another Mesabi.

Mines now shipping are the Armour No. 2, the Cuyuna-Mille Lacs and the Cuyuna-Duluth. The Kennedy at Cuyuna is stockpiling. The Croft at Crosby, the Brainerd-Cuyuna in Brainerd and the Wilcox at Woodrow are shaft-sinking. The Wilcox mine expects to do some shipping before the season closes.

The Cuyuna-Mille Lacs and Cuyuna-Duluth mines are about to ship their stockpiles.

BOYS LIVE IN CITY STREETS

Won't Return Home As Life of Wandering Appeals to Them More Than Home.

Minneapolis.—A story of street gamins which reads like a Dickens novel or a chapter by Victor Hugo, was told in juvenile court by a 12-year-old boy arrested after two weeks' absence from home.

The little fellow refused to return to his parents and declared that scores of boys in Minneapolis are skipping out, as they call it, sleeping anywhere and doing odd jobs for a bite to eat.

"I ran away two weeks ago," he said, "because I had stayed out late without premission and was afraid to go home. The first night I slept in a hallway in Bridge Square district. Now I've got an office on Washington avenue, but I won't tell you where it is.

"The first day or two I had a pretty hard time, but after that it was easy. I ran errands and sometimes peeled potatoes in restaurants. I can almost always pick up enough money to live on."

SELECT RESERVE BANK HEAD

Directors of Ninth District Arrange Details for Establishing Institution—Wold Is Governor.

Minneapolis.—The board of directors of the ninth district federal reserve bank met and selected the governor for the new bank, named the representative of this district on the council to advise the federal reserve board, and practically decided upon the quarters for the bank.

Theodore Wold, president of the Scandinavian National bank, was selected as governor of the new bank. The position is equivalent to president of the instituion.

C. T. Jaffray, vice president of the First National bank, was named as representative of the ninth district on the advisory council.

The main floor of the New York Life building probably will be the quarters of the new bank.

Prepare For Bryan Luncheon.

St. Paul.—Not more than 400 will be allotted seats at the luncheon to be given Secretary of State William J. Bryan at the Saint Paul October 27. This has been decided definitely by the committee in charge of arrangements and the first 400 to apply for reservations, sending or bringing $1 with the application, will be supplied. Secretary Bryan will come to Minnesota from the Dakotas. He will speak at the State University in the morning, at the luncheon in St. Paul at noon and at Minneapolis in the evening.

Jealousy Likely Prompted Murder.

Duluth.—Jealousy is said to have prompted the murder of Michael Spejar by Joseph Karakos in an Austrian boarding house at Virginia the other night. Mrs. Karakos entered the house prior to the shooting. Her presence in the room is said to have caused a quarrel between the men and when Karakos whipped out a revolver and flourished it over his head, his wife, according to her story, ran to a neighboring house for shelter.

Two Stores Are Robbed.

Albert Lea.—Skinner, Chamberlain & Co.'s department store and Andrew Boyum's tailor shop were entered by burglars and in both the invaders secured much merchandise.

Minnesota Wars On "Hoboes."

St. Paul.—Governor A. O. Eberhart in a formal order directs all sheriffs to take extraordinary measures in suppressing crimes by gangs of tramps and to imprison and disarm such bands. "During the past few months there have been reported to this office a number of depredations and crimes committed by large bands of so-called 'hoboes,'" says the order. "These bands are often armed, have infested trains, broken open cars, terrorised and murdered trainmen and committed numerous burglaries."

CORRESPONDENT GIVES A GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF FALL OF ANTWERP

International News Service.

London.—A correspondent writing from Bergen-op-Zoom, Holland, gives a vivid description of the entry of the German army into Antwerp.

The bulk of the kaiser's force did not enter the city until Saturday afternoon, when 60,000 men passed in review before General von Schultz, military governor of Antwerp, and Admiral von Schroeder, who, surrounded by a glittering staff, sat their horses in front of the royal palace in the Place de Meir.

"For five hours the mighty host poured through the streets of the deserted city, while the houses shook to the thunder of their tread," he writes. "Company after company, regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade, swept past until the eye grew weary of watching the ranks of gray under slanting lines of steel.

"As they marched they sang, the canyon formed by the high buildings along the Place de Meir echoing to their voices roaring out 'Die Wacht am Rhein' and 'A Mighty Fortress Is Our God.'

Like an Election Parade.

"Each regiment was headed by its field music and colors, and when darkness fell and street lamps were lighted the shrill music of fifes, the rattle of drums and the tramp of marching feet reminded me of a torchlight election parade.

"Hard on the heels of the infantry rumbled artillery, battery after battery.

"Behind the field batteries rumbled the quick firers—the same pompoms whose acquaintance I had made at Weerde and elsewhere. And then, heralded by a blare of trumpets and a crash of kettledrums, came the cavalry, cuirassiers in helmets and breastplates of burnished steel, hussars in befrogged jackets and fur busbies, and finally the uhlans, riding amid forests of lances under a cloud of fluttering pennons.

"But this was not all, nor nearly all, for after the uhlans came the blue jackets of the naval division, broad-shouldered, bewhiskered fellows, with caps worn rakishly and a roll of the sea in their gait.

"Then the Bavarian infantry in dark blue, the Saxon infantry in light blue, and Austrians in uniforms of beautiful silver gray, and last of all a squadron of gendarmes in silver and bottle green.

"As that fighting machine swung past I could not but marvel at how the gallant, chivalrous and courageous but ill-prepared little army of Belgium had held it back as long as it had.

Few See Entry.

"The most remarkable feature of this wonderful spectacle was that there were comparatively few persons to see it. So far as onlookers were concerned the Germans might as well have marched through the streets of Pompeii. Another American and I, standing on the balcony of the American consulate, were the only spectators, so far as I know, in the whole length of the Place de Meir, which is the State street of Antwerp. It reminded me of a circus that had come to town a day before it was expected."

A feature of the procession was a victoria drawn by a fat white horse and with two soldiers on the box, which accompanied a regiment of Bavarians. Both horse and carriage were decorated with flowers. It was evidently a species of triumphal chariot, for it was filled with hampers of champagne.

Pay for What They Take.

The correspondent says the German soldiers treat the townspeople with consideration, paying in German silver for what they take from the shops. Describing the fear of the Antwerp citizens when the kaiser's soldiers entered, the correspondent says:

"When the main body of troops began entering the city on Saturday morning the townspeople—those who had not escaped from the city—rushed out with beer, cheese, bread and flowers, evidently with the idea of placating them by means of their pitiful little offerings. It was not a pleasant sight, but these people have been so terrified by tales of German barbarities that one can hardly blame them."

The correspondent estimates that less than one hundred civilians were killed during the bombardment.

Havoc Wrought by Shells.

Telling of the rain of shells which swept the city, he says:

"A 42-centimeter shell tore completely through a handsome stone house next door to United States Consul General Diederich's residence, crossed the street and exploded in the upper story of a school. There is not a block in the Boulevard Leopold that does not contain several shattered houses. No buildings were damaged in Place de Meir, though three shells struck the pavement, tearing holes as large as a grand piano.

"A shell entered the roof of the Hotel St. Antoine, passed through two bathrooms and exploded in the room occupied 48 hours before by the Russian minister, destroying everything in it.

Cathedral Struck.

"The cathedral was struck only by one shell, which entered through the wall over the western entrance and exploded over the side chapel. The American Express company's offices on the Quai van Dyck were slightly damaged. A shell struck the house occupied by an American named Hunt and the Dutch consul and blew the entire second floor into smithereens.

"A Zeppelin hovered over the city during Thursday morning's bombardment, dropping occasional bombs.

"Though the German shrapnel created enough havoc, it was child's play compared to the damage done by the siege guns. When a 42-centimeter shell struck a house it not merely blew a hole in it, it simply demolished it, the whole house collapsing into ruin as if shaken to pieces by an earthquake."

Almost as much damage was caused by fires resulting from the bombardment as from the shells themselves. The entire west side of the Marcheux Souliers from the head of the Place de Meir to the Place Verte, including the Hotel de Europe, the Cafe Royale and a line of fashionable shops opposite the Hotel St. Antoine, was destroyed. A quarter of a mile of buildings in the Rue van Bree, including the handsomest apartments in the city, are nothing but charred walls. The handsome block in the Rue de la Justice is completely burned. In addition several hundred dwellings scattered through the city have been burned to the ground.

Dynamite Saves Cathedral.

As the city is without water, except such as can be pumped from the river, the firemen were powerless to check the flames. That every building on the Place Verte and very probably the cathedral itself, was not burned is due to an American resident, Charles Whithoff, who, realizing the extreme gravity of the situation, suggested to the German military authorities that they dynamite the surrounding buildings.

At ten o'clock at night word was sent to Brussels and at four o'clock in the morning six automobiles with dynamite arrived and the walls were blown up, the German soldiers standing on the roofs of neighboring buildings and throwing dynamite bombs.

"It was a lively night for every one concerned," says the writer.

"I was just sitting down to my first meal in 30 hours when the police burst in with the news the city was burning," he goes on. "I found an entire block opposite the hotel in flames, and as there was no water the firemen were powerless to check them. When I discovered the block immediately behind the hotel was also ablaze, it struck me it was time to change my quarters.

"After wandering through pitch-black streets for three hours, slipping on broken glass and stumbling over fallen masonry, and occasionally challenged by German sentries, I saw a light in a building in the Boulevard Leopold. I rang the bell and was taken in by a poor little consumptive bookkeeper.

Takes Over Consulate.

"Upon calling at the consulate in the morning I found that Consul General Diederich and Vice-Consul Sherman had left two days before for parts unknown. As there was a large number of frightened people clamoring for reassurance and protection, and as there was no one else to look after them, I opened the consulate and assumed charge.

"The proceeding was wholly irregular and unauthorized, of course, and will probably scandalize department of state officials in Washington, but it was no time for red tape.

"I immediately wrote a letter to the German commander, informing him that in the absence of the consul general I had assumed charge of the American and British interests in Antwerp and expected the fullest protection. I received a courteous reply immediately, saying that every protection would be afforded foreigners."

USE WALKING WOOD IN ATTACK UPON GERMANS

London.—A correspondent describes a walking wood at Crecy. The French and British cut down trees and armed themselves with the branches. Line after line of infantry, each man bearing a branch, then moved forward unobserved toward the enemy.

Behind them, amid the lopped tree trunks, the artillerymen fixed themselves and placed 13-pounders to cover the moving wood.

The attack, which followed won the success it merited. It almost went wrong, however, for the French cavalry, which was following, made a detour to pass the wood and dashed into view near the ammunition reserves of the allies.

German shells began falling thereabouts, but British soldiers went up the hills and pulled the boxes of ammunition out of the way of the German shells. Ammunition and men came through unscathed. By evening the enemy had been cleared from the Marne district.

Cathedral Lost to Art.

Paris.—The artistic beauty of the cathedral at Reims, which suffered in the German bombardment of that town, never can be restored, in the opinion of Whitney Warren, the New York architect, who has just returned from Reims, where he made a thorough inspection of the famous structure. Mr. Warren, who is a corresponding member of the Institute de France, was given the privilege of visiting the cathedral.

MADE A SPRINTING RECORD

Soldier Did About the Only Thing He Could Do, and Extended Himself Somewhat.

The old veteran had paused in his reminiscences, and was mopping his brow while his audience waited patiently, thinking he had left off.

"I recollect," he continued, dreamily, "that at the battle of the Alma I had a very exciting time. Bullets were pelting upon us like rain. Men fell right and left, cannon roared like thunder itself, and, worst of all, the enemy had managed to get with a hundred yards of our position.

"I was mad with excitement, and wasn't thinking of nothing except fighting for all I was worth. All of a sudden I turned and found that my regiment had changed its position, and I was cut off—left to the mercy of the enemy, sir."

"Well, what did you do?" asked an impatient listener.

"Do?" said the old fellow, sleepily. "Well, I reckon I did a mile in three minutes."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

The voters of the east end of the county should not allow the Eleven Towns to lead them estray on the governor issue, for any paper located in this territory that would support A. H. Fasel for County Auditor, is a mighty poor stick to tie to.

As election day is approaching the people should soon begin to make up their mind who they are going to support for governor on November 3rd. We have been some what acquainted with both Hammond's and Lee's past record, and we are not going to howl that it would be any calamity to the state if Hammond was elected. But there is no valid reason why any man who is a republican should not vote for Wm. E. Lee. Those of you who are in favor of County Option are voting straight against any possible chance to have a County Option law passed by the next legislature, if you vote for Hammond, and you will find out that we have told you the truth, if he is elected.

How Fasel Started The Bank

As Mr. Fasel consumed a large portion of the time in his Goodridge speech to answering our charges, we will give him a few more nuts to crack this week. We want to call the attention of the voters to one statement made by Fasel at his Goodridge speech which was: that he had not charged to exceed $25,00 on any one county ditch. The official records, with the number of the ditch and the amount he collected on each ditch, and the total amount of ditch fees he collected in 1913, which was transferred from the ditch tax paying farmers pockets to the pocket of A. H. Fasel, were as follows:

Here are the figures:

Miscellaneous ditches	$139.05
Ditch No. Jud. 1	5.00
Jud. 2	5.00
Jud. 3	5.00
Jud. 1	18.27
Jud. 14	85.05
Jud. 25	127.95
County ditch No. 55	60.20
" 53	50.23
" 47	66.10
" 51	63.80
Jud. 1	119.55
Jud. 25	7.90
Total Ditch fees	$702.90

In addition to this he got a salary of $1,200 from the tax payers. $900 for clerk hire. $30 for Board of Audit fees: $20 for hunting licenses. $180 for tax certificates: Making a total of $3032.90 for our County Auditor for the year 1913. These are cold facts taken from the county records gentlemen, and plainly shows how A. H. Fasel is making his money to start banks, and the county records are there to show it, and we wish to say in conclusion that if you want to vote for A. H. Fasel to spite Hunt of THE SUNBEAM "go to it" for this outfit can pay their taxes, if you can yours.

Dan O'Neill is making the statement that the reason the newspapers are supporting Hanson is because he is paying them for it. Well now Daniel THE SUNBEAM supported you, two and four years ago. How much did you pay us Dan? Tell the people. Also Dannie me boy, do you remember that warm convention that was held at Red Lake Falls some six years ago, when the editor of this paper placed your name before that convention as County Chairman of the Republican County Committee. How much did you pay us for that Dan?

Had you passed that Drainage bill as introduced by Marschalk, and located that Normal School at Thief River Falls, both of which acts we believe you could have done, THE SUNBEAM and Hunt would have done all in their power to elect you to that state senate, and no man knows it better than D. P. O'Neill. Shame on you Dan to be telling such rot around the country, which you know is not true.

A PROPOSITION TO O'NEILL

As D.P.ONeill has been making the cracks around the country that he was going to have W.G. Hunt arrested AFTER election for what he has published regarding the location of that Normal School, we will make him this proposition:

Have us arrested BEFORE election Dan, and we will have the trial before a jury of Thief River Falls citizens at Thief River Falls, and allow the people to listen to the evidence, and we will bet that any man that is interested in the upbuilding of that city, and this county, that would vote for you after hearing the evidence in that case would be ashamed to go home at night by the front door of his residence, but would sneak up the back way crawl into bed and throw a quilt over his head.

Come on Dan, have Hunt arrested BEFORE ELECTION.

That County Hospital.

The question of the greatest importance to the farmers of Pennington County at the coming election is the county hospital.

The Sunbeam deserves the thanks of the farmers for the able stand it has taken in opposition to the county hospital proposition.

We understand that on September 14th of this year, while the County Board were transacting routine business, a surprise was sprung on them in the form of a proposition to build and maintain a county hospital. H. O. Kjomme and a few other business men of Thief River Falls appeared before the county board urging them to place on the ballot for the coming election, the proposition to build and maintain a county hospital. I mention this to show you that no farmer appeared before the County Board to ask for a county hospital: If a farmer wants anything, he has to pay for it. If those gentlemen who appeared before the County Board want the county hospital let them pay for it.

The Thief River Falls papers tell us that a tax of $2,500 a year for 20 years will pay for the $50.000 county hospital, but they hide the fact that the interest alone on $50,000 at 6 per cent for 20 years amounts to $60,000. Besides that the tax payers of this county will have to pay several thousand dollars every year to maintain that hospital.

Now, brother farmer, when a candidate comes to ask for your vote, ask him what stand he takes on the county hospital proposition.

A FRANTIC APPEAL

The Thief River Falls News-Press makes a frantic appeal in their last week's issue, for the election of Miss Godwin for Superintendent of Schools. Cutter says: "Our reason for taking this stand is from a purely impersonal stand point."

Well now wouldn't that language bring tears to the eyes of a blind ape, in view of the fact, that the people of Thief River Falls have no more business to do with the County Superintendent of Schools, so far as their schools are concerned, than they have with the business of the Mayor of Chicago. Mostue is the only candidate from from the eleven townships, and has well and faithfully looked after the interest of our schools, and the News-Press does not voice the sentiment of the people of a large number of the people of that city when they attempt to "mob" him out of office, and elect a stranger to the people of this territory.

Superintendent Hayes has charge of the schools of Thief River Falls and they are under his supervision, and he is of course satisfactory to that city. Now how would they like it if the farmers had a chance to vote on a superintendent for their schools, if they would turn out to election, women and men, hauled there in automobiles, and vote a superintendent in, that they did not want, to take the place, of Mr. Hayes? This is exactly the situation regarding the County Superintendent, and we will appeal to the fairness of the voters of that city to divide their votes on superintendent, and allow the farmers to make the choice.

APPLY SLOAN'S FREELY FOR LUMBAGO.

Your attacks of Lumbago are not nearly so hopeless as they seem. You can relieve them almost instantly by a simple application of Sloan's Liniment on the back and loins. Lumbago is a form of rheumatism, and yields perfectly to Sloan's, which penetrates quickly all in through the sore, tender muscles, limbers up the back and makes it feel fine. Get a bottle of Sloan's Liniment for 25 cents of any druggist and have it in the house—against colds, sore and swollen joints, rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica and like ailments. Your money back if not satisfied, but it does give almost instant relief.—Ad.

THE LOCAL NEWS

Read the Thief River Co-operative Store Co. add.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof and we will make outyour papers free of charge.

Mr. Erlandson, principal of our Highlanding school, made this office a pleasant visit on Monday evening.

The new church in the town of Mayfield was dedicated last Sunday, and there was a large number present.

Remember to vote on the constitutional amendments on election day. Read them over carefully, and be sure to vote.

The Carl Anderson sale last Tuesday was not very well attended by farmers, but there was a good crowd of politicians present.

All of the candidates for county office are beginning to hustle now, as they realize that the date is nearly here, when one shall be taken, and the other one left.

The Torkelson thrashing machine finished the thrashing in this neighborhood Wednesday, and moved west into the town of Kratka, where they have some flax jobs to finish.

As about all of the ladies of Thief River Falls will vote on County Superintendent of Schools it would be a good idea for the farmers' wives to turn out and vote, so as to even the city vote.

Candidate for County Treasurer, Bernhard Knudsen, has been busy campaigning in this locality the past week, and reports that his campaign is progressing finely. Mr. Knudsen is an old resident and tax payer of the county, and is certainly worthy of the votes of the voters, and will undoubtedly gather in enough of them to secure his election on November 3rd.

It is reported that our lady candidate for superintendent was soliciting a farmer's vote from the town of Riner, when he remarked to her, "I suppose you will be out that way before election." "Oh, no," was the answer "you could hardly expect a woman to come way out there." On the way home the farmer made up his mind that it would be a good idea to have Mostue continue to visit the schools in the town of Riner, and allow Miss Goodwin to remain in the city.

We note by the financial statement that A. H. Fasel took $20.64 to pay his expenses to St. Paul out of the general ditch fund. This undoubtedly is the trip he made down there to help lobby a law through the legislature, making county officers' terms four years instead of two years. A. H. seemed to be afraid that the ditch tax payers would get after him, after two years more of blood sucking, and wanted to sinch the job for four years more, but we guess they are next to him now, and will put him over the dump on November 3rd.

Candidates C. L. Hansen and O. A. Naplin, addressed the voters at the Highlanding school house, on Wednesday evening. Lars Skromme, chairman of Lee's county committee, also spoke on state issues. Mr. Hansen's speech was well received by the audience, who were attentive listeners to Mr Hansen's explanation of the business duty of a legislative body. It was explained to the voters that we had too much political trading in the legislature for the few past years, with a passage of a large number of laws that even the ordinary lawyer did not understand. Mr. Hansen kept the close attention of the audience during his entire address, and undoubtedly gained votes by his visit here.

Singer's house and contents were insured for $1,300, is it at all surprising that it burned down?

The ditch taxes are certainly large enough without paying Auditor Fasel a big "rake off" on every ditch. Read "How Fasel Started The Bank" published in another column.

Some of the county officials, who were quite popular early in the campaign, are loading their boats rather heavy with Fasel ballast, and if they sink with him when they are near the shore, it will be their own fault, as the farmers are beginning to get rather ugly, as the manner of running that auditor's office is placed before them.

Dan O'Neill is around campaigning in overalls, posing as the candidate of the farmers. He has either gone "batty," or takes the farmers for suckers, to think that he can catch them with that kind of bait. Say, Dan, did you wear overalls when you attended Jim Hill's banquet? Did you wear overalls when you was being entertained by the millionaire iron mine owners, when they wanted to dodge their taxes? We guess not. Come off your perch. Dan, that game is old and rusty.

The Ambition of Mark Truitt

By HENRY RUSSELL MILLER

Author of
"THE MAN HIGHER UP," "HIS RISE TO POWER," Etc.

(Copyright, 1913, by The Bobbs-Merrill Company)

SYNOPSIS.

Mark Truitt decides to leave his native town of Bethel to seek his fortune. His sweetheart, Unity Martin, encourages him in his project. Simon Truitt tells his son that it long has been his dream to see a steel plant at Bethel and asks him to return and build it if he ever gets rich. Mark arrives in the city and applies to Thomas Henley, head of the Quinby Iron works, for a job and is sent to the construction gang. He makes a big success in that work and Henley promises him a better job.

CHAPTER V.

Crossroads.

It had been an unusually stubborn "hard-tap," requiring quick and heavy sledging to break out the hardened fire-clay and slag in the tap-hole. The slag that had floated on the metal was now dripping into the cinder pit, sending up a shower of golden sparks.

Roman Andzrejzski, melter in charge of the furnace, was watching the scorched, haggard face of his "second helper." That young man, leaning with an air of exhaustion and discouragement on his inverted sledge, was coughing violently. He had been just three months in the heat and toil the open-hearth furnacemen must endure and an unnerving fear was upon him: that his steadily waning strength would not hold out.

"Vat iss it? Zick?" Roman spoke in the slow, careful fashion that was his habit when he used English.

Mark shook his head. "Tuckered out."

"Tuckeredt out?" Roman looked at him gravely. "You drink too much?"

"I don't drink at all."

"That iss goot. Mineself," Roman explained naively, "I drink too much. Unt that iss not goot. But always I haf been very strong. It iss the douple turn," he added. "It iss very hardt on the young. Later it gets not so hardt—zometimes. Vare do you lif?"

"With a Frenchman in Rose alley. Rose alley—it stinks! It's too near the mills. I can't sleep for the noise. I'm tired and my head aches all the time."

"For two, three days then you must not vork but zleep."

Mark's red eyes darted angry suspicion at his chief. "I suppose you want my job for somebody else," he sneered.

"No. You are a goot vorker. Unt I like you."

"All the same," Mark answered doggedly, "I quit when I have to—not before."

"You do not belief me." Roman shrugged his big shoulders. "Vat do you eat?"

"Oh, soup and brown bread and potatoes mostly. That's the trouble, I guess."

"Hundert t'ousandt defils! Zo little unt you vork here! You are American, you must eat. Vy you not lif another place?"

"The Frenchies sort o' think they're friends. They wouldn't understand."

"Zo? But here," Roman shrugged his shoulders again, "it iss a man must be for himself.—Ve vork now." They returned to their task.

Even double turns have an end. The night shift came on at last. At the trough for cooling tools Mark washed away the grimy sweat that streamed down his face. Then he donned a dry shirt and a heavy overcoat. Despite this covering his overheated body shivered when the raw, early April wind struck him.

"Vajt!" And Roman was beside him. "I haf decitedt. You come lif by my house."

"I guess not," Mark answered wearily, "I guess you don't want me."

"I haf decitedt," Roman repeated. "You haf been goot friendts to your friendts—you vill be to us also. I haf a big house. It iss still there; you shall zleep unt not hear the mills. Unt my Matka, she iss goot cook. Unt meppy you make friends vit my Piotr. He hass no American friendts."

"You might get tired of me."

"Zo? Then vill I tell you," said Roman simply. "Alzo, you vill tell us, ven you get tiredt of us. Unt you vill not be chargedt too much. You vill come?"

Mark hesitated, then laughed grimly. "Will I come!"

"Goot!" Roman laid a kindly hand on Mark's shoulder. "Now vill you belief me unt not vork till the coldt iss vell. You vill come tomorrow?"

And, the matter arranged, they parted for the night.

Roman's house, big only by comparison with three-room tenements, was on a quiet street on one of the city's seven hills. Mark was tucked away in a third-story room. Not even his fancy, less lively than in months agone but still fertile, could conceive the cheap bed and rocker, rag carpet and unpainted table as the trappings of luxury. But it was clean and comfortable, through its windows swept the clean air for which his country-bred lungs were starving and the mills were heard only as a subdued, not unmusical rumble. Also, immeasurable boon! there was in that house a bathtub; his attendance upon it astonished even Kazia, who esteemed bathing more highly than did the rest of Roman's household. The Matka's cooking, supplemented by Kazia's arts, fell little short of Roman's prospectus and the fare had substance.

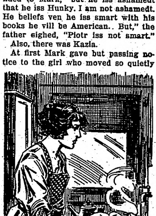
For three days, hearkening to Roman's counsel, he did nothing but sleep and eat. His cold disappeared. His flagging strength revived. Then he gave himself anew to the endless, narrow grind—toil, eat, sleep and toil again.

Roman's house, it is true, contained more than comfortable beds and a bathtub, a fact to which Mark gave at first but scant attention. There was Roman himself, in the mills a precise, patient, unflurried workman, outside a good-natured, impulsive giant, with a child's ungoverned appetite. There was Hanka, his wife, always called Matka—mother—a drab, shriveled little woman who after twelve years in America had learned hardly a word of English. Piotr was a greedy, usually sullen boy of eighteen, still in high school, always bent over his troublesome books. He had a club foot and the heavy labor of the mills was not for him.

"Piotr iss a goot boy," Roman confided to Mark, "but he iss ashamedt that he iss Hunky. I am not ashamedt. He beliefs ven he iss smart with his books he vill be American. But," the father sighed, "Piotr iss not smart."

Also, there was Kazia.

At first Mark gave but passing notice to the girl who moved so quietly around the house, waiting on the table, sweeping and sewing. Having certain standards of beauty, he carelessly decided that she had none of it.



Also, There Was Kazia.

What hopes Roman may have cherished from the presence of a young American in his home were not at once realized.

Even when Mark had regained much of his strength, the fear of physical collapse always hung over him. There was no night or morning when he did not return ready, after bathing and eating, to seek his bed. Even with all the rest he could get his former bodily freshness and eagerness never returned.

He did not mean to be selfish. Sometimes at the end of a meal he caught Roman's wistful glance and felt uncomfortably that he was failing in an obligation. But always he went straightway to his room and his precious sleep, adhering rigidly to his routine—toil, eat, sleep and toil again, hoarding his strength as a miser hoards his gold. Had not Roman said, "A man must be for himself?" And always there floated before him a picture so sweetly pathetic as almost to invoke tears: Unity, the faithful Penelope, trustingly awaiting her adventuring lord's return.

Thus the life fashioned him. It was no longer self-denial that he might earn gratification at another time, but self-control lest he go down in the melee.

But one night he discovered Kazia—the real Kazia.

CHAPTER VI.

Melting Ore.

A gentleman, who must pass down in history as Mr. A, led to the discovery. Mr. A, an oarsman who could propel his boat five miles an hour in still water, undertook to row twenty-three miles up a river whose current ran two and one-half miles an hour, and back. The problem was: In how long did Mr. A accomplish this feat?

And upon Piotr fell the duty of finding the solution. Piotr felt painfully incompetent.

"Na milosc Boga!" When Piotr dropped back into Polish, deep emotion was stirring.

It was at the end of supper on a Saturday night when the other shift worked and Mark's rested for twenty-four hours. That day Henley, passing the furnaces, had spoken to him by name, leaving a glow that had not subsided.

"What's the matter, Piotr?"

"I can't work this problem."

"Let me see it." If we could but measure our impulses!

Piotr looked up astounded. "Do you know algebra?"

"A little." Mark took up the book. "Hmm! What's x? Why, that's easy." He sat down and quickly worked out the problem. Then he led Piotr slowly through the equations thrice, after which he let the boy begin unaided a stumbling but finally successful pursuit of the elusive x.

While Piotr was floundering, his new mentor felt some one behind him. He glanced around and caught Kazia, her arms full of unwashed dishes, looking at him. The wonted indifference had fled before a look of surprised interest. Mark stared, incredulous; it seemed not the same face. But the new look vanished instantly. He had a sense of bafflement, as if he had come upon a rare picture just as a curtain was drawn.

"Fine!" he exclaimed, clapping Piotr on the shoulder; he had not heard the last few equations. "We'll make a scholar out of you yet, Pete."

"Pete!" The boy's homely face lighted up. "Kazia, did you hear? He called me Pete."

"I like Piotr better," she said, with a shrug that imperiled her burden.

"Do you," Piotr turned again to Mark, "do you know Latin, too?"

"Oh, a little!" Mark sought Kazia's face as this announcement of his erudition fell. But Kazia was looking away.

"And will you help me with that sometimes?"

"Sure. Sometimes," Mark assented recklessly.

But Piotr was insatiable. "Every night?"

"Well, no," said Mark, recovering caution. "Not every night. I can't—"

"Of course not, Piotr," Kazia cut in. "He can't waste time on a stupid little Hunky."

"I'm not a Hunky," Piotr resented passionately, addressing Kazia but for Mark's benefit, "any more'n you are. We are—we were—Poles. But we're Americans now. Why, I've almost forgotten how to talk Polish—except to the Matka," he added conscientiously.

"Will you help me tonight?" he returned to Mark, with less assurance. "It's Caesar. And I am stupid," he sighed.

Mark, though repenting his rashness, could not well refuse. For an hour they listened while Caesar unctuously told how he had taught the conquered Vercingetorix his place. But Kazia was not at any time present during the lesson. At last, yawning mightily, Mark arose. He went up to his room, bearing Piotr's awkward gratitude and followed by a look of humble admiration it is probably well he did not perceive.

But the incident had its sequel.

He found a light burning dimly in the narrow hallway before his door, and coming out of his room—Kazia.

"I was fixing things," she exclaimed, indifferent as ever.

"Thank you, Kazia." The room, as he remembered it, had been in perfect order. He stood aside to let her pass.

She took one step and then stopped abruptly, looking up at him with suddenly hostile eyes.

"What," she demanded, "did you come here for?"

He smiled—the smile of age for a naughty but amusing child. "Because your father asked me, I guess."

"But you know Latin and algebra and things."

"Why, what's that got to do with it, Kazia?"

"We don't. We're just mill-workers—and Hunkies."

He was not schooled in the reading of voices, but he caught bitterness there. He looked at her more intently—and more kindly.

"What," she repeated resentfully, "did you come here for? You don't like us. You won't have anything to do with us. You eat, then go up to your room and stay there. We thought you were coming to be friends with Piotr"—an almost imperceptible pause—"and me."

"I come up to sleep, Kazia. You see, I was pretty near on my last legs when I came here and I need all the rest I can get. I'm not used to work in the mills and I guess I'm not so strong as I look. If I'm going to get ahead, I've got to do it while I can stand the work. Besides I didn't think you cared whether I liked you or not."

"I don't," she declared, with a little uptilting of her chin; it was a beautifully molded feature. The movement called his eyes to the slender yet strong and rounded throat. He wondered that these beauties had escaped his notice. "I don't. But Piotr and Uncle Roman do."

"Uncle Roman?" It was the first time he had heard the phrase. "I thought he was your father, Kazia."

"No. I—I have no father."

"Oh!" He assumed a bereavement. On a sudden pitying impulse he put out his hand and laid it on her bare forearm; the flesh was smooth and firm. "That's too bad, Kazia."

And then, most unexpectedly, the curtain was drawn aside for him.

"I won't be pitied!" With the cry fell away the Kazia he had known, as did Cinderella's tatters. In her place stood a girl who seemed taller, whose head was held in a fashion peculiar, in his books, to very proud and fine ladies. Her eyes blazed defiance. She snatched her arm away. "Here they're all ashamed. But I ain't ashamed. I won't have you pity me."

This was mystery. But he did not press her for an explanation. He was more interested in another phenomenon.

"Do you know you're mighty good-looking, Kazia?"

The angry crimson deepened. "You're laughing at me. You're—"

"But I'm not laughing." He caught her arm again, gently. "I'm only surprised. I didn't think you were. But you are—when you're interested or mad. Only please don't be mad, because—" What was this unconsidered thing he was saying? The words ran on—"Because I want to be friends with you. Don't you want me to stay?"

For a silent moment she looked at him strangely.

"Yes." She turned abruptly and left him, descending the stairs without so much as a glance backward.

For a full minute he stood looking at the place where she had been. Then he drew a long sighing breath.

"She's a queer one," he muttered.

When he awoke, the late morning sunshine filled his room. But the eager expectancy pervading him, as if some long planned holiday had dawned, was more than a reflection of this outer radiance.

He bathed and dressed carefully. And for the first time he perceived that his clothes, relic of Bethel days, lacked something when judged by city standards. He frowned at the image in the cheap mirror.

"I must buy a new suit," he muttered.

When he went downstairs he found Kazia bending over a window box in the dining room, where three scarlet geraniums flamed. She heard his approach and turned slowly. . . . No deceptive half-light, but the full glory of spring sunshine, was upon her. She was indifferent as ever. But the transformation held.

"Oh! Hullo!"

"Hello!" she said quietly, and moved away toward the kitchen.

"Kazia—"

She paused inquiringly.

"Er—" he floundered. "It's a fine morning."

"Yes," she said.

His remark, he felt, hardly justified her detention. He groped about for a more fertile topic. "Fine geraniums you've got there, Kazia."

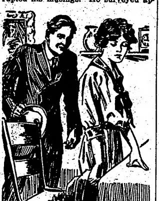
"Yes."

"My goodness!" he laughed. "Is 'yes' all you can say? Don't you remember we agreed to be friends?"

"I said I wanted you to stay," she corrected without enthusiasm. "I'll get your breakfast." This time she accomplished her escape.

He sat at the table, loftily amused. Probably—thus he considered her unresponsiveness—the poor thing still doubted his sincerity. And she had reason, beyond question; on the whole he had been selfish in his rigid seclusion. He must repair that.

Kazia, bearing his breakfast, interrupted his musings. He surveyed approvingly the dishes she set before him.



"Kazia," He Announced Boldy, "We're Going Walking in the Park."

"You're a fine cook, Kazia. Now don't," he protested humorously, "say 'yes.'"

Unsmilingly she ignored both the compliment and the jest. "Will that be all?"

"Well, no."

"What else?"

"You might," he smiled, "sit down and be—friendly."

"I've got to work."

"It seems," he complained, "you're always working."

She shrugged her shoulders. "That's what I'm for." And she left him.

He frowned. It might have been raining on his holiday. He was able, nevertheless, to make a substantial breakfast.

Back in his room, which she had set in order while he ate, he formally and finally dismissed Kazia from his mind and began his weekly letter to Unity. At the end of an hour "My darling" stared at him from an otherwise empty page, and he was glowering out into the sunlit streets and wondering why Kazia wanted him to stay, why her indifference of the morning and why his disappointment.

A youth and his sweetheart strolled by below him. The sight, the music of their laughter, aggravated his restlessness and gave him an idea.

"That's it, exactly. I will go down and get Kazia and take a walk in the park. Poor girl! I expect she needs company, too."

He found her in the dining room—and already attired for holiday sauntering. A ladies' seminary graduate might have been stirred to criticism of the cheap white dress and coarse straw hat with its single blue ribbon; he was not. We may doubt that he saw them at all, for her eyes were dancing and her lips smiling mischievously at Piotr, who sat in one corner, nursing his club foot and glaring fiercely at her. She could be gay, then.

But the smile disappeared upon his entrance. Nevertheless, "Kazia," he announced boldly, "we're going walking in the park."

"Are we?"

"Well, aren't we?" He modified his sultanesque air a little. "I'd like you to come."

"No."

"She's going with Jim Whiting," Piotr explained grumpily. "He's her fellow."

"Oh!" Mark blinked stupidly. Evidently other youths had discovered her. It was strangely disturbing.

He recovered himself, grinning wryly. "Serves me right. I took too much for granted, didn't I? I'm sorry."

"I'll go with you," Piotr volunteered promptly.

"Oh, all right. Come along, Piotr."

"Pete," corrected Piotr. "In a minute."

So, though not as he had planned, Mark sallied forth into the golden afternoon. Piotr, anxious to impress this wonderful boarder whose learning made light of the difficulties of Messrs. A, B and C and defied the intricacies of the subjunctive, talked, at first shyly, then more freely, mostly of himself, this being one of the two subjects in which he was deeply interested. Mark let him ramble on and listened to his own thoughts, which chiefly concerned Kazia. He ruefully wished that he had not been so ready to assume her assent.

Piotr's ambition, the monologue developed, soared high; it included notable achievements as a labor leader, although his notions of the historic conflict were a little vague.

As they passed the mouth of a little dell they were halted by this tableau: Kazia leaning against a tree and Jim Whiting at her feet tying the shoe-lace that had come loose. He was unconscionably long about it, Mark thought. He must have said something, for she laughed, a clear ringing note. The kneeling gallant arose. Mark saw a man two or three years his senior, not ill-looking despite his too heavy lips and loose jaw and "sporty" clothes. Mark disliked him at once. Whiting took Kazia's arm and led her slowly along the dell.

"Psiakrew!" muttered Piotr, in the Pole's deadly insult.

The homely face was pale, convulsed with hate and a real suffering. Even Mark, self-absorbed, could see that. He patted the boy on the shoulder.

"Never mind, Pete. She can't think much of him."

"He's not fit for her," Piotr cried.

"Right!" Mark agreed firmly.

Piotr went further. "Nobody's fit for her."

"Kazia's a mighty nice girl," Mark declared, less sweepingly.

"Yes, she's nice. And she's smart, too, smarter'n me. She's smart as you." Piotr looked up fiercely, as if expecting contradiction.

"Sure, she is! But I'm afraid," very casually, this, "she doesn't like me very well."

Piotr jumped at the bait. "She thinks you're stuck-up and selfish," he explained. "And she's always afraid everybody, 'cept Jim Whiting, 'll look down on her because her mother"—Piotr flushed—"wasn't married."

So that was the reason for her outburst of the night before. Poor Kazia! Mark had not needed to go out of virtuous Bethel to learn the lot of Hagar's children.

"Do you look down on her?" Piotr demanded aggressively.

"Of course not! And you needn't be ashamed of her, either—it isn't her fault, is it? I don't like," Mark said slowly, "to see her with that Whiting. I wish—I wish she liked me a little better."

He did not see the startled questioning look Piotr gave him.

"Kazia," asserted the boy, "never changes. I'm going home."

They strolled homeward, each moodily silent.

Despite the comfortable quarters and nourishing food, now his strength lagged painfully; his scorched face became haggard. And each morning he dragged himself wearily homeward, blind to the day's beauty.

But he did not forget Kazia.

Always a leech-like Piotr awaited his return, with problems to be solved and paragraphs to be construed. Nor did he wait in vain. Every morning Mark patiently sacrificed an hour of the needed sleep on the altar of the boy's rare stupidity. He did not look to Piotr's gratitude for his reward.

The direct charge into the mouth of the enemy's cannon is spectacular and heroic, but the great strategists have relied upon the movement in flank. On Friday Mark came within sight of the coveted position.

"There's three problems and a whole page of indirect discourse," the scholar announced. He added the complaint, "You're late."

"All right," Mark sighed. "Bring 'em out."

Then Kazia spoke her protest. "Piotr, can't you see he's tired?"

"But I can't do 'em." Piotr became sulky at once. "And I haven't failed once this week."

"Piotr, you're a greedy Hunky pig. Don't you do it," she turned to Mark. "Sunday's the double turn."

Was this the olive branch? Nothing then could have persuaded him to give up the hour with Piotr. But he saw an opening; he unlimbered a big gun and sent one shell screaming toward her camp. "You," he said with crushing dignity, "will be walking in the park and won't care. Piotr, we're losing time."

She turned away so quickly that he could not judge his marksmanship. The lesson began and lasted until Piotr rushed off to school.

The double turn came and was duly endured, as are most of life's dreaded trials when they actually present themselves. But even Roman showed the effects of the long strain. When he reached home he began at once to drown his fatigue in huge potations. Mark went to his room.

There a surprise awaited him: clean clothes, neatly laid out—also Kazia, who had just completed this kindly service.

"I thought you'd like to clean up before supper," she explained with a new diffidence.

"Thank you, Kazia. You always think of the right things."

"No, not always."

She moved toward the door—anxious to avoid him, as usual, he thought. But he had no spirit for the siege just then. He dropped into the chair, burying his throbbing head in his hands. He supposed that she had gone.

But she had not gone. She stood uncertain in the doorway, watching the tired dejected figure he made.

"Not always," she repeated. The ready color mounted. "Sometimes I'm—cranky when I don't want to be."

He glanced up, bewildered by this sudden striking of colors.

"You look awful tired," she went on hurriedly.

He nodded stupidly, trying to grasp the fact that for once she was neither hostile nor indifferent. "It's the heat."

"It'll be worse in summer. It hurts even Uncle Roman then. You can't stand it."

He roused himself. "Yes, I can stand it—because I will." Richard Courtney would have detected a new firmness in the line of the grimly shut mouth. "Several thousand men stand it."

"I hope so," she answered gravely. "When you say it that way, you make me think you can."

"I say it to make myself think so, I guess." He laughed shortly. Then he observed that she was wearing her white dress; the reason, of course, was obvious.

"Was it a nice walk today?"

"I didn't go."

"Oh!" He leaned forward, very eagerly for an exhausted man. "Kazia, do you still think I'm stuck-up and selfish?"

She shook her head slowly. "You've been so nice to Piotr this week, when you've been so tired."

"Kazia—" Before that honest gaze he, too, had to be honest. "Kazia, I did it to make you think that. But it was to help him you wanted me to stay, wasn't it?"

"No, it wasn't."

"Then why?"

Her eyes looked unwaveringly into his. "I don't know," she said slowly. "Because you're different, I guess. You know things. You—" A queer little frown of puzzlement furrowed the pretty brow as she groped for the words. She sighed impatiently, for the groping was fruitless. "You're just—different. I thought I could learn something from you—mebby."

"Will you go walking with me next Sunday, Kazia?"

"Yes," she said very gravely.

"Kazia," he pleaded whimsically, "you even laugh for others—sometimes. Don't you think you might smile for me this once, anyhow?"

A smile quivered on her lips and was gone. But for a breath she lingered, her questioning eyes still upon him.

CHAPTER VII.

Soldier and Maid.

He sat a little apart from her, that he might see her the better. It had been a delicious game, spinning nonsense to lure her forth from the grave reticent mood upon her that Sabbath afternoon and then letting her lapse into gravity and silence once more.

He had found a surprising skill for it; he could play upon her and elicit just the note he desired. It had been so, ever since she had so unexpectedly laid down her hostility. But he was not quite sure which of the two Kazias he liked the better—her of the clear ringing laugh with its hint of daring; or the subdued pensive maid whose eyes wistfully sought the horizon.

The softer mood was upon her then. She sat, chin cupped in both hands, gazing out over the undulating acres of close-cropped greensward.

"You like it?" he queried.

She nodded.

"Huh!" he boasted. "You ought to see the hills up in Bethel. They don't look like they'd just been to the barber's. And you can always smell flowers somewhere." He sniffed reminiscently. "And the woods! You'd like them. The trees are real trees, big fellows that have been there more'n a hundred years. You can get lost there."

"You could leave that! Why?"

"To make money," he responded crassly.

"I wouldn't leave it for money."

DENTIST HAD WASTED TIME

Really Was No Use Waiting for Patient to Close Eye, Seeing Its Composition.

He was a nervous man, says the Philadelphia Record. Most men are when they find themselves in a dentist's chair, but he was exceptionally so. The tooth that had to come out was quite a small affair—from the dentist's point of view. From the patient's it felt about the same size as a house.

He decided to have gas. The dentist, who was in a hurry to go to a baseball game, tried to persuade him to do without, but he was determined.

The dentist, in a fever of impatience, waited for the victim to lose consciouness, but the nervous man insisted on keeping an eye open, though he had enough gas to float an airship.

Unable to control himself any longer, the irate tooth-puller exclaimed:

"Let go yourself, man! Shut your eye, you idiot!"

Somewhere from the back-blocks of dreamland the patient murmured speepily:

"Can't—it's glass!"

JUDGE CURED, HEART TROUBLE.

I took about 6 boxes of Dodds Kidney Pills for Heart Trouble from which I had suffered for 5 years. I had dizzy spells, my eyes puffed, my breath was short and I had chills and backache. I took the pills about a year ago and have had no return of the palpitations. Am now 63 years old, able to do lots of manual labor, am well and hearty and weigh about 200 pounds. I feel very grateful that I found Dodds Kidney Pills and you may publish this letter if you wish. I am serving my third term as Probate Judge of Gray Co. Yours truly,

Poor Little Orphan.

Alice Joyce, star in motion pictures, had an experience with a little negro girl a few days ago which brings a chuckle whenever it is repeated.

Miss Joyce was on her way home after an arduous day's work. A little colored girl crying against a telegraph pole aroused her sympathy. The charming star approached the girl and inquired the cause of the trouble. The child replied that her aunt had just driven her from the house.

"Where is your father?" asked Miss Joyce.

"Nevah had no pappy," was the reply.

"Well, where is your mother?"

"Daid," was the laconic answer."

Miss Joyce was touched. "Dead," she replied pityingly.

"Yaih! She done died befo' Ah was bo'n!"

A NURSE TAKES DOCTOR'S ADVICE

Euphemia, Ohio.—"Because of total ignorance of how to care for myself when verging into womanhood, and from taking cold when going to school, I suffered from a displacement, and each month I had severe pains and nausea which always meant a lay-off from work for two to four days from the time I was 16 years old.

"I went to Kansas to live with my sister and while there a doctor told me of the Pinkham remedies but I did not use them then as my faith in patent medicines was limited. After my sister died I came home to Ohio to live and that has been my home for the last 18 years.

"The Change of Life came when I was 47 years old and about this time I saw my physical condition plainly described in one of your advertisements. Then I began using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I cannot tell you or any one the relief it gave me in the first three months. It put me right where I need not lay off every month and during the last 18 years I have not paid out two dollars to a doctor, and have been blest with excellent health for a woman of my age and I can thank Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for it.

"Since the Change of Life is over I have been a maternity nurse and being wholly self-supporting I cannot over estimate the value of good health. I have now earned a comfortable little home just by sewing and nursing. I have recommended the Compound to many with good results, as it is excellent to take before and after childbirth."—Miss EVELYN ADELIA STEWART, Euphemia, Ohio.

Camera Carried by Pigeon.

A minature camera is in existence which can be attached to the body of a pigeon, carried by the bird to a considerable height above fortified and other positions, and used to photograph the positions. The possibilities of its use in war were recognized in Germany before the present conflict, and experiments made. To what extent the camera-pigeon has been employed by "alien enemies" in England is another matter. At any rate, aliens in this country are now prohibited by law from owning carrier pigeons, and all carrier pigeons flying near the coast are shot by police watchers. The camera is, of course, automatic in its action, and takes photographs at regular intervals. The apparatus is made in two forms, as a single camera and as a double camera.—London News.

Nervous Emotional Dizzy Depressed ?

Mrs. Addie Curtsinger of Cedar St., Cairo, Ill., writes Dr. R. V. Pierce as follows:

"I send 31 cents for your 'Common Sense Medical Adviser' for my daughter who has recently married and I know the book will be of much value to her. I have read and used for 25 years the valuable treatments contained in the 'Medical Adviser' and have taken many bottles of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, and have been restored to health each time I used it. It is a great remedy for women as a strength builder, fine for the nerves and general health."

WOMEN who are restless, with constant change of position, "fidgetiness," who are abnormally excitable or who experience fainting or dizzy spells, or nervous headache and wakefulness are usually sufferers from the weaknesses of their sex.

MENTAL ACTIVITY AND AGE

That Attitude of the Mind Has Much to Do With Length of Life Is Well Known.

A few years ago a young man "died of old age" in a New York hospital. After an autopsy the surgeons said that while the youth was in reality only twenty-three years old he was internally eighty!

It is the aged mind that frequently or die," is nature's motto, a motto makes the body old. "Keep growing written all over everything in the universe. There must be a constant activity in the mind that would not age; and the body is but the expression of the mind.

There is no doubt that, as a race, we shorten our lives very materially through our false thinking, our bad living, and our old-age convictions. Doctor Metchnikoff of the Pasteur institute of Paris, says that men should live at least 120 years. Yet it is only in rare instances today that a man reaches even the century mark.

Making a business of prolonging life and still retaining as much as possible of its vigor, freshness and bouyancy ought to be a prime object, especially after one has passed fifty. While proper care of the body is absolutely essential for the attainment of this object the mental influence for transcends all others. The attitude of the mind has everything to do with hastening our retarding the degenerative process incident to one's declining years. It is an established fact that the body follows the thought, is shaped by the mental convictions, emotions, moods.—Orison Swett Marden in October Nautilus.

Preferred His Grouch.

A landlord, returning home after an absence of several weeks saw one of his tenants sitting on a stone wall, whistling merrily. The moment that he greeted him, however, the man scowled and began abusing him.

"Why, what's the matter, Pat?" he asked.

"Matter is it?" was the answer. "Matter enough, when your stheward is afther evicting me, bad luck to him!"

"Evicted you? What for?"

"The old liar pretended me cabin wanted repairing, and as Oi wouldn't let him, shure he put me out."

"Never mind," said the landlord, "I hear the cottage you have always wanted is vacant, and I'll let you have that at the same rent."

"No, thanking your honor," said Pat. "I couldn't think of it."

"But why not? What is to hinder you?"

"No, your honor," was the reply, "Oi'd rather have me grievance."

FOUND OUT.

A Trained Nurse Discovered its Effect.

No one is in better position to know the value of food and drink than a trained nurse.

Speaking of coffee, a nurse in Pa., writes: "I used to drink strong coffee myself, and suffered greatly from headaches and indigestion.

"While on a visit to my brothers I had a good chance to try Postum, for they drank it altogether in place of coffee. After using Postum two weeks I found I was much benefited and finally my headaches disappeared and also the indigestion.

"Naturally I have since used Postum among my patients, and have noticed a marked benefit where coffee has been left off and Postum used.

"I observe a curious fact about Postum when used by mothers. It greatly helps the flow of milk in cases where coffee is inclined to dry it up, and where tea causes nervousness.

"I find trouble in getting servants to make Postum properly. But when it is prepared according to directions on package and served hot with cream, it is certainly a delicious beverage."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 20c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, made a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

South America.

"The people of South America are people of great and brilliant possibilities. The leading man, perhaps, in the last Hague conference was a Brazilian. Among the common people there are immense possibilities of undeveloped character and service," so declares a religious leader.

"Where in the world will you find a more patriotic people?" he continues.

"Where in the world will you find a people who have been as willing as the South American people have been for 100 years to die for great ideas and for great causes and for great personal loyalties?

"They lie at our door today—these forty million people, awaiting at our hand the help that is to make of them great and powerful nations, and to enable them to discharge their duty of service to the world."

HEAD IN WATERY PIMPLES

R. R. No. 1, Kyles, Ohio.—"My baby's head when about a year old began to break out with small watery pimples causing her head to itch. She would scratch her head till the blood came causing the top of her head to be in almost a solid eruption. The pimples at first were nearly as large as a pea and in patches which would inflame and fester and when they would come open would leave a kind of wet scales there for a few days. Then when it dried up it would leave scales on her head that caused her hair to fall out just in great bunches.

"One day I happened to see Cuticura Soap and also Cuticura Ointment advertised in a paper and I ordered a sample of each. They seemed to help her head so much that I purchased a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment and in two weeks' time her head was sound and well. Her hair had stopped falling out and was also free from dandruff." (Signed) Mrs. J. L. West, Feb. 20, '14.

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

The Cause Laid Bare

Tea and coffee drinkers often notice backache, headache, rheumatic pain, dizziness, drowsy, tired feelings, disturbed urination and other signs of kidney weakness. The constant use of narcotic or alcoholic drinks is very apt to irritate the kidneys, and weak kidneys need prompt help to avert all danger of dropsy, gravel or fatal Bright's disease. Avoid the use of stimulants, drink more water, get more rest, fresh air and exercise. To tone and strengthen the tired kidneys, use Doan's Kidney Pills, the most successful and highly recommended kidney remedy.

THE ELEVEN Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the STATE OF MINNESOTA

Submitted by the Legislature at Its General Session, 1913, Together With a Statement of the PURPOSES AND EFFECTS,

Prepared by Hon. Lyndon A. Smith, Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to Julius A. Schmahl Secretary of State.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, ST. PAUL.

April 25, 1914.

Honorable Julius A. Schmahl,
Secretary of State,
Capitol.

SIR: As required by Section 46, General Statutes of the State of Minnesota for the year 1913, I have the honor to furnish you herewith a statement of the purposes and effects of the respective amendments proposed to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota by the Legislature of 1913, and which are to be submitted to the electors of said State at the general election in 1914.

FIRST PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The first proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 584 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is sought to enable the electors to submit by petition to the Legislature constitutional amendments and likewise to propose legislation, and in the event the Legislature fails to submit any such constitutional amendment or fails to enact any such proposed law, then such amendment or proposed law may be submitted directly to the voters; also, to permit the electors to cause any law or laws enacted by the Legislature to be submitted to the electors and if a majority of the votes cast thereon be opposed to such law, the same shall be repealed.

This is an amendment to Section 1 of Article 4 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Section 1. The legislature shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such time as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety (90) legislative days; and no new bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the governor, during the last twenty (20) days of such sessions, except the attention of the legislature shall be called to some important matter of general interest by a special message from the governor."

and substitutes therefor the following:

"Sec. 1. TWO HOUSES—SESSIONS.—The Legislature shall consist of the senate and house of representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the state, at such time as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety (90) legislative days, and no bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the governor, during the last twenty days of such session, except the attention of the legislature shall be called to some important matter of general interest, by a special message from the governor; but the people reserve to themselves direct power, as follows:

"a. CONSTITUTIONAL INITIATIVE.—When at any time prior to the commencement of any session of the legislature, there shall have been filed with the secretary of state a petition proposing an amendment to the constitution signed by two per centum of the electors of the state, the secretary of state shall transmit the same to the legislature not later than ten days after the commencement of the session. If the amendment so proposed be not submitted to the electors by the legislature at such session, or if it be submitted in an amended form, then upon a further petition or petitions, each signed by eight per centum of the electors of the state, filed with the secretary of state within six months after the adjournment of the legislature, the amendment proposed in the first petition, or one or more amended forms thereof, shall be submitted to the electors for their approval or rejection at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of any such further petitions. Any amendment proposed by initiative petition and, in its original or in an amended form, submitted to the electors by the legislature or by a further petition, shall become a part of the constitution, if approved by a majority of the electors voting at said election, or by four-sevenths of the electors voting on the proposed amendment; provided not less than three-sevenths of the electors voting at said election voted for the proposed amendment. This section shall be construed as a means in addition to Section one, Article fourteen of the State Constitution for amending the same.

"b. STATUTORY INITIATIVE—When at any time prior to the commencement of any session of the legislature, there shall have been filed with the secretary of state a petition proposing a law, signed by two per centum of the electors of the state, the secretary of state shall transmit the same to the legislature not later than ten days after the commencement of the session. If the law so proposed be not passed by the legislature at such session, or if it be passed in an amended form, then upon a further petition or petitions, each signed by six per centum of the electors of the state, filed with the secretary of state within six months after the adjournment of the legislature, the law proposed in the first petition, or one or more amended forms thereof, shall be submitted to the electors at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of any such further petition or petitions, and if approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon, the same shall become law and go into effect thirty days after such election, and shall supersede any amended form of such law which may have been passed by the legislature. No law proposed by initiative petition and approved by the electors shall be subject to the veto of the governor. The authority of the people to enact laws, as provided in this subdivision, shall extend only to laws authorized by the provisions of the constitution.

"c. THE REFERENDUM.—If within ninety days after the final adjournment of any session of the legislature, a referendum petition, signed by six per centum of the electors of the state, shall be filed with the secretary of state against any law, or any part of a law, passed by the legislature at such session, such law, or such part of a law, shall be submitted to the electors at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of said petition. If a majority of the vote cast thereon be in the negative, such law, or such part of a law, shall thereby be repealed. Provided, that if a referendum petition is signed by fifteen per centum of the electors of the state, the law or part of a law, against which such petition is filed shall be suspended pending the referendum vote thereon.

"Any law providing for a tax levy or appropriating money for the current expenses of the state government or state institutions, any act of the legislature submitting a constitutional amendment or other question to the electors of the state, or any emergency law necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, shall go into effect immediately upon its passage and approval by the governor, and such laws, except emergency laws, shall not be subject to a referendum vote. All other laws shall go into effect ninety days after the adjournment of the legislature. A bill proposing an emergency law shall contain a preamble briefly setting forth the facts constituting the emergency. A separate vote shall be taken upon the preamble of such bill by a call of the yeas and nays, and if the preamble be adopted by a two-thirds vote of all the members of each house, it shall be an emergency law.

"d. GENERAL PROVISIONS.—All petitions provided for in this section shall contain a title indicating the subject and purpose of the proposed law or constitutional amendment, or the law, or part of a law, to be referred, and if a change is proposed in an existing constitutional provision or statute, in addition to referring to the same, it shall state the general effect of the proposed change, and also the full text of the proposed law or amendment to the constitution or of the law, or part of a law, to be referred. Any initiative or referendum petition may be signed in separate parts, but each part shall conform to the provisions herein contained. All petitions shall be signed and verified before a person authorized to administer an oath, and shall be in such form that a person signing a petition thereby states under oath, the date of his signature, his residence, that he is a qualified elector, that he has not previously signed any part of such petition, and that he has signed the petition with knowledge of the contents thereof. To each part of such petition shall be attached the affidavit of the person before whom the same was signed, which affidavit shall contain a statement of the number of signers thereon, that each of the signatures attached to such part was made in the presence of the affiant, that to the best of his knowledge and belief each signature is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be, that he believes the persons who have signed such petition to be electors, that they signed such petition with knowledge of the contents thereof, and that each person signed the same on the date stated opposite his name. The circulation of the petitions provided for herein, or the prohibition of the circulation thereof, may be regulated by law, and in case the circulation of any petition is prohibited by law, the percentage of signers required on any petition provided for in this section shall be one-half of the percentage specified in subdivisions A, B and C of this section.

"The percentage in any case shall be based upon the total number of votes cast for governor at the next preceding election. All petitions provided for in this section shall contain the signature of not less than one-half of the designated percentage of the electors in not less than one-fourth of the counties of the state. In initiating a law or constitutional amendment, electors who have signed the first shall be qualified to sign the second petition. The sufficiency of all petitions shall be decided by the secretary of state subject to review by the court. If the secretary of state decides that any petition is insufficient, he shall permit a reasonable time for making corrections or for filing additional signatures. In the event of legal proceedings in court to prevent giving effect to any such petition on account of insufficiency, or any other ground, the burden of proof shall be upon the person attacking the petition. No law or amendment to the constitution initiated and approved by the electors as herein provided, shall be held unconstitutional, or void on account of the insufficiency of any initiative petition; nor shall the repeal of any law submitted by referendum petition be held invalid for such insufficiency.

"All initiative laws and constitutional amendments shall be so submitted to the electors as to permit an affirmative or negative vote upon each measure submitted. If conflicting proposed laws or conflicting proposed amendments to the constitution be approved at the same election, the one receiving the highest number of affirmative votes shall prevail as to conflicting provisions.

"The style of all legislative measures and amendments to the constitution initiated by the people under this section shall be: 'Be it enacted by the people of the State of Minnesota.'

"The provisions of this section may be enforced by appropriate legislation, but until such legislation has been enacted, this section shall be self-executing."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to give to the electors the privilege of submitting directly to the voters constitutional amendments, proposed legislation and the right to suspend and annul laws enacted by the Legislature.

SECOND PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The second proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 585 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose and object of this amendment is to add two Associate Justices to the Supreme Court; to require the concurrence of five Justices of the Supreme Court before any law shall be declared unconstitutional by such court, and make the office of Clerk of the Supreme Court appointive, and is an amendment of Section 2 of Article 6 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, but the number of the associate justices may be increased to a number not exceeding four, by the legislature, by a two-thirds vote, when it shall be deemed necessary. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the State, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified, and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and six associate justices. Five shall constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of at least four shall be necessary to a decision, but no statute shall be declared unconstitutional unless five members of the court shall concur in the decision. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions, and a clerk of the supreme court."

EFFECT: The present constitution provides that the number of Associate Justices of the Supreme Court shall not exceed four in number, while the amendment, if adopted, will increase the number to six. A majority of the Supreme Court may now declare a law unconstitutional, but if this amendment is adopted, it will require the concurrence of five members. The office of clerk of the Supreme Court is now elective, but if this amendment is adopted, the clerk of the Supreme Court will be appointed by the court.

THIRD PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The third proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 586 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is sought to authorize the State to construct roads, ditches, fire breaks through and around unsold state school and swamp lands, and a $250,000 revolving fund, realized and kept up from the sale of such lands, is to be set apart for such purpose. This is an amendment of Section 2 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Section 2. The proceeds of such lands as are or hereafter may be granted by the United States for the use of schools within each township of this State shall remain a perpetual school fund to the State; and not more than one-third (⅓) of said lands may be sold in two (2) years, one-third (⅓) in five years, and one-third (⅓) in ten (10) years but the lands of the greatest valuation shall be sold first; provided, that no portion of said lands shall be sold otherwise than at public sale. The principal of all funds arising from sales or other disposition of lands or other property, granted or entrusted to this State in each township for educational purposes, shall forever be preserved inviolate and undiminished; and the income arising from the lease or sale of said school lands shall be distributed to the different townships throughout the State, in proportion to the number of scholars in each township, between the ages of five and twenty-one years and shall be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations.

"Investment of Funds.—Suitable laws shall be enacted by the legislature for the safe investment of the principal of all funds which have heretofore arisen or which may hereafter arise from the sale or other disposition of such lands, or the income from such lands accruing in any way before the sale or disposition thereof, in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, or of the State of Minnesota, issued after the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty (1860), or of such other state as the legislature may, by law, from time to time direct.

"Swamp Lands.—Division of proceeds. All swamp lands now held by the State, or that may hereafter accrue to the state, shall be appraised and sold in the same manner and by the same officers, and the minimum price shall be the same, less one-third (⅓), as is provided by law for the appraisement and sale of the school lands under the provisions of title one (1) of Chapter thirty-eight (38) of the General Statutes. The principal of all funds derived from sales of swamp lands, as aforesaid, shall forever be preserved inviolate and undiminished. One-half (½) of the proceeds of said principal shall be appropriated to the common school fund of the state. The remaining one-half (½) shall be appropriated to the educational and charitable institutions of the State in the relative ratio of cost to support said institutions."

and adds thereto the following:

"A revolving fund of not over Two Hundred Fifty Thousand Dollars ($250,000) may be set apart from the funds derived from the sale of school and swamp lands, to be used in constructing roads, ditches and fire breaks in, through and around unsold school and swamp lands, such fund to be replenished as long as needed from the enhanced value realized from the sale of such lands so benefited."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to permit the State to improve the school and swamp lands of the State out of moneys derived from the sale of such lands, and to bring the State into line with the conditions of the Swamp Land Grant as to drainage of such lands, by providing a revolving fund therefor, pending the ultimate application of the avails of such grant to the common school fund of the State and the educational and charitable institutions thereof.

FOURTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The fourth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 587 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is proposed to repeal the provisions of Section 11 of Article 9 of the Constitution, which section now reads as follows:

"Section 11. There shall be published by the treasurer, in at least one newspaper printed at the seat of government, during the first week in January in each year, and in the next volume of the acts of legislature, detailed statements of all moneys drawn from the treasury during the preceding year, for what purpose and to whom paid, and by what law authorized; and also of all moneys received, and by what authority and from whom."

EFFECT: The Constitution requires the treasurer to publish yearly a detailed statement of the moneys drawn from the treasury during the preceding year, giving the names of the persons to whom paid and the purposes for which it was expended. It also requires a like statement of the names of the persons, and the sources, as to money received, and in both cases a statement of the law under which payments were made, or money paid into the treasury. The effect of this amendment, if the same be adopted, will be to repeal the section of the Constitution mentioned and insofar relieve the treasurer from such publication and the State from the expense thereof. This change in the Constitution, however, would not prevent the Legislature from directing by law that such, or a different publication, of the same or other information, should be made by the treasurer.

FIFTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The fifth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 588 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to permit the permanent school and university funds of this State to be invested in first mortgage loans upon improved and cultivated farm lands of the State. This amendment would change Section 6 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which now reads as follows:

"Sec. 6. The permanent school and university fund of this state may be invested in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this state, but no such investment shall be made until approved by the board of commissioners designated by law to regulate the investment of the permanent school fund and the permanent university fund of this state; nor shall such loan or investment be made when the bonds to be issued or purchased would make the entire bonded indebtedness exceed fifteen (15) per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable real property of the county, school district, city, town or village issuing such bonds; nor shall such loans or indebtedness be made at a lower rate of interest than three (3) per cent per annum, nor for a shorter period than five (5) years, nor for a longer period than twenty (20) years, and no change of the town, school district, city, village or of county lines shall relieve the real property in such town, school district, county, village or city in this state at the time of the issuing of such bonds from any liability for taxation to pay such bonds."

"Section 6. The permanent school and university fund of this state may be invested in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this state, and in first mortgage loans secured upon improved and cultivated farm lands of this state. But no such investment or loan shall be made until approved by the board of commissioners designated by law to regulate the investment of the permanent school fund and the permanent university fund of this state nor shall such loan or investment be made when the bonds to be issued or purchased would make the entire bonded indebtedness exceed 15 per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the county, school district, city, town or village issuing such bonds; nor shall any farm loan or investment be made when such investment or loan would exceed 30 per cent of the actual cash value of the farm land mortgaged to secure said investment; nor shall such investments or loans be made at a lower rate of interest than three per cent per annum, nor for a shorter period than five years, nor for a longer period than thirty years, and no change of the town, school district, city, village or county lines shall relieve the real property in such town, school district, county, village or city in this state at the time of issuing of such bonds from any liability for taxation to pay such bonds.

EFFECT: The present Constitution authorizes the investment of the permanent school and university funds of this State in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this State. This amendment, if adopted, will permit in addition to the foregoing investments, said school and university funds to be invested also in first mortgage loans secured upon improved and cultivated farm lands of this State. The present Constitution provides that no investment shall be made for a longer period than twenty years, while the proposed amendment extends the period to thirty years.

SIXTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to make the term of office of the Judge of Probate four years. This is an amendment of Section 7 of Article 6 of the Constitution, which now reads as follows:

"Section 7. There shall be established in each organized county in the State a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and be held at such time and places as may be prescribed by law. It shall be held by one judge, who shall be elected by the voters of the county for the term of two years. He shall be a resident of such county at the time of his election, and reside therein during his continuance in office; and his compensation shall be provided by law. He may appoint his own clerk where none has been elected; but the legislature may authorize the election, by the electors of any county, of one clerk or register of probate for such county, whose powers, duties, term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. A probate court shall have jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship, but no other jurisdiction, except as prescribed by this Constitution."

"Section 7. Probate Court—Judges to be Elected—Jurisdiction. "There shall be established in each organized county in the state a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and be held at such time and places as may be prescribed by law. It shall be held by one judge, who shall be elected by the voters of the county for the term of four years. He shall be a resident of such county at the time of his election, and reside therein during his continuance in office; and his compensation shall be provided by law. He may appoint his own clerk where none has been elected; but the legislature may authorize the election by the electors of any county, of one clerk or register of probate for such county, whose powers, duties, term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. A probate court shall have jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship, but no other jurisdiction except as prescribed by this Constitution."

EFFECT: The present Constitution provides that the office of Judge of Probate shall be two years and if this amendment is adopted the term of such office will be four years.

SEVENTH PROPOSED ADMENDMENT.

The seventh proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 590 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of said amendment is to fix and limit the number of State Senators.

Section 2 of Article 4 of the Constitution now reads as follows:

"Section 2. The number of members who compose the Senate and House of Representatives shall be prescribed by law, but the representatives in the Senate shall never exceed one member for every 5,000 inhabitants, and in the House of Representatives one member for every 2,000 inhabitants. The representation in both houses shall be apportioned equally throughout the different sections of the State, in proportion to the population thereof exclusive of Indians not taxable under the provisions of law."

It is proposed to substitute therefor the following:

"Section 1. That Section 2 of Article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota be amended so as to read as follows:

"Section 2. In the next and succeeding reapportionments of Senators and Representatives, the Senate shall be composed of sixty-three (63) members and the House of Representatives shall be composed of such number of members as may be prescribed by law. The representation in both Houses shall be apportioned as nearly as practicable, throughout the different sections of the states in proportion to the population thereof, exclusive of Indians not taxable under the provisions of law. Provided, however, that a County may be divided into several legislative districts, but no County or any of the parts thereof shall ever constitute or be a part of more than seven (7) Senatorial Districts and not more than seven (7) Senators shall ever be apportioned to any one County."

EFFECT: The object of this amendment is to limit the State Senate to sixty-three members and to prevent any one county having more than seven senators.

EIGHTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The eighth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 591 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to encourage the planting, cultivation and protection of useful forest trees and it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 9 of the Constitution, to be known as Section 17A, and which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article Nine (9) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, is hereby proposed to the people of the State of Minnesota, for their approval or rejection, which amendment, when adopted, shall be known as Section 17a of said Article Nine (9), that is to say:

"'Section 17a. For the purpose of encouraging the planting, cultivation and protection of useful forest trees in this state, laws may be enacted providing for the payment by the State of an annual bounty of not more than Two Dollars and Fifty Cents ($2.50) per acre, for a term, in each case of not more than Ten (10) years, and not exceeding Ten (10) acres, to any one person who shall plant, cultivate and protect useful forest trees upon his own land'."

EFFECT: This amendment, if adopted, will permit the Legislature to enact laws providing for the payment by the State of a limited bounty for a limited term, to persons who shall plant, cultivate and protect useful forest trees upon their own land.

NINTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 8 of the Constitution to be known as Section 7 and which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article eight (8) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota is hereby proposed to the legal voters of said state for their approval or their rejection, which amendment when so approved shall be known as Section seven (7) of said Article eight (8) and shall read as follows:

"'Such of the school and other public lands of the state as are better adapted for the production of timber than for agriculture, may be set apart as state school forests, or other state forests as the legislature may provide, and the legislature may provide for the management of the same on forestry principles. The net revenue therefrom shall be used for the purpose for which the lands were granted to the state'."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will authorize the Legislature to set apart for state school forests or other state forests, state public lands which are better adapted for timber than for agriculture, and to manage the same upon forestry principles.

TENTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The tenth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 593 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

By this amendment it is proposed to add to Article 7 of the Constitution an entirely new section, providing for a recall, which shall read as follows:

Section 1. That Article Seven (7) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota shall be and the same is hereby amended by adding thereto, at the end of said Article, a new section, which shall be numbered Section 10 of said Article Seven (7) and which shall read as follows:

"Section 10. Every public official in Minnesota, elective or appointive, shall be subject to recall from office by the electors of his official or electoral district as herein provided. A petition demanding his recall setting forth the reasons therefor, signed by such number of electors in his district as shall be provided by law, which number shall not be less than twenty per centum or more than thirty per centum of the total number of votes cast for governor in such district at the last preceding election, shall be filed in the office where petitions for nomination to such office are filed, or in such other office as may be provided by law, and the officer in whose office such petition is filed, shall order a special election for such recall. If such official shall resign within five days after such petition is filed, the vacancy thereby created shall be filled as may be provided by law; but if he shall not so resign, such special election, to be held within twenty-five days after the filing of the petition, shall be called to determine whether such official shall be recalled. On the official ballot at such election shall be printed, in not more than two hundred words, the reasons for demanding the recall of such official as set forth in the petition, and in not more than two hundred words such official's justification of his course in office. Such official shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of such election shall be officially declared. No such petition shall be signed or filed against any official until he shall have held office six months; and no petition shall be signed or filed for the recall of any judicial official within sixty days of the decision, ruling or act complained of in the petition. Such additional legislation as may aid in the operation of this section and proceedings thereunder shall be provided by law. At such election no person shall be voted for, and the only proposition submitted shall be the recall of such official. Any person recalled, as provided in this section, shall be ineligible to fill the vacancy caused by his recall."

PURPOSE AND EFFECT: The purpose of this amendment is to enable a certain number of voters to petition and cause to be submitted to a vote the question of removing from office any elective or appointive public officials

ELEVENTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT

By this amendment it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 9 of the Constitution, to be known as Section 18, which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article 9 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota is hereby proposed to the people of the State for their approval or rejection, which amendment, if approved, shall be known as Section 18 of Article 9 of the Constitution and shall read as follows:

"'Section 18. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of dogs on a basis other than the value of the dog, and from the fund derived from such tax, authorizing payment of the damages sustained by the owners of other domestic animals by reason of injuries caused by dogs.'"

PURPOSE AND EFFECT: The present basis for taxing dogs is upon actual value. The proposed amendment, if adopted, will permit the Legislature to enact laws changing this basis. It is proposed to create a fund out of which owners of domestic animals may be reimbursed for loss sustained by reason of injuries caused by dogs.

Yours respectfully,
LYNDON A. SMITH,
Attorney General.

St. Paul, May 6, 1914.

Mr. Julius A. Schmahl,
Secretary of State.

Dear Sir: Referring to proposed Constitutional Amendment No. 4 would say: As state expert printer I have given the publications involved in this proposed amendment special thought, and am of opinion both these publications are entirely superfluous. The extensive annual publication "in a daily newspaper published at the capital city" attracts absolutely no attention. The annual report of the state treasurer is published in book form, and to an extent that makes it easy for every person specially concerned to secure a copy. To conform strictly with the law as it is at present, means the expenditure, under reasonably favorable printing contracts, of approximately $8,000, a sum which can be used to excellent advantage under conditions which ordinarily suggest the greatest care and economy upon the part of those under whose direction the printing fund is expended.

Yours respectfully,
J. T. MANNIX,
State Expert Printer.

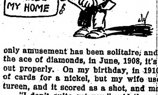
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Taps Own Pay Envelope First Time in 27 Years

BOSTON, MASS.—When John Gearon of Malden skidded to the altar 27 years ago he wore a veteran dress suit, had a small set piece in his coat lapel, and did everything possible to make the incident appear like a wedding, but when he was arraigned in court here, charged with nonsupport, he declared that something went wrong with the arrangements and he was sentenced to life by a quiet-appearing clergyman.



I'M GOING TO TAKE ENOUGH OUT OF MY PAY ENVELOPE TO GET THIS TOOTH OUT IF I LOSE MY HOME

"I love my wife," said Mr. Gearon, "but, oh, you kid, judge, I've led a life."

"No nonsense," said the judge sternly.

"Practically none," answered Mr. Gearon, ignoring the reprimand. "My only amusement has been solitaire, and as I lost one card in 1895 and another, the ace of diamonds, in June, 1908, it's been very, very hard to make it come out properly. On my birthday, in 1910, I made arrangements to buy a pack of cards for a nickel, but my wife used the range finder with a large soup tureen, and it scored as a shot, and made me crosseyed for a week."

"I don't quite get you," said the court patiently. "Do you mean that you have had no money in twenty-seven years?"

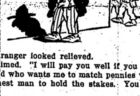
"Judge," he said, "in twenty-seven years I have never opened my pay envelope until last Saturday. Along about four o'clock a nerve in my tooth exploded; my hair stood up like wire and my jaw swelled out so that I couldn't put my hat on. When I got paid at six o'clock I was so dizzy I didn't care what became of me, and I ripped my envelope and had a dentist pull out a tooth."

"Hold!" said the court, apparently in a daze. "I will continue this case. For some reason, I don't seem to be able to quite get it. I will consider it all until next Monday at ten o'clock, at which time I will give my decision."

Farmer Glad He Is Clever; Hands Stranger Cash

CHICAGO.—The supply never fails, because there is a new one born every minute, and sometimes twins. John Bjorheim is considered a smart farmhand in Montana. There he earned $323 and started for Norway a few days ago.

When he arrived in Chicago he went to the Elk hotel in South State street, and after depositing his baggage went out for a walk on Michigan avenue.



I'LL SHOW EM THAT I'M HONEST

He smiled as he thought of the disappointment any swindler would have if he tried to sell any of those high buildings to a smart farmhand from Montana.

A well-dressed stranger saw the smile of amusement.

"Tell me the joke," he suggested.

Bjorheim told his joke and the stranger looked relieved.

"An honest man at last," he exclaimed. "I will pay you well if you will do a little work for me. I have a friend who wants me to match pennies with him. I have been looking for an honest man to hold the stakes. You are sure you are honest?"

"Oh, yes," Bjorheim assured him, and they started away together to the penny matching place at Twenty-fourth street and Indiana avenue. The other man was waiting to match pennies.

"Maybe this man isn't honest," he objected.

"He has $323," said Bjorheim's new friend.

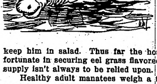
"I'll bet he has not—let me count it," said the other, and Bjorheim handed over the roll.

"We'll walk around this way," said the man, "and you walk around the other way and meet us. We will have the money counted by then."

Bjorheim started around the block. He walked around the block several times. Then he told the police.

Hungry Manatee Always Bellowing for Eel Grass

NEW YORK.—Once in a while a guest drops into the zoo and makes things a trifling embarrassing. Now, for example, you take Pa Knick's very latest guest, a most amiable old manatee which lately splashed into the tank at the Aquarium after having come all the way from "down South." Sure he's welcome, but the matter of making him feel so is something else again.

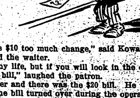


You know there is nothing makes one feel quite so at home as to find just what he likes to eat on the table. But when you have an old cow-faced, herbivorous, manatoid, sirenian mammal on your hands that likes nothing better to eat than salt eel grass, and when that isn't handy most any other kind of water grass, why, it is hard to keep him in salad. Thus far the hosts down at the Aquarium have been fortunate in securing eel grass flavored just to the manatee's taste. But the supply isn't always to be relied upon.

Healthy adult manatees weigh a ton and a half when they get all they want to eat. They grow to be eight feet long. How long they live no one knows. They're good natured and like to be petted.

Don't Get Worried About the Double-Faced Bill

DETROIT, MICH.—Beware of the double-faced currency issued by the United States government, lest it land you in jail for a few days while the wondering folk of the country recover from an imaginary scare, and get the government officials to prove that a $10 bill with a $20 back on it is a bona-fide note. Some time ago the printers of our United States money got some plates mixed and eight notes with a perfect print of $20 on one side and $10 on the other were put into circulation.



The other night Nicholas Kowalski purchased a 25-cent lunch in a Michigan avenue Baltimore lunch. He tendered what he thought was a $10 note in payment. The clerk refunded him $19.75. "Here, you have given me $10 too much change," said Kowalski.

"You gave me a $20 bill," retorted the waiter.

"I never had so much money in my life, but if you will look in the cash register, you'll find that it was a $10 bill," laughed the patron.

The waiter opened the cash register and there was the $20 bill. He took it out and threw it on the counter. The bill turned over during the operation and there it was a $10 note. Both the customer and the waiter pinched themselves several times to make sure they were not dreaming. The bill remained the same.

The police were called and both men taken into custody, Kowalski claiming that it was not the bill he had tendered the waiter, and the waiter alleging that Kowalski was trying to pass a counterfeit bill on him.

IN THE LIMELIGHT

GERMANY'S AMBASSADOR TO AMERICA

© HARRIS & EWING

To place Germany's part in the present war in a fitting light before the American people is the task undertaken by Count von Bernstorff, German ambassador to the United States.

The count is untiring in this duty. He cut short his summer vacation at Newport and in order to be in closer touch with great American news sources has opened a temporary embassy in a New York hotel. About every third day he runs down to Washington to visit the state department and to discuss with officials various situations that arise through the war.

The German ambassador enjoys a tremendous popularity in Washington, where his genial good nature and frank, unassuming democracy make him decidedly a diplomatic lion. His colleagues of the corps are devoted to him.

The ambassador is fond of social life and his engagement book is as crowded as a debutante's. With the Countess von Bernstorff an efficient aide, the German embassy is a center of diplomatic entertaining during the season.

VROOMANS ARE FOND OF SOCIAL LIFE

In a social sense the appointment of Carl Schurz Vrooman to succeed Doctor Galloway as assistant secretary of agriculture is eminently satisfactory. The present regime is well endowed with intellectual, serious-minded and grave chatelaines. The coming of Mrs. Vrooman, who is intellectual to a degree and the author of books, but who is also witty, vivacious and young enough to plunge heart and soul into the relaxing side of official life, augurs well for the winter.

From the butterfly viewpoint, the office of the assistant secretary of agriculture has been negligible. None of Mr. Vrooman's predecessors took the slightest interest in the social amenities, beyond figuring with the head of the department on solemn occasions like New Year's receptions or the coming of learned bodies to hold congresses or consultations.

Mrs. Vrooman has been reared in the social atmosphere, and she knows Washington as well as a native and she knows all the capitals of Europe as well. Her family has long been on terms of intimacy with Secretary of State and Mrs. Bryan.

She is the niece of the late Adlai Stevenson and with Mrs. Scott had the pleasure of entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Bryan during the campaign when Mr. Stevenson was second on the ticket and the friendship has been cemented with the years. She is also a warm friend of Postmaster General and Mrs. Burleson and their daughters.

WIFE OF AMBASSADOR TO RUSSIA

© HARRIS & EWING

To be the wife of an ambassador to Russia, where the court life is said by many to be the most splendid in the world, and then, when the bags are packed and everything is ready, to find one's self marooned with but faint hope of immediate departure, is, to say the least, disconcerting.

That is the predicament of Mrs. George T. Marye of Washington, D. C., wife of the newly-appointed ambassador to the court of the czar. Mrs. Marye is in Washington, her court dress in Paris and between her and her court dress and her final destination are several thousand miles of water, which (at the time of writing) no ship seems anxious to traverse.

At the home of the Maryes everything is in readiness for instant departure. All shipping lines are being watched in the hope that an announcement will appear that some ship—any passenger ship—is ready to sail.

There is a vast difference between the social functions and etiquette of official Washington and the medieval splendor of the court at St. Petersburg in times of peace, ruled over by his majesty, Nicholas II, and his beautiful Empress Alexandra Feodorovna, but Mrs. Marye is well fitted for her new station.

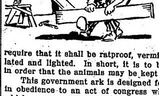
VETERAN OF JAPANESE WAR

Gen. Nicholas Vladimirovich Russky, whose victories on the Austrian border, including the taking of Lemberg and the capture of many thousands of Austrian soldiers in an advance remarkable for its quickness, have given him the nickname "Russky the Spectacular" among military writers, was already known when he entered upon this campaign. That reputation he won in the Russo-Turkish war and in the war with Japan. Educated in the Petrograd gymnasium, the Constantine Military school and the Nicholas academy of the general staff, he made a thorough study of his profession and passed with high honors. In the field he won distinction early, becoming colonel at thirty-one and major general at forty-two. His achievements in the Russo-Turkish war marked him for a high position in the next campaign, and at the beginning of the Japanese war he was appointed chief of staff in the Second Manchurian army. He has subsequently turned to good account the lessons he learned in the course of that campaign in the organization and command of masses of troops.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Why Uncle Sam Is Building a New Noah's Ark

WASHINGTON.—Uncle Sam is building a real Noah's Ark in the city of Washington. True, it is never expected to make a voyage, but it will be located on the banks of the Potomac, not far from the water, so that with a little structural modification it might be set afloat in case of necessity.



The ark will be 90 feet long and 35 feet wide—or "beam"—as navigators would say. It will be of two stories, or decks, and built expressly for the accommodation of animals, which will include monkeys, dogs, cats, mice, rats, rabbits, guineapigs, horses, chickens, calves and goats.

The affair will be in some respects very superior to Noah's celebrated craft, inasmuch as the plans require that it shall be ratproof, verminproof, fireproof and excellently ventilated and lighted. In short, it is to be as sanitary a structure as possible, in order that the animals may be kept healthy and comfortable.

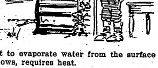
This government ark is designed for scientific purposes. It is to be built in obedience to an act of congress which became law August 13, 1912, and which requires the public health service to "investigate the diseases of man." The contract for its construction has been let for $20,852.

If the ark were called a sanitarium for beasts and birds, such a term would not be much amiss, inasmuch as the inmates are to be subjected therein to hospital treatment.

There is to be no vivisection on board the ark—no operations of experimental surgery. The patients will be treated as kindly and carefully as if they were human.

Here Is a Jolt for the Old-Fashioned Farmer

THE old-fashioned farmer who governed his planting by the movements of the moon will receive a jolt from a bulletin just issued by the department of agriculture declaring that neither the moon nor the planets have the slightest effect on weather conditions, and, therefore, cannot have any effect on planting. "Plant your corn in the full of the moon"—a rule regarded as little short of sacred in many rural communities, is entirely disproved, according to the department's bulletin.



IT'S TIME TO PLANT TH' CORN

"All weather changes depend on temperature differences," the bulletin says. "The temperature, as we know, constitutes of itself a most important weather factor. Another and equally important weather factor is rainfall. But to obtain rain it is necessary first to evaporate water from the surface of the earth, and this, as everyone knows, requires heat.

"Still another important weather factor is the direction and force of the wind, and this, too, requires heat, for the winds will not blow unless the temperature is different at one place from what it is at another any more than the air will draw up a chimney where there is no fire in it.

"Since, then, the heating of the earth and its atmosphere to different temperature is the real cause of the winds and of all weather changes, it follows that the moon and the planets can affect the weather only so far as they supply heat.

"The amount of heat sent to the earth by all the planets and by the moon is insignificant in comparison to the amount that comes from the sun. Hence, we could not expect the moon or the planets to appreciably affect the weather since they do not supply heat, the one thing that causes all our weather changes."

Forty Souls Were Lost for the Want of Straw

JUDGE W. A. WATSON, one of Virginia's new representatives, lives in a town called by the unique name of "Jenning's Ordinary." This odd title is derived from the fact that in colonial days it was customary to call a tavern or inn an "ordinary" when procuring a license for same, and the name of Jenning's Ordinary, or Jenning's inn, has come down the years with its quaint, old English sound.

DERE IS 40 SOULS LOST FUR DE WANT OB STRAW

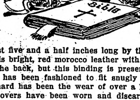
Like most members from the Old Dominion, the judge has a large constituency of colored people, and knows some good stories of their peculiarities. Among the most popular institutions of that section of the country is the annual summer camp-meeting, at which religion and watermelons are both liberally dispensed, with watermelons largely in the majority.

The colored sisters, after weeks of seeking religion, often fall into a trance when they "feel they are saved," and this necessitates having the ground spread with straw. But one night the deacon had looked upon the melon when it was red too long and neglected his duty in this respect. So no sister "got 'ligion" for fear of falling on the bare ground.

This rattled the preacher. Rising, with the moon shining on his ebony countenance, he shook his fist at the erring deacon, exclaiming: "You done failed in yo' duty and now dere is forty souls lost here tonight for want er straw!"

Government's Oldest Bible Is in Supreme Court

WHAT is known as the oldest Bible in the keeping of the government is the volume preserved in the clerk's office of the Supreme court. Since 1800 every chief justice who took oath used it, with the exception of Chase. All members of this same court are sworn in on it, as well as all lawyers who try cases before this august tribunal.



Daniel Webster, however, is said to be an exception to this rule, for when the time came for administering the oath to the great statesman, the clerk of that day, a Mr. Caldwell, was so much impressed by the fame of Webster and so anxious to hear him begin his speech, that he forgot the usual ceremony.

The book is a very small one, just five and a half inches long by three and a half inches wide. The binding is bright, red morocco leather with the word "Bible" in tiny gold letters on the back, but this binding is preserved by the black leather covering, which has been fashioned to fit snugly and slipped over the original backs. So hard has been the wear of over a hundred years of use that 15 of these covers have been worn and discarded. Contrary to the belief of most people, the presidents do not take their oath on the Bible of the Supreme court. As a rule, they use one of their own, but as there is occasionally a time when the incoming executive forgets the needed volume, the clerk of the Supreme court always keeps a new Bible on hand. If this is used, it is immediately presented to the wife of the new president.

FRENCH-BELGIUM BORDER IS STILL MAIN BATTLE GROUND

GERMAN PROGRESS ADMITTED; YSER CANAL IS CROSSED

INVADERS ADVANCE A LITTLE MORE INLAND AND ESCAPE FIRE OF FRENCH AND BRITISH WARSHIPS.

TERRIBLE FIGHTING TOLD OF IN PETROGRAD REPORT

Slaughter Said to Have Been Fearful in Fighting Near Kozienica—Austrian Official Announcement Tells of Capture of 3,400 More Muscovites.

London, Oct. 27.—It appears from official reports issued from German and French headquarters that the Germans, finding it impossible to advance along the coast toward Dunkirk, owing to the fire from the British and French warships, took a route a little more inland and have succeeded in crossing the Yser canal, which the Belgians have been defending stubbornly for a week past, to the west of Dixmude.

Germans Hold Ypres.

The Germans also have made progress to the northwest of Ypres and still are in possession of Roulers, towards which the allies were advancing last week and at one time were reported to have captured. The Germans claim to have taken 500 British troops in the fighting in this neighborhood.

Of the gains claimed by the Germans, the French reports made no mention, dismissing the battle with:

"There is no change to report between the sea and the region around Arras."

Weather Adds to Trials.

To add to the trials of the troops a short spell of fine weather has given place to another downpour of rain, which will convert the lowlands of Flanders into great lakes.

Of the battles on the center and left wing the German report does not speak, but the French declare they are maintaining their positions in the Argonne and on the heights of the Meuse, and have destroyed three more German batteries. From unofficial sources it is learned that the French have made some advances in the mountains along the Alsace border.

Great Battle in Poland.

In Poland a very heavy battle now is in progress between the fortresses of Ivangorod and Radom, where the Germans and Austrians, who were defeated in the first attempt to cross the Vistula before the former city, have made a stand against the Russians, who have followed in the hope of destroying them.

Both sides have, according to their own reports, made prisoners and captured guns, but the battle, which extends over a front of 26 miles, has not yet been decided.

The Austrians are still making a bold effort to cross the River San and are carrying on a splendid fight south of Przemysl in the hope of reaching and recapturing Lemberg.

Montenegrins Withdraw.

The Montenegrins admit that they have had to withdraw to their previous positions along the Bosnian frontier after an attack by a superior force of Austrians. The latter, in fact, seem to be fighting in a manner of which their first performance in the war hardly gave promise.

Turkey, which it was believed at one time had decided to throw in her lot with German, again has assured the ambassadors of Great Britain, France and Russia that she intends to maintain her policy of neutrality.

Turkey Still Active.

Turkey, however, continues her military activities and is collecting transport animals, which, it is said, are destined for the Egyptian frontier.

It is considered that strong Russian forces on the Turkish border have influenced her.

Fierce Fight at La Bassee.

Paris, Oct. 27.—The German masses at La Bassee appear, from the desperate efforts which they are making, to be trying to shake themselves loose from the close grip of the allies, who menace their communications from there and from Armentiers. The intense ardor of the battle is undiminished. Both armies have received reinforcements, but the allied lines have withstood formidable shocks and delivered severe counter attacks.

The furious nature of the conflict can be gathered from the fact that in front of one British infantry division in a very small space over 1,500 German bodies were found after an engagement, while 600 Germans prisoners were taken by the British in the course of the attack.

La Bassee, which forms a promonitory near Lille, is a very important point covering railroads which the Germans seems determined to capture at whatever cost, but the allies' resistance hithertoo has been too stubborn.

Russ Are Optimistic.

London, Oct. 26.—The Petrograd correspondent of the Post, in telegraphing a review of the situation on the Russian front, says:

"Only time is now required to reduce the Germanic forces in their entirety from a fighting army to a beaten mob. The Russian cavalry is pressing hard upon their retreat, which is over abominable sloughs of roads, fringed by bog land and marshy forests. Prisoners and other trophies of success are being taken all the time, but no attempt has yet been made to estimate their number.

"Wounded men, in their accounts of the fighting around the village of Kozienica, state that while the artillery duel was proceeding for several days and nights the troops were unable to move. Finally the artillery fire became equal on both sides and orders came to make a bayonet attack. The soldiers, stiff and miserable from their long confinement in the flooded trenches, were only too delighted at the order and dashed upon the German line with irresistible vigor.

Terrible Fight Ensues.

"The Germans, for the second time during the war on this side, met them with the bayonet and a terrible fight ensued. Neither side could gain the advantage and the slaughter was fearful.

"Finally a Russian hurrah came down on the wind from the flank, followed by brisk firing. The Germans mistook this for a successful outflanking movement and they broke and fled, abandoning everything in their run for safety. The Russians pursued them for 20 miles and the plain was strewn with the German dead."

No Decisive Battle Yet.

London, Oct. 26—The Germans have undertaken a general offensive movement along the line extending from the mouth of the River Yser on the North Sea to the River Meuse, and while they have compelled the allies to give ground in some places, they themselves have lost positions in others. This, in a few words, is what is gathered from official reports from the French and the German headquarters.

Warships Aid Belgians.

The Belgians are being aided by the French land forces; the British warships on the sea, and the British monitors and small gunboats in the canals and rivers.

The ferocity of the three-cornered bombardment continues undiminished. Losses on both sides are reported to be terrific. The Germans are reported to have left 10,000 dead and wounded on the field.

Although it is now just two months since the allies concentrated on the France-Belgian frontier to oppose the German advance and the invaders have ben almost to Paris and back in the interval no decisive battle has been fought. Neither side has destroyed or even partly destroyed an army. Even the Belgian army escaped almost intact after the country was overrun by the Germans.

The same can be said of operations in the east, where the armies of Russia, Germany and Austria are fighting, except in the case of Lieut. General Samsonoff, the Russian commander, whose army was partially destroyed by the Germans in the battle of Tannenberg, East Prussia.

Russians Score Victory.

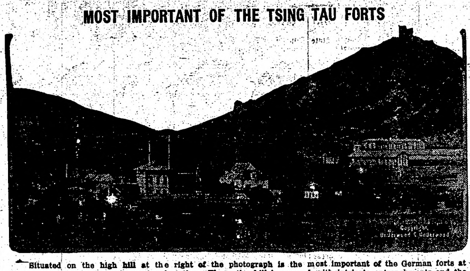
In the present battle on the river Vistula, from Warsaw south to the river Pilica, the Russians are said to have scored an important victory in driving the Germans back and have captured many prisoners, besides guns and ammunition. But the defeated army, when it gets back to its selected position, can entrench and start another siege battle such as that which occurred on the river Aisne in France. Southward of the Pilica the Germans hold the river Vistula except in front of the fortress at Iyangorod, where they were driven back by attacks from that stronghold.

The Austrian army, which was so often described as routed and destroyed in the battles of Galicia, has sprung into life again and is attacking the Russian left wing. The Austrians, however, apparently have found an impenetrable barrier at the River San north of Jaroslow.

Tsing-Tau Reported Captured.

Tokio, Oct. 26.—Unofficial reports printed in the Japanese newspapers say that Tsing-Tau has fallen. The admiralty refuses to confirm these rumors, but the city is making preparations to celebrate a great victory.

MOST IMPORTANT OF THE TSING TAU FORTS



Situated on the high hill at the right of the photograph is the most important of the German forts at Tsing Tan, China. It is also a signal station. The entire hill is covered with intricate entrenchments and the emplacements for big guns are cleverly concealed.

★ LATE WAR DEVELOPMENTS ★

Unable to continue their advance against Dunkirk along the coast on account of the fire from the Franco-British warships, the German movement swung inward and reports now indicate the Teutons have now crossed the Yser canal, which the Belgians have been defending for the past week. Progress has also been made to the northeast of Ypres, the Germans still occupying Roulers, which was reported taken by the allies. The allies are holding their ground, even gaining slightly in Alsace—along the west of the great battle front.

Refugees From Tsing-Tau Say Thousands Fall in Attack on German Positions.

Peking, China, Oct. 22.—Refugees who have come out of Tsing-Tau, the fortified position in the German possession in Shantung province, are authority for the statement that up to the time they left the Japanese had lost several thousand men before Tsing-Tau, while the casualties of the Germans did not amount to more than several hundred.

Reliable information obtained in Peking is to the effect that a British detachment sustained a number of casualties while crossing land that had been mined by the Germans in Kiao-Chow.

Belgians Answer German Charge.

Paris, Oct. 26.—A Bordeaux dispatch to the Havas agency says: "The Belgian legation has issued a note replying to recent allegations in the North German Gazette, the official German organ, regarding the discovery by the German forces in Brussels of documents indicating a prearrangement between the Belgians and British armies hostile to Germany. The note says that if the German newspapers will publish in full the documents found in the search of secret archives in Belgium there will be discovered new proof of the correct and loyal attitude of Belgium during 44 years."

106 KILLED IN WARSAW IN TWO RAIDS.

Civilians in the City Suffer Worse Than Soldiers Defending It—Few Prisoners Are Taken.

London, Oct. 27.—"The German campaign with aeroplane bombs against Warsaw has been rather effective," says the Warsaw correspondent of Reuter's Telegraph company. "On one day forty-four people were killed or wounded and of these only nine were soldiers.

"On another day there were sixty-two casualties. No soldiers were injured at that time, but many children who were drawn into the streets by curiosity were struck.

"Each aeroplane apparently had an equipment of five bombs, which were fired at intervals in the flight across the city.

"From all accounts the Germans for some time were under the delusion that they would be welcomed in Warsaw and, therefore, started the dropping of bombs from aeroplanes comparatively late in the fighting.

"Relatively few prisoners have been taken in the fighting along the Vistula. This is explained by the mutual hatred of the contestants and their determination to come to mortal clutches. During a fight at Rashin, near Warsaw, the Germans were strongly entrenched in the forests. The Russians set fire to the woods, smoking out the Germans, and then turned their artillery on them."

Anti-Austrian Sentiment.

Rome, Oct. 26.—Before an audience of several thousand people Signor Battisti, the Socialist deputy from Trent, Austria, pictured what he said were the frightful conditions in the Italian provinces under Austria. He urged that Italy free them.

The deputy lauded Emperor Nicholas for his offer to liberate Austrian prisoners of war who are of Italian descent. This called for a great demonstration in which the emperor was loudly cheered.

SINKS 13 BRITISH VESSELS

GERMAN CRUISER KARLSRUHE OPERATES IN ATLANTIC.

London, Oct. 24.—A dispatch from Teneriffe, Canary islands, to the Daily Mail, reports that the German cruiser Karlsruhe has sunk 13 British merchantmen in the Atlantic.

The great haul of merchant ships by the Karlsruhe, now fully confirmed, has been a rude shock to those who have been contending that he Atlantic ocean was held safely by the British navy, but the apologists have lost no time in pointing out that the fleet cannot at the same moment convoy hundreds of transports and safeguard every merchant ship.

The sinking of merchant vessels without loss of life, it is being remarked, involves no military injury, while the capture of a group of transports would be a disaster. Chambers of commerce, however, are agitating for a sweeping operation sufficiently wide to net both the German cruiser Emden, in Indian waters, and the equally successful Karlsruhe.

The news of the Karlsruhe's exploit, according to the Daily Mail's Teneriffe correspondent, was brought to that port by the German steamer, Crefeld.

The Crefeld arrived there with the crews of the British steamers, Strathroy, Maple Branch, Highland Hope, Indrani, Rio Ignasseu, Farn, Niceto, Maria de Larrinaga, Cervantes, Cornish City, Pruth, Conder and Lynrowan, all of which were sunk by the Karlsruhe. The Crefeld was accompanied into port by the German steamers, Patagonia, Rio Negro and Asuncion.

A later message states that more than 400 men of the crews are prisoners and that the merchantmen were mostly sunk in the Atlantic. The ships were mostly engaged in the South American trade.

The cruiser, Karlsruhe, a ship of a trifle less than 5,000 tons, has had in this war a career as eventful in the Atlantic as that of its smaller sister ship, the Emden, in the Indian ocean.

WAR REVENUE BILL CHANGES TO COST FIFTEEN MILLIONS

ESTIMATED ANNUAL INCREASE OF $105,000,000 IN ORIGINAL MEASURE DROPS TO $90,000,000 ON AGREEMENT.

INCREASE IN LIQUOR TAX REJECTED AT LAST MOMENT

Cotton Issue Is Lost and Relief Measures Are Held to Be Unsound—Theater Taxes Changed, Beer Kept at $1.50 Per Barrel—Gasoline Exempt.

Washington, Oct. 23.—Agreement on the war revenue bill was reported by senate and house conferees at a sacrifice of from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 in revenue proposed to be derived. At the last moment the conferees eliminated the proposed amendments to the liquor taxes, rejecting the senate amendments to increase the tax on beer from $1.50 to $1.75 a barrel and to impose a tax of 5 cents a gallon on rectified spirits.

In sacrificing these amendments the conferees made no substitution, Representative Underwood's proposal to restore the tax of 2 cents a gallon on gasoline, as contained in the house bill having been rejected by the senate conferees. This action fixed the estimated annual revenue at approximately $90,000,000 instead of $105,000,000 as contemplated in the senate bill.

Throughout the conferees fought over the liquor tax and gasoline amendment, the compromise proposal having been carried to the president by Senator Simmons and Representative Underwood. Final agreement, however, paved the way for early adjournment, and leaders in both houses planned to expedite adoption of the report so that the session might be ended at once.

Cotton Legislation Lost.

Cotton legislation met defeat in the house, while the war revenue conference was in progress, the measure to provide for a quarter of a billion additional currency through the issuance of United States notes or Panama canal bonds being rejected by a vote of 123 to 93. Lack of a quorum prevented action on the bill to permit national banks to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper up to 100 per cent of unimpaired capital and surplus and also on the measure to license cotton warehouses. Indications were that both these measures would be "pocketed" in the rush for adjournment today.

$1.50 Tax on Beer.

The war revenue bill agreement fixed the tax on beer at $1.50 a barrel, with the senate amendment for a 5 per cent rebate for prompt payment eliminated.

The senate amendment reducing the proposed tax on bank capital and surplus from $2 to $1 a thousand was retained. The senate proposal to tax domestic sweet and dry wines 8 cents a gallon with a tax of 55 cents a gallon on brandies used in the fortification of wines also was retained. The senate amendment increasing the tax on tobacco manufacturers and dealers was agreed to with few exceptions and the stamp taxes were not disturbed. Stock brokers will be taxed $30 a year instead of $50.

The graduated tax on theaters also was changed slightly, the final rates being as follows: Theaters with a seating capacity of 250 or less will pay $25 a year; 500 capacity, $50; 800 capacity, $85; more than 800 capacity, $100 a year.

Called Cotton Plan Unsound.

Chairman Glass of the banking and currency committee, Republican Leader Mann, and others in opposition on both sides, declared the cotton plan was "utterly unsound," and would contract the credit of the country rather than expand it.

The cotton belt members, led by Representative Henry and Hardwick, insisted that the plan followed past treasury policies and that the treasury often made large deposits of government funds to avert financial stress in the various section of the country.

Idaho Treasurer Is Suspected.

Boise, Idaho, Oct. 23.—State Treasurer O. V. Allen was arrested charged with embezzlement in a warrant sworn to by Gov. John M. Hains. An audit of the treasurer's accounts developed enough during the day to warrant the charge that the treasurer was short in his accounts. The specific charge is the embezzlement of $70,345.68. Allen resigned as state treasurer on Monday, following persistent reports of shortages in his office.

White Stockings Coming.

Milwaukee, Wis., Oct. 26.—Stockings are to be white. This is a war note, not a fashion. The three largest stocking factories in the world announce that because the higher prices of dye stuffs, most of which are imported from Germany, the bulk of their output for the coming season will bear the colors of the flag of truce. There will be pink and purple and other colored hose for those who want them and will pay the price, but more stocking than ever before will be white.

INCOME TAX FALLS SHORT

ESTIMATED 146,000 ARE DODGING ASSESSMENTS.

Only $28,000,000 Collected When $45,000,000 Was Expended—44 Persons With Over $1,000,000 Incomes.

Washington, Oct. 24.—Unless the experts who figured out the "taxables" when congress was working on the income tax law were far at sea in their calculations, there are more than 146,000 income tax dodgers who have evaded the internal revenue collector and failed to pay their share of the toll.

According to figures made public by the secretary of the treasury, 357,598 returns were made under the income tax law during the fiscal year just ended. The estimates on which congress did much of its work on the act gave a total of 425,000 taxable incomes. These estimates did not include incomes between $3,000 and $4,000. According to the statement, 79426 returns were made on incomes between these limits, so that the total discrepancy between the estimates and the incomes is 146,828. It was not expected at the time that these estimates would prove correct, but to have actual returns fall so far below the estimates has led to the belief that out of the 146,000 missing there must be many delinquents.

The internal revenue bureau, months ago, announced that it had begun a campaign to detect dodgers. This campaign has been pushed vigorously and it is understood that results may be forthcoming soon. There is little doubt that every effort will be made to catch up with violators, for, as a revenue producer, the law has fallen considerably below expectations, turning in about $28,000,000 for the payable 10 months of last year instead of about $45,000,000 as had been expected. Not a single class of incomes lived up to the hopes of the estimators. In the $5,000 to $10,000 class, however, the discrepancy was greater, the estimates being 178,000 and the return 101,718. Incomes from $4,000 to $5,000 were only found to number 114,484, while the estimate was 126,000.

The announcement showed that 44 returns were made on incomes over $1,000,000; 91 on incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000, and 222 on incomes between $250,000 and $500,000, and 1,241 on incomes between $100,000 and $250,000. In no instance were these figures near the estimates which put the $1,000,000 incomes at 100, the next at 350, the next at 500, and the $100,000 to $250,000 at 2,500.

There were 6,682 married women who made separate returns, the total of all married persons making returns was 278,835; the single men numbered 55,212, and the single women 23,551.

Wilson May Adjourn Congress.

Washington, Oct. 24.—Probabilities that President Wilson would exercise his constitutional power and adjourn congress, inasmuch as congress itself is unable to agree on ending the session, were considered strong by administration leaders after the president had conferred with Speaker Clark and Senators Kern and Overman. Speaker Clark said he was sure both houses, now sitting without a quorum, would be unable to agree on adjournment and he believed the country would indorse such action by the president.

Explorer Likely Drifting on Ice.

Seattle, Wash., Oct. 24.—Vilhjalmur Stefansson, leader of the Arctic exploring party which went north in the ill-fated ship Karluk, is alive and drifting westward on moving ice, probably 150 miles north of the Alaskan coast, in the opinion of Burt M. McConnell, who accompanied Stefansson on his hunting expedition when he became separated from the Karluk.

Two More of Bandits Killed.

Bellingham, Wash. Oct. 26.—Caught in a death trap as they stepped onto a bridge into the glare of a posse's improvised searchlight, two more of the five bandits who robbed the First National bank at Sedro-Woolley of $20,000 a week ago Saturday night, killing a boy and wounding two citizens as they fled, were shot and killed. One of the five was killed and another wounded and captured last Thursday after a fight with a posse, one of whose members was slain. More than $9,000 has been recovered.

Pajamas for the Destitute.

Hoboes cared for next winter at the municipal lodging house in St. Louis will wear pajamas, if the plans of Director of Public Welfare Tolkacz are successful.

The papamas will not be fancy and will not contain ribbons and elaborate trimmings, but they will be serviceable. The night garments probably will be made of material similar to that used for overalls and jumpers.

The purpose of the pajamas equipment is to provide the lodgers with covering during the night, while their clothing is being sterilized. The cots used are of steel, and no bed clothing is furnished.

NEARLY CRAZY WITH ECZEMA

354 Plum St., Youngstown, Ohio.—"Blotches like ringworms started to come out all over my face and neck. Later it took the form of white flakes and when I would rub they came off in little white scales. The eczema so disfigured me that I was ashamed to go out anywhere. It itched all the time and whenever I perspired or got my face the least bit wet, it would burn until I very nearly went crazy. The more I rubbed or scratched the more it spread and it made me so restless I could not sleep at night.

"One day a friend prevailed upon me to get a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment. They caused the itching to stop instantly and in a very few days my face and neck began to show a marked improvement. I used three cakes of Cuticura Soap and one box of Cuticura Ointment and my face and neck are completely cured." (Signed) Newton D. W. Chapman, Feb. 27, 1914.

MRS. THOMSON TELLS WOMEN

How She Was Helped During Change of Life by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Philadelphia, Pa.—"I am just 52 years of age and during Change of Life I suffered for six years terribly. I tried several doctors but none seemed to give me any relief. Every month the pains were intense in both sides, and made me so weak that I had to go to bed. At last a friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to me and I tried it at once and found much relief. After that I had no pains at all and could do my housework and shopping the same as always. For years I have praised Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for what it has done for me, and shall always recommend it as a woman's friend. You are at liberty to use my letter in any way."—Mrs. THOMSON, 649 W. Russell St., Philadelphia, Pa.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

130.5 BU. CORN PER ACRE

Remarkable Record Made by Boy on Dakota County Farm Near Northfield.

Northfield.—Percy Jack, one of the contestants in the boys' state-wide corn growing contest, secured a yield of 130.5 bushels of corn on an acre this season. This remarkable record was made on the farm of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Jack, six miles northwest of Northfield. As it is in Dakota county it will qualify in the central section of the state, as divided by the agricultural college. The corn is ripe and very firm, indicating that it will stand the moisture test well.

The yield is remarkable because the corn was knocked flat by severe storms in June. The corn is of the White Rustler variety; this variety was used by Percy Jack last year, and a yield of 85 bushels secured. From this lot of corn seed was carefully selected and tested. The acre of ground was heavily fertilized with barnyard manure, no commercial fertilizer being used. The field was frequently cultivated by the young corn enthusiast and was always under his personal care.

Warren Simpson, the crippled boy, who was a prize winner in the state corn test last year, raised 112.6 bushels this year. His yield was cut down by severe storms in June. The acres entered in the state contest are husked under the supervision of A. M. Field of the department of agriculture in the Northfield high school.

TO BRING BELGIANS HERE

L. W. Hill Characterizes Idea as "Opportunity for Northwest and Benefit to All."

St. Paul.—Thousands of Belgian farmers, now refugees in Holland, France and England, probably will be brought to Minnesota and given a new start in life.

A big movement to this end has been under way in St. Paul for some days and a thorough canvass of the state for the best available land for the Belgians is being made.

Minnesota is expected to care for the great majority of Belgian farmers, who will leave their stricken country. A number of St. Paul business men have been interested in the movement and have been working quietly.

L. W. Hill, president of the Great Northern railroad, said that the matter has been presented to him and is now having the consideration of the officers of the road.

"It appears to me to be an opportunity for the northwest," said Mr. Hill, "and a practical plan could be worked out. The Belgian farmers are among the best in the world and the results they could obtain in this section of the United States would be a benefit to all."

PASTOR'S SON IS KILLED

Minneapolis.—An investigation of the death of Herbert Riley, 19-year-old son of Rev. W. B. Riley, pastor of the First Baptist church, was completed by Deputy Coroner C. A. Hobbs, who declared that death was due to an accident.

Riley and a 16-year-old companion were hunting gophers near Fiftieth street and France avenue. Both were crawling on the ground and were dragging shotguns. Riley was ahead when his companion's gun was accidentally discharged. The charge entered Riley's side.

Young Riley was taken to a hospital where he died on the operating table.

Dr. Riley, father of the boy, was in Springfield, Mass., to give a series of lectures, but started for home immediately on learning of the accident.

$5,000 ROBBERY PROBABLE

St. Paul Express Driver Failed to Deliver Large Money Shipment.

St. Paul.—The police of St. Paul were confronted with a $5,000 robbery when Peter La Roux, messenger for the Adams Express company, disappeared shortly after he is said to have received two money shipments at the Union station.

According to A. C. Olinger, cashier of the express company, La Roux had collected money packages at a late hour and then failed to deliver them at the office. His wagon was found a half block from the office when employes became alarmed at his long absence and made a search.

La Roux has been employed by the express company for a month only.

Winona Dentist in Court Again.

Winona.—The state board of dental examiners is again after E. E. Murphy of Winona on the charge of practicing dentistry in Minnesota without a license. He was previously prosecuted and fined $10 after failing to complete an appeal to the district court. In municipal court Murphy entered a plea of not guilty to the charge and asked for a jury trial, which was set for Nov. 4. Murphy says he has taken examinations and received credits which entitle him to a license, but that the board has failed to give it to him.

'FLYING SQUADRON' ON WAY

Series of Meetings Arranged in State in Interest of National Prohibition.

Minneapolis.—"The Flying Squadron of America," touring the country in the interest of national prohibition, will hold a series of meetings in Minneapolis Nov. 6, 7 and 8 at the First Baptist church. It will not come under the auspices, management or control of any political party or society, but is independent.

The unification of all who desire national prohibition is the object of the campaign. It is not the purpose of the group to form a new party or permanent organization but to create sentiment and arouse interest in prohibition. The squadron is visiting about 150 cities in all parts of the country, including the great university cities. Two sessions a day will be held.

The speakers will include J. Frank Hanley, former member of congress and governor of Indiana; Eugene W. Chafin, Arizona, twice candidate for president of the United States; Oliver W. Stewart, Illinois, former member of the legislature and prominent in Y. M. C. A. work; Clinton N. Howard, New York; Daniel A. Poling of the national Society of Christian Endeavor; Dr. Iram Landrith, recently president of the International Y. M. C. A.; Dr. Wilbur F. Sheridan, general secretary of the Epworth League of America; Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Topeka, Kas.; J. B. Lewis, Boston.

The music for the meetings will be in the hands of E. O. Excell of Chicago; Everett N. Naftzger of Indianapolis, and Frederick Butler, Yonkers, N. Y.

M. E. A. CHOOSES H. L. MERRILL

Hutchinson, Minn., Superintendent Is Unanimously Selected for President —Method Raises Criticism.

St. Paul.—H. L. Morrill, superintendent of schools at Hutchinson, was elected president of the Minnesota Educational association at the general session of its annual convention in the Auditorium.

A violent debate was started when nominations for president were called for, and several delegates criticized what they termed the undemocratic methods of election. It was asserted that the nomination of Superintendent Merrill had been prearranged by a clique for the purpose of electing him without opposition. All of the debaters said that although they favored the election of Mr. Merrill, they disapproved of a method by which democracy was suppressed.

No other nominations were made, however, and a motion to close the nomination was passed with little opposition.

Three thousand persons attended the portion of the general session which preceded the business meeting. Three addresses were delivered, each of which was frequently interrupted by applause.

CELEBRATION IN LAKEFIELD

Friday and Saturday Fall Festival Days and Farm Work Is Boosted.

Lakefield.—Members of the Commercial club and business men generally are enthusiastic over the showing made at the annual fall festival held here on Friday and Saturday. There were addresses, music by two bands, and exhibit of farm products and an art exhibit by the Lakefield Woman's Civic club.

Over $50 in cash prizes were paid out for the best bushels of corn, the best ten ears, etc. Prizes were also given for the best oats, barley, wheat, rye and clover. The art exhibit consisted of reproductions of famous paintings, samples of hand-made laces and various other work.

Lyndon A. Smith, attorney general, spoke at the town hall on Saturday afternoon.

Free auctions were features. Prizes were awarded for the best displays of vegetables.

Accused Conductor Brings Suit.

Waseca.—One of the largest damage suits in the history of southern Minnesota is to be tried at the present term of district court in this city. It has been brought by Cornelius J. Tierney of St. Paul against the National Surety company and the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad company. Tierney was a passenger conductor on the Minneapolis & St. Louis road and was discharged last summer on the charge of "knocking down" cash fares. He says the charge was untrue and has brought suit for $75,000 against the railway and bonding companies.

Think Licenses Are Safe.

Duluth.—Anticipating a refusal of their request for a rehearing against "dry" orders in the treaty of 1855, saloon men of Hibbing, Coleraine, Grand Rapids and other villages, are reconciled to the belief that liquor should not be furnished to the Indians. They are confident apparently, however, that the subject will be pressed no farther and that as long as they refrain from selling to the Indians their licenses will be safe and no action taken to oust them from business.

CITES SOLOMON TO SAVE

Court Plea Fails, However, and Youth Is Condemned to Workfarm For Thirty Days.

Duluth.—J. T. Mider, farmer and gardener of Pine City, who recently was a candidate for district judge in Pine county, but whose name was stricken from the ballot because he was not an attorney, quoted Solomon to Police Judge Cutting in an effort to save Edward Pries from a jail sentence here, but was unsuccessful.

Pries, who was charged with passing worthless checks, was given a sentence of 30 days on the workfarm. The young man is the son of an old friend of the Pine City man, and that is why the latter appeared in the youth's behalf. Mr. Mider admitted that Pries had committed the crime, but said that it was because of his infatuation with a young woman in Superior, to whom he was giving the money, and pleaded for clemency because of the boy's mother and sister.

"Solomon was the wisest man of all times," said Mr. Mider, in pleading with the court, "and yet he never was able to understand women; so what could you expect of a boy who has lived on a farm all his life? He met this woman, a wanton, and she took all his money. Caesar, Anthony and Napoleon never knew women and they all fell."

Pries passed several worthless checks at the head of the lakes and is wanted in Minneapolis and St. Paul for similar crimes, warrants having been issued by the authorities of the Twin Cities. The check he passed and for which he was convicted was for $15 on the First National bank of Rush City.

STATE CURES MANY CRIPPLES

Report Shows State Hospital Has Cured More Than 20 Per Cent of Those Treated.

St. Paul.—Absolute cures to the number of 499 and 248 partial cures is the remarkable record of the Minnesota state hospital for indigents, and crippled and deformed children located at Phalen Park in St. Paul. This institution is seven years old and is under the direction of the state board of control. The hospital since it was opened in 1907 has treated 986 children. The deaths numbered 72.

Minnesota was among the first of the states to attempt the cure of children's deformities at state expense.

The institution is under the charge of Dr. A. J. Gillette. He and a medical staff, which consists of physicians in the Twin Cities, give their services free of charge.

Many of the children are brought in on crutches and the majority of them can only move about on their hands and knees.

Is Declared Legally Dead.

Duluth.—Fred Rotell, missing eight years, has been declared legally dead by a jury in district court, and his mother, Mrs. Ozella Rotell, is entitled to $1,000 on a life insurance policy issued to Rotell by the Independent Order of Foresters in 1905, as she was named as beneficiary. The verdict was for the face of the policy and interest, totaling $1,033.50. The evidence disclosed that Rotell left his mother's home in Ontonagon, Mich., in September, 1906, telling her that he was going to Livingston, Mont., to work. In spite of the fact that she has made a country-wide search for him, Mrs. Rotell has never since heard from or of him.

Mill Men Accept Wage Cut.

Duluth.—Duluth employment agents say that present indications point to many men going into the woods this winter if the laborers are willing to accept a stiff cut in wages rather than lie about town and take chances on eking out an existence. One company, it is reported here, will use 1,500 men in its camps, and other companies will operate on a smaller scale. Wages for common labor in the woods will range from $16 to $18 a month; two years ago men received $35 to $40 a month. Most of the work will be tie-cutting and piece work.

Alleged Liquor Agent Held.

Marshall.—J. H. Hall, county attorney, has returned from St. Paul, where he had L. A. Leavitt, a traveling salesman for the Minnesota Distributing company, arrested for soliciting orders for liquor in the country around Marshall. Messrs. Pieplar and Piel of the company were also brought to Marshall and arraigned before a justice. All three waived examination and each gave bonds in the sum of $500 to appear at the next term of court. This is the first arrest here under the law forbidding taking orders for liquors.

Fiance Foiled by War.

Winona.—Theodore Tsatsos, local confectioner, has again been thwarted in his efforts to reach his boyhood home in Europe where his fiancee awaits him. Tsatsos prepared to go to Greece late last summer, but sailing conditions due to war prevented his passage. Recently he was informed that he now could sail, and he hastily left for New York. There he was advised by the consul, he says, that it would be inadvisable to sail, because actual war preparations have be[illegible] in Greece.

SEEMS UNLIKELY MRS. CARMAN WILL FACE TRIAL AGAIN

JURY IN MINEOLA CASE DISAGREES AFTER THIRTEEN HOURS' DELIBERATION AND IS DISCHARGED.

FINAL BALLOT STANDS TEN TO TWO FOR ACQUITTAL

Doctor's Wife Accused of Slaying Mrs. Bailey Faints at News—Says She Expected to Be Freed of Charge—Bail Likely to Follow.

Mineola, N. Y., Oct. 27.—The jury in the trial of Mrs. Florence Conklin Carman, accused of slaying Mrs. Louise Bailey last June 30, disagreed and was discharged.

Out Thirteen Hours.

Ten jurors are said to have voted for acquittal and two for conviction of murder in the first degree on the final ballot. The jury was out about 13 hours.

It is unlikely that Mrs. Carman ever will be brought to trial again. Before the jury came in District Attorney Lewis J. Smith said that if it stood even 8 to 4 for acquittal it was improbable that the defendant would be retried.

Attorneys for Mrs. Carman have made an application to have her admitted to bail.

On Verge of Breakdown.

The defendant is on the verge of a complete physical breakdown, following a collapse in the courtroom after the jury was discharged. It was said at the Nassau county jail that Mrs. Carman had been crying constantly ever since she was returned to her cell.

When the jury reappeared with the verdict, Mrs. Carman was followed through the oaken door at the rear of the judge's bench by her sister, Mrs. Ida Powell, and her niece, Mrs. Helen Corby. Dr. Erwin Carman, the defendant's husband, who had been sitting in the courtroom conversing with friends, joined his wife at the counsel table. Mrs. Carman appeared tired. Her hair was disleveled and her formerly immaculate costume was wrinkled.

Jury Seems Dissatisfied.

Dissatisfaction was plainly written on the faces of the jurors when they filed in from the room where they had been deliberating. When Justice Kelby ascended the bench, Robert Ludlum, foreman, because he was chosen first, spoke without any formality or introduction.

"We have been arguing for eight or nine hours," said he, almost sullenly, "and we have been conversing for the balance of the time. We cannot agree. We have had no sleep."

"I am in the same boat with you," replied Justice Kelby, "I have not slept either."

Verdict Not Reached.

"But we've been arguing," responded the foreman.

At the suggestion of John J. Graham, Mrs. Carman's chief counsel, Justice Kelby asked the jury whether it was the evidence they could not agree upon.

"It is not a question of evidence, Your Honor," replied John H. Molyneaux, juror number nine, "we have gone over the evidence very carefully and we cannot reach a verdict."

The justice said he was sorry no verdict could be reached, thanked the jury for its attention to the evidence, and then discharged it.

Mrs. Carman burst into tears.

"I am terribly disappointed," she wailed, "I felt sure the jury would acquit me.

No Notice of Husband.

Mrs. Powell and Mrs. Corby then took charge of Mrs. Carman. They assisted her, half stumbling, half walking, her hands to her eyes, out of the courtroom and into the chambers at the rear. Her husband followed closely behind. It was noticeable that his wife seemed to be entirely unaware of his presence.

After the party passed through the door Mrs. Carman fainted. She was quickly revived and then continued her journey to her cell in the jail. Dr. Guy Cleghorn, the jail physician, was summoned. He said her condition was worse than at any time since she had been arrested.

U. S. Makes Formal Demands.

Washington, Oct. 24.—The United States has decided formally to protest to Great Britain against the seizure of the Standard Oil ship Platuria, demanding her release from British detention at Sternoway, a port in the Lewis islands, Scotland.

War Tax Is Now Due.

Washington, Oct. 26.—No time was lost by the government in preparing to collect the taxes imposed under the war revenue law. Commissioner of Internal Revenue Osborne last night sent the following telegram to all collectors: "Beginning with Saturday tax accrues on all wine sold; 2 cents a quart on still wines; 20 cents a quart on champagne, other sparkling and artificially carbonated wine; 6 cents a quart on liquors, cordials and similar compounds, and proportionate rates for other quantities."

Male Children a Poor Second With Those Who Would Become Foster Parents.

"The French are receiving in their homes refugees from Belgium and northern France. The Germans are doing the same as regards the refugees from oriental Prussia."

The speaker was a returned tourist. He went on:

"Many French and German households have neither room enough nor means enough to take in a whole family. They must confine themselves to one child. Well, they invariably bid then for a little girl. They never want a boy.

"I have seen in my travels several hundred of these offers to take in children—and every blessed offer was for girls. What is the cause of this? The cause must evidently be that girls are better behaved, more amiable and nicer all around than boys.

"The war, besides teaching me geography, has taught me that female children stand miles higher in popular esteem than male children. What's the trouble with us males? We'd better look to ourselves."

No Excuse.

Representative Bacon of Georgia was condemning in a Macon club the German general staff for its antiquated close formation in attack, a formation which costs the German army thousands of lives.

"Close formation," he said, "was excellent in Napoleon's day, but with our modern machine guns, shooting myriads of bullets a minute, it is a useless, it is a cruel waste of life."

"But," said a German-American, "we've got so many men, you know, congressman—we've got so many, we can afford to—er—er—to lose—"

"My friend," Mr. Bacon interrupted, "would you excuse your cook for serving you watery soup because there had been a rainy season?"

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

The pen is mighter than the sword—We mean A. H. Fasel's pen, when he is taxing up ditch fees, to the mosskeg farmers.

We want to give the imported, portable publisher of the Eleven Towns to distinctly understand that T. P. Anderson is not running this paper, but if he will look at the head of this column he will find the name of the writer of all editorial matter in THE SUNBEAM.

As the campaign is now about over there seems to be no question of doubt about the election of C. L. Hanson of Thief River Falls, for State Senator from this district by a handsome majority. Mr. Hansen has stood the test of the vigorous campaign made for this honorable position, and has passed through it unharmed, by any attacks made by his opponents. Mr. Hansen is a man well qualified for the position, and we predict that he will well and truly represent the interest of this district. When the legislature adjourns next spring you will find Mr. Hansen's record will not be one of bribery and political trickery, but one of honor and integrity, and that he has accomplished his political ambition, to obtain legislation beneficial to this district. Be sure to cast your vote X for C. L. Hansen next Tuesday.

As we do not want to be accused of springing roarbacks on the eve of election, to which there was no time to reply, we will just refer to some of the statements made by A. H. Fasel in his address at Goodridge, and his article published in the Eleven Towns:

He says: "The fees of the County Auditor up to the time of the establishment of the ditch, and as charged by me are $25.00."

Read the following figures taken from the financial statement, and see whether Mr. Fasel is telling the truth or not.

Here are the figures:

Miscellaneous ditches		$189.05
Ditch No.	Jud. 1	5.00
	Jud. 2	5.00
	Jud. 3	5.00
	Jud. 1	18.27
	Jud. 14	85.05
	Jud. 25	127.95
County ditch No.	55	60.20
"	53	50.23
"	47	66.10
"	51	63.60
	Jud. 1	119.55
	Jud. 23	7.90
Total Ditch fees		$702.90

Now then if Mr. Fasel is telling the truth in his statements, his ditch fees would be $200.00 instead of $702.90 as shown by the financial statement. We have shown you by actual figures taken from the county records that A. H. Fasel has taken the sum of $502.90 from the pockets of the ditch tax paying farmers, and transferred it to his own pockets, after allowing him $25.00 for every ditch which he claims was his charges.

We are not a grafter as our wile County Auditor, and slop over editor of the Eleven Towns, would have you believe, but a mosskeg farmer, and a heavy ditch tax payer on ditchs No. 47 and 53, and we protest against paying A. H. Fasel a fee of $66.10 on ditch 47, and a fee of $50.23 on ditch 53, in addition to the salary that he gets for County Auditor of this county.

We want to say in conclusion, that the facts as published by us are facts, taken from the county records, and A. H. Fasel cannot deny them.

COUNTY HOSPITAL.

It should be fairly understood by the voters, that the three County Commissioners who voted for the proposition to bond the county for a hospital, were Daniel Shaw, Ed Aubel and Olof Larson.

The fight for Representative in this district is between an attorney and a farmer banker. We consider that Mr. Duffy is well qualified for the position, and his interests are identical with those of the farmers, as he has a large amount of farm lands, both in Red Lake and this county, and when he is looking out for his own farm interest he is bound to look out for ours.

We believe that the man who has charge of the cash of the Pennington county tax payers, should be a man that has reached the middle age of life, and one who is personally responsible for at least part of the cash that he has to handle. Such a man, we have in Bernhard Knudsen, the present aspirant for that office, and we believe that the tax payers will look at the election of a man for this important trust from a business stand point next Tuesday.

Although the County Commissioners names are near the bottom of the ticket, the people of the eastern part of the county should not forget to vote X for the return of A. B. Mandt and P. C. Wold, for these important offices. We believe that both of these gentlemen have well and faithfully looked after the best interests of the tax payers, and if they had been guilty of any trickery in office, we would have found it out, and promptly told you about it, regardless of their nationality or the color of their hair.

DUFFY SETS HIMSELF RIGHT.

Red Lake Falls, Minn.
October 28, 1914.

Mr. W. G. Hunt,
Sunbeam, Minn.

Dear Sir:—

Should I be elected, I would be utterly opposed to making any appropriations at this coming term for the Normal School at Bemidji. The sentiment in my canvasing does not seem to warrant it. I do not understand that the normals at Duluth, St. Cloud and Moorhead are filled to their capacity at the present time, and a further fact that Normal courses at the present time, are being put in the schools in which the Normal Courses can be taken, leaving the children at home with their parents, and it would be more satisfactory to have a larger appropriation made to such schools.

Yours very truly,
John A. Duffy.

YOUR FALL COLD NEEDS ATTENTION.

No use to fuss and try to wear it out. It will wear you out instead. Take Dr. King's new Discovery, relief follows quickly. It checks your Cold and Soothes your cough away. Pleasant, Antiseptic and Healing. Children like it. Get a 50c. bottle of Dr. King's new Discovery and keep it in the house. THE LOCAL NEWS

Be sure to vote for the constitutional amendments.

Do not forget to put your vote X opposite the word NO on that bonding proposition.

Wilson Rodman is thrashing in the Grunde Austad neighborhood this week.

Do not forget to vote against bonding this county to build a county hospital.

Some linotype copy arrived from Thief River Falls last night which we have not space to publish.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof and we will make out your papers free of charge.

Be sure to turn out to election next Tuesday, as the amount of your population is judged by the number of the votes you cast. Let the outside world know you are alive.

Casper Dale, candidate for Judge of Probate has been canvassing the eastern part of the county this week, looking over the political situation, and gathering in a few votes for next Tuesday.

If you are interested in the election of E. A. Mostue, and you should be, take your wife to election and allow her to vote, for about all of the ladies of Thief River Falls will vote for Miss Goodwin.

Remember that T. P. Anderson is all right. If he was not you would have heard about it, for this has been a warm campaign, and about the only crime that we have heard of him being accused of, was being a Scandinavian.

DO NOT FORGET, that when you paid your realestate ditch tax that you had to load on about one extra sack of wheat to pay Fasels auditors fees. Look up the record published in another column and see if we are not telling you the troth.

C. L. Hanson, candidate for State Senator, and John A. Duffy, candidate for Representative, addressed the voters at the Erie hall on Wednesday evening. Both were well received, and undoubtedly gained many votes by their visit to that locality.

All of the constitutional amendments are good ones, except the 9th. which has the appearance to us of being a scheme to give a lot of city dudes an opportunity to feed at the public crib, and lay in the shade, as the employees of the state plant trees. Vote no on it.

Mr Dale made the statement the other night that all of the County commissioners is working for the re-election of A.H. Fasel. We do not think that P. C. Wold, or A. B. Mandt are. But if our present board of County Commissioners are afraid to have T. P. Anderson open up those Auditor books on January 1st, it is getting to be about time that the tax payers of this county woke up, and began to dig the sand out of their eyes.

O'NEILL VS LATTA

The attack on Chas. Latta by Hon. D.P.O'Neill is as unfair as some of the attacks he has made on us, The facts of the matter is that Mr. Latta has a farm up in the mud lake country and has suffered the same as we have from unjust drainge laws. When O'Neil let that Marschalk bill be fixed up, so as to shut out the farmers and let in the County Auditor, he swore revenge on O'Neill, and that's what the fight is about between Latta and O'Neil.

Woolwich Arsenal.

Woolwich arsenal owed its establishment to an explosion which took place at a foundry in Moorfields. Until 1716 the government obtained its ordnance from private manufacturers, but in that year the explosion decided it to build a foundry of its own, and Woolwich, already famous as a naval station, was chosen as the site. Woolwich was only a small fishing village until the sixteenth century, when Henry VIII. laid the foundations of its prosperity by making it the royal dockyard.—London Chronicle.

O'NEILL'S MEETING.

At the special request of Mr. O'Neill we attended the meeting given by him at our school house on Wednesday evening, and of course it turned out just as we predicted an O'Neill meeting would namely viz: The audience cried out: "This is no dog fight." However we succeeded in placing enough facts before the people to convince them that our fight commenced against O'Neill two years ago, when he was a member of the legislature. We did not mention Normal School to him as it got warm enough on the drainage proposition. Dan plastered the soft soap onto his audience for over two hours, and if there is enough of the people who believe it to re-elect him, he will tell the Bemidji Normal School lobby next winter "how he got the farmers' votes."

His explanation on the iron ore tax did not satisfy us, in view of the fact that it don't look reasonable to us that those iron mine owners would keep a lobby at St. Paul for weeks entertaining members of the legislature to make themselves more taxes. No sir, Dan. It was your duty to vote for that tonage tax and make them millionaire mine owners pay a tax on every ton of ore that they took from the Minnesota soil, the same as we farmers have to pay a tax on every load of wheat we raise.

Now as to the normal school. First read the pledge of John A. Duffy published in another column. Stenvick has also made the same pledge, and you might as well expect us to vote to appropriate money to build that normal school at Bemidji as for C. L. Hansen to do it. Now where does O'Neill stand? On June 22nd we had a talk with some of the ardent supporters of O'Neil, in the office of McDaniels and Hamery at Thief River Falls. We made the statement that if O'Neill was elected he would fight hard to get that normal school appropriation for Bemidji. One of his friends said that he would pledge himself to oppose this appropriation. We told Mr. O'Neill's friend to have D. P. pledge himself to this in print, send it up to us and we would publish it. That was on June 22nd and we have not heard from Daniel or his friends since. now gentlemen do you, as Pennington County tax payers want to vote for a man for State Senator who will lead the fight in that State Senate to take the money out of your pockets to build this Normal School, so as to boom the price of town lots for Minneapolis town site boomers? We guess not! We are yet going to have that Normal School located at Thief River Falls, where it belongs. This is no election roarback, as O'Neill has had from June 22rd to answer this question. We think that Hamery and Rev. Roseland were present at the time the conversation quoted above, took place. but we are not sure. but they were in the office on that date.

T. P. Anderson, whose picture appears above is the candidate for County Auditor against A. H. Fasel. Mr. Anderson, as his name would indicate is a Scandinavian by birth, who is educated in that language, and well educated in the English language. He was one of the promoters of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank at Oklee, Minn., and is now the manager of Thief River Co-Operative Store at Thief River Falls. Mr. Anderson's qualifications for the position of Auditor of this county are beyond any question of doubt, and he is a man well fitted in every way to take charge of that office. As there are a large number of Scandinavians in the county, it will be very convient for them to have a man in that office that can speak their language. As A. H. Fasel has been four years in that office, and has got the ditch tax payers skinned of their first hide, we had better let T. P. Anderson have the job for four years, and see if he won't give us a little better deal than Fasel has. Vote X for T. P. Anderson next Tuesday.

SYNOPSIS.

Mark Truitt, encouraged by his sweetheart, Unity Martin, leaves Bethel, his native town, to seek his fortune. Simon Truitt tells Mark that it long has been his dream to see a steel plant at Bethel and asks the son to return and build one if he ever gets rich. Mark applies to Thomas Henley, head of the Quinby Iron works, for a job and is sent to the construction gang. His success in that work wins him a place as helper to Roman Andzrejzski, open-hearth furnaceman. He becomes a boarder in Roman's home and assists Piotr, Roman's son, in his studies. Kazia, an adopted daughter, shows her gratitude in such a manner as to arouse Mark's interest in her.

"Yes, you would, Kazia. But I guess it's more than just the money. You see, in Bethel there's no chance, nothing to do; except grow old and nose into your neighbor's business and—and want the things you can't have."

"Yes," she said slowly, "I know."

"You know? Do you want things, too?"

"Want things!" She drew a long wondering breath, as she measured desire. She did not wait for his question. "To be different."

They sat a little above the carriage road, along which rolled the Sunday afternoon procession of pleasure-takers. He pointed to an open landau in which two women sat, primly upright, hands folded in laps and faces set straight ahead, the very picture of well-dressed, self-conscious respectability—as "different" from Kazia as anything he could conceive.

They Sat a Little Above the Carriage Road.

"Like that?"

"Yes, like that. Sometimes." She looked wistfully after the departing respectabilities. "But mostly, just to belong to somebody."

"But Roman and the Matka and Piotr—"

"They're ashamed of me and afraid other people'll find out about me. When I went to school the other boys and girls said things—and did things. I didn't care." Her head went up and her voice told how passionately she had cared. "But Piotr told them at home and they wouldn't let me go any more. They'd be glad if I were gone. And some day—I will go."

"But where, Kazia?"

"I don't know," she said wearily. "If I knew, I'd go now. Some place where they won't know about me. Here nobody, when they find out, treats me like other people. Except," she added, "Jim Whiting."

"And me," he said gently.

"And you." She turned to look searchingly into his eyes. "Don't it really make any difference to you?"

"I settled that question once for all last Sunday."

Her look of gratitude disturbed him strangely. He stirred uncomfortably.

She saw, but did not understand. She pointed to the sinking sun.

"See! It's getting late. I must go home and get your supper."

He took her hand and helped her to rise. But he did not release the hand.

"Have you liked it today? And will you come again?" He smiled down upon her.

In her eyes was still the look of gratitude, of trust. "If you want to," she answered simply.

And in the weeks that followed they did repeat that holiday more than once.

Mark did not try to analyze his pleasure in those weeks. His heart said: "I am young and life should be bright. But this existence—toil, eat, sleep and toil again—is eating my youth away. I have a right to this little pleasure." The only real shadow was that cast by Jim Whiting.

The weekly bulletins to Unity contained important omissions.

One night he was in his room, sleepless. There had been no little chat with Kazia after supper. She had had just time to make her simple toilet before Jim Whiting came to carry her away. Mark lay there, tossing restlessly, visioning the two in some secluded spot where Whiting could make love to her undisturbed. The thought was not a sedative. He wished they would come home; he did not like to think of her out in the languorous night with Whiting.

In time they did return. The murmur of their voices on the little front porch came to him through his open window. Whiting seemed in no haste to leave. Mark wondered impatiently what they found to talk so long about.

At length, sleep as far away as ever, he arose, dressed and went quietly down stairs—with what intent he hardly knew. On the bottom stair he stopped, facing the door. Whiting was on the point of leaving. Mark saw him coolly put an arm around Kazia; she suffered it. Hot anger—and something far sharper—boiled within the eavesdropper. Nor was it perceptibly cooled when he saw her deftly avoid the kiss Whiting would have taken; she laughed as she broke away. Whiting went down the steps, whistling gaily.

Mark was still standing on the stair when she went in. She started.

"Oh! Is that you?"

"I think it is."

"That's a funny thing to say," she laughed. "Your voice sounds funny, too."

He had just been condemning Whiting for the indecent length of his stay. Now he said: "Let's go out on the porch a while."

They went out into the moonlight. He sat upon the railing and stared grimly in the direction of Whiting's departure. It was past midnight; the street slept. From the valley below them came the rumble of the mills that were teaching him fear and self-control. He was silent for a few minutes, while he tried to master the ugly thing within him.

"What is it?" she asked wonderingly.

"Kazia," he blurted out, "you shouldn't let him do that."

"Oh! You saw?"

"I didn't mean to."

"Why do you say I shouldn't?"

"He—he's not fit to touch you."

"He's very jolly and nice to me," she said quietly. "And—and he wants to take me away."

"But you're not going, are you?" he cried.

She sighed. "I don't know—yet."

"Kazia!" He did not know how his voice was shaking. "Promise me you won't go away with him."

"Why not?" She turned to him. "Why not?"

"Because," he began unsteadily, "because I want the best for you. Because—because this!" With a sudden rough reckless movement he caught her close to him. She suffered him as she had Jim Whiting. "Don't you know I want only the best for you?"

"I think I do." She put a hand to his cheek and turned his face out of the shadow, looking long and searchingly into his eyes.

Then she gave a little sigh. "I promise—now." Her lips waited for his kiss.

Gradually his senses cleared. He began to see the ugly treachery of what he had done. His strong clasp slackened.

She seemed to feel, with the sixth sense that was hers, the change in him.

"What is it?" She looked up in quick alarm.

"Nothing." To avoid her eyes he caught her close again, burying his face in her hair, and yielded to the intoxication of her. "Oh! Kazia, Kazia!" . . .

CHAPTER VIII.

Afire.

July came, such a month as the city could not remember, humid and sickeningly hot. Children played languidly, always in the shade, and flocked around ice wagons, quarreling over the division of the fast melting, cool fragments.

In the mills the men toiled on, "speeding up" as always to feed a world hunger for steel. They drank vast quantities of water; they salted it that they might drink the more, believing that in much sweating alone lay safety. There were giants in those days. But sometimes they fell. A sudden drying up of sweat, a violent nausea, a sharp blinding pressure upon the brain—in a few minutes or fewer hours they were dead; their names did not always appear in the daily lists. Some that did not die found their strength forever broken.

The fierce heat blistered Mark's naked sweating skin. The water he drank carried out through his pores the food that should have nourished him. The heavy labor put upon him a weariness sleep could not dispel. The incessant roar, tearing at quivering nerves, impeding thought, became in his overwrought state exquisite torture. Hate, for the mills, for those above who drove so pitilessly, even for the men beside him, filled him; and fear. Once, when Henley, passing, gave his careless nod, he was answered only with a venomous glare that summoned the master's sardonic grin. Mark could have killed him then.

He envied Roman, often almost bitterly. The big Pole felt and allowed the effects of the intense heat, but he was the same unflurried philosophical workman as ever, always with a cheerful word; no fear of collapse disturbed him.

Through watching him Mark was beset by a new temptation. When their turns were ended Roman and the men invariably flocked to the nearest saloon and there drank repeatedly—whisky and brandy mostly—until vigor returned to their wornout bodies. It was a false vigor, Mark knew, and short-lived. But there were times when the thought of the hour of surcease from fatigue, of spirited outlook lured him almost irresistibly.

And one evening he followed Roman and his companions to the bar.

"Whisky," he ordered.

Roman put out a restraining hand. "You better not drink," he counseled gravely. "Or only beer."

Mark laughed recklessly and repeated his order. Thrice he drank. The weight dragging at his limbs lifted; the misery rankling in his heart dissolved. He was cheerful, talkative, soon maudlin. Before he reached home the whisky had possessed his unaccustomed brain; he was staggering drunk. Roman undressed him and put him to bed without supper. But he had had his period of forgetfulness.

The next day he paid—and the craving gnawed more sharply. That evening Roman, understanding, avoided the saloon and led Mark by a straight course homeward. Thereafter it was his custom, until Mark saw the care and forbade.

"You needn't be afraid. It costs too much. Everything," he added with a bitterness for which Roman had not the key, "costs too much."

"Zo? But you are tiredt. Unt you are not strong. Vy do you not leaf the vork?"

"Give up now, after holding on this far! I guess you don't mean that. But some day I'll get where I want—I'll have life by the throat." It did not seem melodramatic to him. "Then I'll make it pay for this—on its knees."

Roman shook his head gravely, as at a blasphemy.

"You shouldt not say zo. Alvays life iss the master. But you are tiredt."

And in the midst of the ordeal by fire he fought his first battle. At times he was almost grateful for the physical weariness that distracted him from the inner struggle.

He learned then how insensibly Unity had receded into the background. She had become vague, of little substance; she was a story he had read a long time ago. But she was real, too, in that she was a habit.

There was a memory that accused—a girl, for once warm and yielding, in the last glory of the sunset, clinging to him with the tremulous cry: "You won't forget me out there?" He had made a vow. . . . Within a twelvemonth he had clasped another.

That other was both real, intensely real—and near. He tried to avoid her; it was not easy.

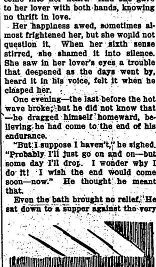
Kazia went about, quieter than ever, what she felt too deep for words, too solemn for laughter. She did not again break into song. But no one seeing her eyes could have doubted what had come into her heart. And she gave to her lover with both hands, knowing no thrift in love.

Her happiness awed, sometimes almost frightened her, but she would not question it. When her sixth sense stirred, she shamed it into silence. She saw in her lover's eyes a trouble that deepened as the days went by, heard it in his voice, felt it when he clasped her.

One evening—the last before the hot wave broke; but he did not know that—he dragged himself homeward, believing he had come to the end of his endurance.

"But I suppose I haven't," he sighed. "Probably I'll just go on and on—but some day I'll drop. I wonder why I do it! I wish the end would come soon—now." He thought he meant that.

Even the bath brought no relief. He sat down to a supper against the very thought of which his stomach revolted. After a few mouthfuls he left the table and went to his room. He threw himself, still dressed, on the bed, tossing restlessly in the vain search for an easy position. His body was one dull ache. The overheated blood pounded through his veins, each throb a knife that hacked his brain. His skin was hot and dry, his mouth parched; fever rose.



He Saw the Figure Crouching on the Floor at the Bedside.

The late darkness fell, dispelled a little by the faint glow from a nearby street lamp; it found him lying inert but awake. His mind was beginning to behave queerly, seeing strange shadowy objects that moved stealthily about. He caught himself muttering to them. He wondered if he were growing delirious, but he could not summon energy to call out or arise.

It must have been 10 o'clock when he thought he heard a light tap on the door. He made an effort to speak.

"Come."

The door opened. Some one tiptoed softly to the bedside and leaned over him.

"Are you sick?" came the broken anxious whisper. "You looked so tired—and you came up without—speaking to me. They said, let you sleep. But I've been—so afraid."

He caught her hand and clung to it.

"Would you mind staying a while?" he whispered back. "My head does funny tricks in the dark."

She put her free hand to his hot forehead. Then she gave a low pitying cry. "You are sick!—Wait!"

She left the room quietly. Soon she returned with towels and a basin of water in which ice tinkled. She lighted the gas jet and turned it very low.

"Close your eyes now," she said softly, "and try to sleep. I didn't tell any one, because I wanted to help you myself."

He lay passive, while she placed cold wet towels over his eyes, bathed his hands and wrists in the icy water and stroked his throbbing temples. He wondered dully that hands which worked so hard could be so gentle. For many minutes they did not speak. . . . The stealthy shapes were laid. The sharp pounding in his brain began to subside. Drowsiness was stealing over him.

His hands groped until they found hers. "Kazia, Kazia!" he breathed.

"Hush!" she said.

"It's such a pretty name," he murmured sleepily.

He felt her lips on his forehead. After that he slept.

When he awoke the room was dark. A cool moist wind swept strongly in upon him. He heard the rumble of far away retreating thunder. And with the heat the headache and overpowering fatigue had gone. He drew a long sighing breath. Something stirred in his hand.

Then in the faint reflection of the street lamp he saw the figure crouching on the floor at the bedside, her cheek pillowed in his outstretched hand. It took him a moment to realize what had brought her there.

"Are you awake?" she whispered.

"Yes."

"And better?"

"All right now, thanks to you—Why, you're all wet!"

"Yes." She rose stiffly to her knees. "It's been storming and it rained in on me a little. But it's cooler now."

"And you—What time is it?"

"A clock just struck four."

"And you've been here all the time?"

"I was afraid you'd wake up and need some one. And—I wanted to."

"Kazia, why do you do these things for me?"

"It is my place."

Her place! What place, then, had he given her? "Kazia—" he began.

But more than cowardice sealed his lips. She might have been consciously fighting for her love. She bent over and kissed him.

"Hush! You need to sleep."

CHAPTER IX.

Liquid Iron.

The hot spell was over.

For fifty-seven years Roman had toiled as few men can toil—on the tiny farm that had been his father's, to satisfy the greedy tax gatherer; in Essen, learning another craft under the master Krupp; in the new land whose promise had lured him. Not once had his superb strength and endurance failed him; therefore he had never known fear, had not believed that the fate that overtook others must some day be his. He had been very prodigal of that strength.

But one day—such a one as in that season the steel-workers called cool—he staggered and fell. It was three days before he could go back to his job. During that time Mark Truitt was in charge of the furnace.

He who returned was not the careful, precise, unflurried workman. He knew fear. He tired easily and was uncertain of temper. The heat fretted him and he worried over his work. He lost in efficiency; several times he tapped the furnace either too soon or too late and was sharply reprimanded. To keep up and to forget the new weakness he drank more whisky than ever. Within two weeks he collapsed again.

It was during Roman's third lay-off that Gracey, the foreman, said to Mark: "It looks like Roman's done for."

"It looks that way," Mark assented.

"It's come pretty sudden with him. It does that sometimes."

"Yes." Mark stared sadly through the furnace mouth at the boiling flame-swept slag. The drama had become a tragedy. There was an element in steel of which chemists took no account—the lives and souls of men.

"He can't expect to keep his job," he heard the foreman continue, "away half the time like this. And last week he spoiled two heats. I'm afraid we'll have to let him go."

"Yes!" Mark's mouth twisted in an ugly sneer. "He's given you the best he had. And now he's breaking down. So—scrap him, of course!"

"That's funny talk," grunted the foreman. "Especially since the superintendent and I've been talking it over and we think of you for the job. That makes it look different, don't it?" he laughed.

"No, it doesn't. Do you suppose I haven't been thinking of that—counting on it—ever since he broke first?" Mark turned hot eyes on the foreman. "Why, that's the worst of you. You drive us to the limit and when we break you kick us off like an old shoe. And that isn't enough. You've got to make beasts of us, every man dogging the fellow ahead, glad when he drops and lets go his job. Damn you all, anyhow!"

"Then I'm to tell the superintendent you don't want the job?"

Mark looked again into the boiling furnace, felt its consuming breath, listened to the mills' strident voice. Through every sense he caught their menace; his spirit cowered before it. But he who had come so near to falling could know the bitterness of him through whose fall advancement would come.

"No!" he snarled in savage contempt for himself and his hollow high indignation. "You can tell him I'm a beast like all the rest."

He was on the night turn then. In the morning he went reluctantly to Roman's house. At breakfast he was alone with Kazia. But there was no love-making that morning. Nor did he explain that he was to supersede her uncle at the furnace.

"How's Roman?" he asked with an added inward twinge.

"He's not much better," she sighed. "We're worried about him. He frets because he thinks he might lose his job."

He said nothing.

"Do you think he will?"

"Yes." He made shift to raise his eyes to hers. "I think he will."

"Just because he's sick. Oh, surely not!"

"Because he's used up. And when you're used up, you've got to get out to make room for better—for those that can still be useful."

"Oh, that would break his heart. How I hate those mills!" she cried. "But don't tell him you think that."

"No." His eyes fell. "I won't tell him. He'll find out soon enough."

Roman did not go back to work until his shift was on day turn again. Some presentiment of the impending calamity must have come to him, for as he and Mark set out for the mills that morning the irritability that had marked him since his first collapse gave way to a deep dejection.

It was not until they were entering the mill shed that Mark said: "Roman, I think Gracey wants to see you." He tried to make it very gentle.

"Zo?" Roman halted, looked intently at Mark. He drew a long whistling breath. "Zo!" He understood. But his presentiment had not told him how deep the hurt would be.

He tried to look the man he had been. But his tired lack-luster eyes belied the stiffly martial shoulders and firm step. He went straight to the foreman.

"Mine chop?" he asked steadily. "You vill take it avay?"

"I'm afraid we'll have to let you go, Roman."

"Unt vy?" There was no complaint.

"You're laying off too much," the foreman answered bluntly. "And you're getting careless in your work. You've lost your grip."

"I haf been zick. Meppy," Roman made an effort to speak the confidence he did not feel, "meppy I'll get better."

"I hope so. You've been a good man in your time. But I don't think so. You're getting too old for the work." Gracey was still young; he could speak carelessly of growing old.

"In my time! Oldt," Roman repeated slowly. "I haf not beliefedt zo."

He did not wince. But the shoulders he had been holding so bravely erect sagged.

"Oldt! It iss zo."

He started to move away, but the foreman called him back.

"See here, Roman," he said with rough kindness. "You've always drawn good pay. And you've quite a bit laid by, I hear. Why don't you go back to your own country and take it easy the rest of your life?"

Roman eyed him listlessly. "Here iss mine country. But I do not vant to take it easy. Alvays haf I vorkedt—the vork of strong men."

He left the foreman and walked slowly, heavily before the furnaces until he came to his old station. There he stopped, watching the crew at work; in particular watching the figure—so slight for that labor—of the young man who had endured where stronger men fell. How neatly he fitted into his new niche!

"Unt he iss not oldt. Oldt!" Roman shivered.

Mark Truitt ate—or pretended to eat—his supper in the saloon that night. He could not bring himself to face the ordeal of sitting at table with Roman's family.

There was no sense of triumph in his promotion, honestly earned though it was as his world measured such things.

He walked to Roman's house, with a firm tread that was the outward expression of his mood. He knew just what was coming. He dreaded it, the moment when he must again face the man by whose fall he profited, must again break the sweet ties this life formed only to sever. Yet he did not flinch. He might rail against the issues presented to him, but at least he had always the courage of his choice.

There was none of the trappings of tragedy in the moment he had dreaded. The family was gathered as usual in the dining room. Roman had himself in hand once more.

Mark stopped in the doorway. For the life of him he could not speak the commonplace salutation on his lips. He saw Kazia steal quietly from the room. But he knew that she stayed within hearing.

It was Roman who broke the silence.

"You haf eaten?"

"At the saloon."

"Zo? You shouldt haf come. Ve vaited."

Piotr snarled: "You've got a nerve to come back here at all."

"Piotr," Roman reproved him quietly, "it iss not for you."

"Of course," Mark addressed Roman, "you want me to go. I suppose you blame me. I blame myself somehow—I don't know why. It—it isn't fair! It isn't my fault you've been fired. You ought to see that. And I'd be a fool not to take your job, now that you can't have it any more."

"Huh!" sneered Piotr. "You're glad enough of the chance, too."

"Piotr!" The boy subsided. Roman went on: "It iss not your fault I am oldt, no. But—it iss better you go. You haf mine chop. It iss not goot for me to see unt hear of the vork of strong men ven I am not strong."

"I will go tonight."

"I haf not zaidt tonight. Ven you haf another goot place to go."

"I will go tonight."

"Well—good-by, then," said Piotr promptly.

Mark waited a moment longer. But there was really nothing more to be said. He went upstairs.

His carpetbag packed—a brief task—he waited. And this was hard—hard! Now there was at least the semblance of a struggle.

"Huh!" Sneered Piotr, "You're Glad Enough of the Chance."

It almost shook him because with that went—Kazia. Instinct, brushing aside the mist of false teachings, interpreted anew and aright the passion he had thought ignoble, warned him to take this whole love while yet there was time.

"Almost thou persuadest me. . . ."

But not altogether. His desire—to survive, to win his place among the masters—still held the whip, kept him facing doggedly his straight road ahead. And, as if jealous of any rival for supremacy over him, it claimed the pale lesser love. He could not see the unlettered Hunky girl sharing that conquest.

When she came, she stood for a moment at the door, a question and a great fear in her eyes.

"I—I was waiting for you," he said.

"I knew. But I couldn't come any sooner."

Her glance fell to the bag, rose again. She walked slowly toward him. He rose. Scarcely an arm's length away, she halted. Suddenly tears stood in her eyes. She put out both hands in a quick pleading gesture.

"Don't go!"

"They don't want me to stay, Kazia."

"That's because you've taken his job. Don't take it!"

He shook his head. "You don't understand. There's no reason why I shouldn't take it."

"He's your friend."

"You don't understand," he repeated wearily. "If I could give him back his job by not taking it, I'd not take it." He believed that then! He began again the old reasoning. "But I couldn't. Some one else would get it—that's all. Isn't it better for me to have it than a stranger? Roman," he concluded bitterly, "ought to see it that way."

"I know there isn't any good reason. But—I couldn't go with you, if you took it."

She couldn't go with him! His eyes fell miserably.

"Oh, no!" With one swift step she bridged the space between them, throwing her arms around his neck. "Oh, no! I didn't mean that. I'd go with you, whatever you did. I'd have to. I couldn't stay here, when you're gone—go back to the way it was before you came. I couldn't stand that." A little shudder passed over her.

"You can't understand," he cried again. "I've tried—"

"I know. I've seen it troubling you, though I didn't know what it was. But—can't you see? I'm the reason! You'll never find any one that can love you like I can. It's all I know—to love—to love you. I don't ask much. But I can give—everything."

With a force that must have hurt her he freed himself from her clasp and sank shaking into the chair, covering his face with his hands. For a breath the scales quivered. Then:

"Kazia," he whispered, "I haven't been square with you. There's—there's another girl—"

"There is—And you—"

After what seemed like a long silence he dared to glance up to see how she had taken it. By then she had crept to the threshold and was looking back at him. About her lips a dazed, foolish little smile was playing. And her eyes were the eyes of one who had just seen a great horror.

When he looked up again, she was gone.

An hour later—how he could not have told—he found himself wandering in the streets, carrying his ancient carpetbag.

I Want Some of

THE BLACK SHELLS

The primer of THE BLACK SHELLS is known as the non-mercuric primer, to distinguish it from the mechanical mixture of fulminate of mercury (which is heavy) and powdered glass (which is not heavy).

THE BLACK SHELLS primer is a strictly chemical combination and so is sure, quick and uniform—always uniform.

Our flash passage is double the usual size, allowing all of the fiercely hot primer flame to rush into the main charge. This develops the very utmost force from the powder and gives a long-distance killing power that will amaze you.

At the traps, and in the stubble-field, the man who begins to shoot THE BLACK SHELLS finds that he has become a better shot.

These shells are waterproof—really waterproof. They won't swell in foggy weather. They eject with a snap on the meanest days. THE BLACK SHELLS have a solid brass head which gives the gases of explosion no "battery-cup" crevices through which to leap backward.

THE BLACK SHELLS are loaded with the celebrated Tatham shot.

Send for our free book and learn why so many men are saying, "I want some of THE BLACK SHELLS." Ask for it on a post card.

MODERN WAR IS MERCIFUL

Under Existing Conditions the Wounded Are Given a Fair Chance to Recover Health.

A general impression is that with powerful weapons of great precision greater loss of life and greater pain are caused. That view is almost certainly inaccurate. The modern bullet, says the Scotsman, unless it is of the soft-nosed type, is on the whole merciful, and either kills outright or gives its victim a fair chance of recovery. It does not, as a rule, mutilate.

The ambulance corps was practically unknown 6 years ago, and not only is aid brought more rapidly to the wounded, but it is far more effective than in the pre-Lister days. Rapidity of conveyance has increased beyond all comparison. In the present war it is true to say that in many cases men have been lying in a British hospital within 24 hours of receiving their wounds. If the risk of being hit is greater, the chances of recovery from injury have been immensely increased.

ONLY HER OLD DOLL IS LEFT

This is one of the little children of Belgium orphaned by the war. Her father dead, her home in Louvain burned and her mother and sisters scattered, all that remains to her is her hairless, battered doll. It is for the half million children of Europe in much the same plight that plans are being carried forward in America to send Christmas ships loaded with gifts.

GERMANS ARE WELL POSTED

Absolute Thoroughness Shown by Their Distribution of War Fines and Requisitions.

Paris.—The discrimination with which the Germans distributed war fines and requisitions in the towns they occupied in Belgium and northern France and the precision with which they chose the most solvent citizens as hostages has been a surprise, but when the details became known the facts carried their explanation with them.

For instance, the first detachment of uhlans that entered the city of Lille was guided by a man who had left his job as superintendent of an important factory in the city to rejoin his regiment.

At Soissons, when objections were raised to the exacting proportions of the requisitions, the commanding officer called his aide, who turned out to be a well-known business man of the town, who, of course, knew its resources thoroughly. "You see," said the officer, pointing to the aide, "there's no use resisting. We are posted by someone who knows."

Similar instances were reported from Belgium, showing that every inch of the ground had been carefully studied; the ready money in every town estimated; every suitable horse and every ton of hay located, and the plans of every bridge drawn up. In France their statistics went so far as to show how many bottles of wine might be expected in each locality.

NOT SUCH DEADLY ENEMIES

"Bloody Chasm" That Separated Nationalists and Ulsterites Might Have Been Bridged.

As all the world knows, international war has proved a great conciliator in Ireland. As a contributor to the Bystander says, you cannot give much attention to the dismemberment of the empire when you are not certain whether you will have an empire to dismember.

There is a geniality about the Nationalist volunteer that makes you know that he would rather fight some one else—Germany in this case—than Ulster. A few stories are current that help to show how very ripe Ireland was for conciliation. Not long ago a company of Nationalist volunteers, passing a company of Ulstermen, and being uncertain as to the customary etiquette between deadly enemies—saluted. In a northern district there was only one field suitable for drilling, and as the two opposition armies wanted it, the owner began bidding them against each other. Northern canniness asserted itself. The commanding officer of one battalion approached the enemy, and they agreed to rent the field in common, and use it on alternate days!

A third anecdote relates that while some Ulster volunteers were drilling a Nationalist was seen sitting on a fence watching them. When he was questioned by an Ulsterman he explained that his own company had mislaid their rifles and could not drill; "but," he added, "we were waiting to see if we could get the loan of yours when you've done with them."

Not Due to Ignorance.

Doctor Briggs received a note from a farmer living back quite a way in the country, requesting him to come as quickly as possible to see his child who was very sick with "a very bad cold."

The doctor examined the child and then turned to the mother.

"Don't you know," he asked, "that your little girl is coming down with the measles?"

"Yes, doctor," was the woman's reply; "I knew she was."

"Then why in the world," asked the doctor, "did you write me that she had a very bad cold?"

The woman hesitated, for a moment, then, looking at her husband, said, with sullen frankness:

"Neither him nor me knew how to spell 'measles.'"—National Monthly.

Old Jake woke up and rubbed his eyes as he gazed on the unfamiliar room. Then he remembered, and hopped out of bed. Fifteen years had he saved out of the meager wages given him by a grateful farmer, in order to visit London.

Uncle and nephew soon entered the little back garden, when the old boy stopped short with amazement, and adjusted his glasses to gaze at the small figure on the grass plot, who was performing gymnastic feats.

"Does thy sister have fits, lad?" he asked, with concern.

"No, uncle," replied the nipper with a grin, "them's gymnastic feats."

THE ELEVEN
Proposed Amendments to the Constitution
of the STATE OF MINNESOTA

Submitted by the Legislature at Its General Session, 1913, Together With a Statement of the
PURPOSES AND EFFECTS,

Prepared by Hon. Lyndon A. Smith,
Attorney General
of Minnesota.

Addressed to
Julius A. Schmahl
Secretary of State.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, ST. PAUL.

April 25, 1914.

Honorable Julius A. Schmahl,
Secretary of State,
Capitol.

SIR: As required by Section 16, General Statutes of the State of Minnesota for the year 1913, I have the honor to furnish you herewith a statement of the purposes and effects of the respective amendments proposed to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota by the Legislature of 1913, and which are to be submitted to the electors of said State at the general election in 1914.

FIRST PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The first proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 584 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is sought to enable the electors to submit by petition to the Legislature constitutional amendments and likewise to propose legislation, and in the event the Legislature fails to submit any such constitutional amendment or fails to enact any such proposed law, then such amendment or proposed law may be submitted directly to the voters; also, to permit the electors to cause any law or laws enacted by the Legislature to be submitted to the electors and if a majority of the votes cast thereon be opposed to such law, the same shall be repealed.

This is an amendment to Section 1 of Article 4 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Section 1. The legislature shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such time as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety (90) legislative days; and no new bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the governor, during the last twenty (20) days of such sessions, except the attention of the legislature shall be called to some important matter of general interest by a special message from the governor."

and substitutes therefor the following:

"Sec. 1. TWO HOUSES—SESSIONS.—The Legislature shall consist of the senate and house of representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the state, at such time as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety (90) legislative days, and no bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the governor, during the last twenty days of such session, except the attention of the legislature shall be called to some important matter of general interest by a special message from the governor; but the people reserve to themselves direct power, as follows:

"a. CONSTITUTIONAL INITIATIVE.—When at any time prior to the commencement of any session of the legislature, there shall have been filed with the secretary of state a petition proposing an amendment to the constitution signed by two per centum of the electors of the state, the secretary of state shall transmit the same to the legislature not later than ten days after the commencement of the session. If the amendment so proposed be not submitted to the electors by the legislature at such session, or if it be submitted in an amended form, then upon a further petition or petitions, each signed by eight per centum of the electors of the state, filed with the secretary of state within six months after the adjournment of the legislature, the amendment proposed in the first petition, or one or more amended forms thereof, shall be submitted to the electors for their approval or rejection at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of any such further petitions. Any amendment proposed by initiative petition and, in its original or in an amended form, submitted to the electors by the legislature or by a further petition, shall become a part of the constitution, if approved by a majority of the electors voting at said election, or by four-sevenths of the electors voting on the proposed amendment; provided not less than three-sevenths of the electors voting at said election voted for the proposed amendment. This section shall be construed as a means in addition to Section one, Article fourteen of the State Constitution for amending the same.

"b. STATUTORY INITIATIVE—When at any time prior to the commencement of any session of the legislature, there shall have been filed with the secretary of state a petition proposing a law, signed by two per centum of the electors of the state, the secretary of state shall transmit the same to the legislature not later than ten days after the commencement of the session. If the law so proposed be not passed by the legislature at such session, or if it be passed in an amended form, then upon a further petition or petitions, each signed by six per centum of the electors of the state, filed with the secretary of state within six months after the adjournment of the legislature, the law proposed in the first petition, or one or more amended forms thereof, shall be submitted to the electors at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of any such further petition or petitions, and if approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon, the same shall become law and go into effect thirty days after such election, and shall supersede any amended form of such law which may have been passed by the legislature. No law proposed by initiative petition and approved by the electors shall be subject to the veto of the governor. The authority of the people to enact laws, as provided in this subdivision, shall extend only to laws authorized by the provisions of the constitution.

"c. THE REFERENDUM.—If within ninety days after the final adjournment of any session of the legislature, a referendum petition, signed by six per centum of the electors of the state, shall be filed with the secretary of state against any law, or any part of a law, passed by the legislature at such session, such law, or such part of a law, shall be submitted to the electors at the next general or special state-wide election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of said petition. If a majority of the vote cast thereon be in the negative, such law, or such part of a law, shall thereby be repealed. Provided, that if a referendum petition is signed by fifteen per centum of the electors of the state, the law or part of a law, against which such petition is filed shall be suspended pending the referendum vote thereon.

"Any law providing for a tax levy or appropriating money for the current expenses of the state government or state institutions, any act of the legislature submitting a constitutional amendment or other question to the electors of the state, or any emergency law necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, shall go into effect immediately upon its passage and approval by the governor, and such laws, except emergency laws, shall not be subject to a referendum vote. All other laws shall go into effect ninety days after the adjournment of the legislature. A bill proposing an emergency law shall contain a preamble briefly setting forth the facts constituting the emergency. A separate vote shall be taken upon the preamble of such bill by a call of the yeas and nays, and if the preamble be adopted by a two-thirds vote of all the members of each house, it shall be an emergency law.

"d. GENERAL PROVISIONS.—All petitions provided for in this section shall contain a title indicating the subject and purpose of the proposed law or constitutional amendment, or the law, or part of a law, to be referred, and if a change is proposed in an existing constitutional provision or statute, in addition to referring to the same, it shall state the general effect of the proposed change, and also the full text of the proposed law or amendment to the constitution or of the law, or part of a law, to be referred. Any initiative or referendum petition may be signed in separate parts, but each part shall conform to the provisions herein contained. All petitions shall be signed and verified before a person authorized to administer an oath, and shall be in such form that a person signing a petition thereby states under oath, the date of his signature, his residence, that he is a qualified elector, that he has not previously signed any part of such petition, and that he has signed the petition with knowledge of the contents thereof. To each part of such petition shall be attached the affidavit of the person before whom the same was signed, which affidavit shall contain a statement of the number of signers thereon, that each of the signatures attached to such part was made in the presence of the affiant, that to the best of his knowledge and belief each signature is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be, that he believes the persons who have signed such petition to be electors, that they signed such petition with knowledge of the contents thereof, and that each person signed the same on the date stated opposite his name. The circulation of the petitions provided for herein, or the prohibition of the circulation thereof, may be regulated by law, and in case the circulation of any petition is prohibited by law, the percentage of signers required on any petition provided for in this section shall be one-half of the percentage specified in subdivisions A, B and C of this section.

"The percentage in any case shall be based upon the total number of votes cast for governor at the next preceding election. All petitions provided for in this section shall contain the signature of not less than one-half of the designated percentage of the electors in not less than one-fourth of the counties of the state. In initiating a law or constitutional amendment, electors who have signed the first shall be qualified to sign the second petition. The sufficiency of all petitions shall be decided by the secretary of state subject to review by the court. If the secretary of state decides that any petition is insufficient, he shall permit a reasonable time for making corrections or for filing additional signatures. In the event of legal proceedings in court to prevent giving effect to any such petition on account of insufficiency, or any other ground, the burden of proof shall be upon the person attacking the petition. No law or amendment to the constitution initiated and approved by the electors as herein provided, shall be held unconstitutional, or void on account of the insufficiency of any initiative petition; nor shall the repeal of any law submitted by referendum petition be held invalid for such insufficiency.

"All initiative laws and constitutional amendments shall be so submitted to the electors as to permit an affirmative or negative vote upon each measure submitted. If conflicting proposed laws or conflicting proposed amendments to the constitution be approved at the same election, the one receiving the highest number of affirmative votes shall prevail as to conflicting provisions.

"The style of all legislative measures and amendments to the constitution initiated by the people under this section shall be: 'Be it enacted by the people of the State of Minnesota.'

"The provisions of this section may be enforced by appropriate legislation, but until such legislation has been enacted, this section shall be self-executing."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to give to the electors the privilege of submitting directly to the voters constitutional amendments, proposed legislation and the right to suspend and annul laws enacted by the Legislature.

SECOND PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The second proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 585 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose and object of this amendment is to add two Associate Justices to the Supreme Court; to require the concurrence of five Justices of the Supreme Court before any law shall be declared unconstitutional by such court, and make the office of Clerk of the Supreme Court appointive, and is an amendment of Section 2 of Article 6 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, but the number of the associate justices may be increased to a number not exceeding four, by the legislature, by a two-thirds vote, when it shall be deemed necessary. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the State, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified, and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and six associate justices. Five shall constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of at least four shall be necessary to a decision, but no statute shall be declared unconstitutional unless five members of the court shall concur in the decision. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions, and a clerk of the supreme court."

EFFECT: The present constitution provides that the number of Associate Justices of the Supreme Court shall not exceed four in number, while the amendment, if adopted, will increase the number to six. A majority of the Supreme Court may now declare a law unconstitutional, but if this amendment is adopted, it will require the concurrence of five members. The office of clerk of the Supreme Court is now elective, but if this amendment is adopted, the clerk of the Supreme Court will be appointed by the court.

THIRD PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The third proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 586 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is sought to authorize the State to construct roads, ditches, fire breaks through and around unsold state school and swamp lands, and a $250,000 revolving fund, realized and kept up from the sale of such lands, is to be set apart for such purpose. This is an amendment of Section 2 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which law reads as follows:

"Section 2. The proceeds of such lands as are or hereafter may be granted by the United States for the use of schools within each township of this State shall remain a perpetual school fund to the State; and not more than one-third (⅓) of said lands may be sold in two (2) years, one-third (⅓) in five years, and one-third (⅓) in ten (10) years but the lands of the greatest valuation shall be sold first; provided, that no portion of said lands shall be sold otherwise than at public sale. The principal of all funds arising from sales or other disposition of lands or other property, granted or entrusted to this State in each township for educational purposes, shall forever be preserved inviolate and undiminished; and the income arising from the lease or sale of said school lands shall be distributed to the different townships throughout the State, in proportion to the number of scholars in each township, between the ages of five and twenty-one years and shall be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations.

"Investment of Funds.—Suitable laws shall be enacted by the legislature for the safe investment of the principal of all funds which have heretofore arisen or which may hereafter arise from the sale or other disposition of such lands, or the income from such lands accruing in any way before the sale or disposition thereof, in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, or of the State of Minnesota, issued after the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty (1860), or of such other state as the legislature may, by law, from time to time direct.

"Swamp Lands.—Division of proceeds. All swamp lands now held by the State, or that may hereafter accrue to the state, shall be appraised and sold in the same manner and by the same officers, and the minimum price shall be the same, less one-third (⅓), as is provided by law for the appraisement and sale of the school lands under the provisions of title one (1) of Chapter thirty-eight (38) of the General Statutes. The principal of all funds derived from sales of swamp lands, as aforesaid, shall forever be preserved inviolate and undiminished. One-half (½) of the proceeds of said principal shall be appropriated to the common school fund of the state. The remaining one-half (½) shall be appropriated to the educational and charitable institutions of the State in the relative ratio of cost to support said institutions," and adds thereto the following:

"A revolving fund of not over Two Hundred Fifty Thousand Dollars ($250,000) may be set apart from the funds derived from the sale of school and swamp lands, to be used in constructing roads, ditches and fire breaks in, through and around unsold school and swamp lands, such fund to be replenished as long as needed from the enhanced value realized from the sale of such lands so benefited."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to permit the State to improve the school and swamp lands of the State out of moneys derived from the sale of such lands, and to bring the State into line with the conditions of the Swamp Land Grant as to drainage of such lands, by providing a revolving fund therefor, pending the ultimate application of the avails of such grant to the common school fund of the State and the educational and charitable institutions thereof.

FOURTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The fourth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 587 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is proposed to repeal the provisions of Section 11 of Article 9 of the Constitution, which section now reads as follows:

"Section 11. There shall be published by the treasurer, in at least one newspaper printed at the seat of government, during the first week in January in each year, and in the next volume of the acts of legislature, detailed statements of all moneys drawn from the treasury during the preceding year, for what purpose and to whom paid, and by what law authorized; and also of all moneys received, and by what authority and from whom."

EFFECT: The Constitution requires the treasurer to publish yearly a detailed statement of the moneys drawn from the treasury during the preceding year, giving the names of the persons to whom paid and the purposes for which it was expended. It also requires a like statement of the names of the persons, and the sources, as to money received, and in both cases a statement of the law under which payments were made, or money paid into the treasury. The effect of this amendment, if the same be adopted, will be to repeal the section of the Constitution mentioned and insofar relieve the treasurer from such publication and the State from the expense thereof. This change in the Constitution, however, would not prevent the Legislature from directing by law that such, or a different publication, of the same or other information, should be made by the treasurer.

FIFTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The fifth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 588 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to permit the permanent school and university funds of this State to be invested in first mortgage loans upon improved and cultivated farm lands of the State. This amendment would change Section 6 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which now reads as follows:

"Sec. 6. The permanent school and university fund of this state may be invested in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this state, but no such investment shall be made until approved by the board of commissioners designated by law to regulate the investment of the permanent school fund and the permanent university fund of this state; nor shall such loan or investment be made when the bonds to be issued or purchased would make the entire bonded indebtedness exceed fifteen (15) per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable real property of the county, school district, city, town or village issuing such bonds; nor shall such loans or indebtedness be made at a lower rate of interest than three (3) per cent per annum, nor for a shorter period than five (5) years, nor for a longer period than twenty (20) years, and no change of the town, school district, city, village or of county lines shall relieve the real property in such town, school district, county, village or city in this state at the time of the issuing of such bonds from any liability for taxation to pay such bonds."

"Section 6. The permanent school and university fund of this state may be invested in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this state, and in first mortgage loans secured upon improved and cultivated farm lands of this state. But no such investment or loan shall be made until approved by the board of commissioners designated by law to regulate the investment of the permanent school fund and the permanent university fund of this state nor shall such loan or investment be made when the bonds to be issued or purchased would make the entire bonded indebtedness exceed 15 per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the county, school district, city, town or village issuing such bonds; nor shall any farm loan or investment be made when such investment or loan would exceed 30 per cent of the actual cash value of the farm land mortgaged to secure said investment; nor shall such investments or loans be made at a lower rate of interest than three per cent per annum, nor for a shorter period than five years, nor for a longer period than thirty years, and no change of the town, school district, city, village or county lines shall relieve the real property in such town, school district, county, village or city in this state at the time of issuing of such bonds from any liability for taxation to pay such bonds.

EFFECT: The present Constitution authorizes the investment of the permanent school and university funds of this State in the bonds of any county, school district, city, town or village of this State. This amendment, if adopted, will permit in addition to the foregoing investments, said school and university funds to be invested also in first mortgage loans secured upon improved and cultivated farm lands of this State. The present Constitution provides that no investment shall be made for a longer period than twenty years, while the proposed amendment extends the period to thirty years.

SIXTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to make the term of office of the Judge of Probate four years. This is an amendment of Section 7 of Article 6 of the Constitution, which now reads as follows:

"Section 7. There shall be established in each organized county in the State a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and be held at such time and places as may be prescribed by law. It shall be held by one judge, who shall be elected by the voters of the county for the term of two years. He shall be a resident of such county at the time of his election, and reside therein during his continuance in office; and his compensation shall be provided by law. He may appoint his own clerk where none has been elected; but the legislature may authorize the election, by the electors of any county, of one clerk or register of probate for such county, whose powers, duties, term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. A probate court shall have jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship, but no other jurisdiction, except as prescribed by this Constitution,"

"Section 7. Probate Court—Judges to be Elected—Jurisdiction. "There shall be established in each organized county in the state a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and be held at such time and places as may be prescribed by law. It shall be held by one judge, who shall be elected by the voters of the county for the term of four years. He shall be a resident of such county at the time of his election, and reside therein during his continuance in office; and his compensation shall be provided by law. He may appoint his own clerk where none has been elected; but the legislature may authorize the election by the electors of any county, of one clerk or register of probate for such county, whose powers, duties, term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. A probate court shall have jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship, but no other jurisdiction except as prescribed by this Constitution."

EFFECT: The present Constitution provides that the office of Judge of Probate shall be two years and if this amendment is adopted the term of such office will be four years.

SEVENTH PROPOSED ADMENDMENT.

The seventh proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 590 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of said amendment is to fix and limit the number of State Senators.

Section 2 of Article 4 of the Constitution now reads as follows:

"Section 2. The number of members who compose the Senate and House of Representatives shall be prescribed by law, but the representatives in the Senate shall never exceed one member for every 5,000 inhabitants, and in the House of Representatives one member for every 2,000 inhabitants. The representation in both houses shall be apportioned equally throughout the different sections of the State, in proportion to the population thereof exclusive of Indians not taxable under the provisions of law."

It is proposed to substitute therefor the following:

"Section 1. That Section 2 of Article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota be amended so as to read as follows:

"Section 2. In the next and succeeding reapportionments of Senators and Representatives, the Senate shall be composed of sixty-three (63) members and the House of Representatives shall be composed of such number of members as may be prescribed by law. The representation in both Houses shall be apportioned as nearly as practicable, throughout the different sections of the states in proportion to the population thereof, exclusive of Indians not taxable under the provisions of law. Provided, however, that a County may be divided into several legislative districts, but no County or any of the parts thereof shall ever constitute or be a part of more than seven (7) Senatorial Districts and not more than seven (7) Senators shall ever be apportioned to any one County."

EFFECT: The object of this amendment is to limit the State Senate to sixty-three members and to prevent any one county having more than seven senators.

EIGHTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The eighth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 591 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

PURPOSE: The purpose of this amendment is to encourage the planting, cultivation and protection of useful forest trees and it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 9 of the Constitution to be known as Section 17A, and which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article Nine (9) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, is hereby proposed to the people of the State of Minnesota, for their approval or rejection, which amendment, when adopted shall be known as Section 17a of said Article Nine (9), that is to say:

"'Section 17a. For the purpose of encouraging the planting, cultivation and protection of useful forest trees in this state, laws may be enacted providing for the payment by the State of an annual bounty of not more than Two Dollars and Fifty Cents ($2.50) per acre, for a term, in each case of not more than Ten (10) years, and not exceeding Ten (10) acres, to any one person who shall plant, cultivate and protect useful forest trees upon his own land'."

EFFECT: This amendment, if adopted, will permit the Legislature to enact laws providing for the payment by the State of a limited bounty for a limited term, to persons who shall plant, cultivate and protect useful forest trees upon their own land.

NINTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

PURPOSE: By this amendment it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 8 of the Constitution to be known as Section 7 and which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article eight (8) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota is hereby proposed to the legal voters of said state for their approval or their rejection, which amendment when so approved shall be known as Section seven (7) of said Article eight (8) and shall read as follows:

"'Such of the school and other public lands of the state as are better adapted for the production of timber than for agriculture, may be set apart as state school forests, or other state forests as the legislature may provide, and the legislature may provide for the management of the same on forestry principles. The net revenue therefrom shall be used for the purpose for which the lands were granted to the state'."

EFFECT: The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will authorize the Legislature to set apart for state school forests or other state forests, state public lands which are better adapted for timber than for agriculture, and to manage the same upon forestry principles.

TENTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The tenth proposed amendment is contained in Chapter 593 of the Laws of Minnesota for the year 1913.

By this amendment it is proposed to add to Article 7 of the Constitution an entirely new section, providing for a recall, which shall read as follows:

Section 1. That Article Seven (7) of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota shall be and the same is hereby amended by adding thereto, at the end of said Article, a new section, which shall be numbered Section 10 of said Article Seven (7) and which shall read as follows:

"Section 10. Every public official in Minnesota, elective or appointive, shall be subject to recall from office by the electors of his official or electoral district as herein provided. A petition demanding his recall setting forth the reasons therefor, signed by such number of electors in his district as shall be provided by law, which number shall not be less than twenty per centum or more than thirty per centum of the total number of votes cast for governor in such district at the last preceding election, shall be filed in the office where petitions for nomination to such office are filed, or in such other office as may be provided by law, and the officer in whose office such petition is filed, shall order a special election for such recall. If such official shall resign within five days after such petition is filed, the vacancy thereby created shall be filled as may be provided by law; but if he shall not so resign, such special election, to be held within twenty-five days after the filing of the petition, shall be called to determine whether such official shall be recalled. On the official ballot at such election shall be printed, in not more than two hundred words, the reasons for demanding the recall of such official as set forth in the petition, and in not more than two hundred words such official's justification of his course in office. Such official shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of such election shall be officially declared. No such petition shall be signed or filed against any official until he shall have held office six months; and no petition shall be signed or filed for the recall of any judicial official within sixty days of the decision, ruling or act complained of in the petition. Such additional legislation as may aid in the operation of this section and proceedings thereunder shall be provided by law. At such election no person shall be voted for, and the only proposition submitted shall be the recall of such official. Any person recalled, as provided in this section, shall be ineligible to fill the vacancy caused by his recall."

PURPOSE AND EFFECT: The purpose of this amendment is to enable a certain number of voters to petition and cause to be submitted to a vote the question of removing from office any elective or appointive public official.

ELEVENTH PROPOSED AMENDMENT

By this amendment it is proposed to add an entirely new section to Article 9 of the Constitution, to be known as Section 18, which shall read as follows:

"Section 1. The following amendment to Article 9 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota is hereby proposed to the people of the State for their approval or rejection, which amendment, if approved, shall be known as Section 18 of Article 9 of the Constitution and shall read as follows:

"'Section 18. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of dogs on a basis other than the value of the dog, and from the fund derived from such tax, authorizing payment of the damages sustained by the owners of other domestic animals by reason of injuries caused by dogs.'"

PURPOSE AND EFFECT: The present basis for taxing dogs is upon actual value. The proposed amendment, if adopted, will permit the Legislature to enact laws changing this basis. It is proposed to create a fund out of which owners of domestic animals may be reimbursed for loss sustained by reason of injuries caused by dogs.

Yours respectfully,
LYNDON A. SMITH,
Attorney General.

St. Paul, May 6, 1914.

Mr. Julius A. Schmahl,
Secretary of State.

Dear Sir: Referring to proposed Constitutional Amendment No. 4 would say: As state expert printer I have given the publications involved in this proposed amendment special thought, and am of opinion both these publications are entirely superfluous. The extensive annual publication "in a daily newspaper published at the capital city" attracts absolutely no attention. The annual report of the state treasurer is published in book form, and to an extent that makes it easy for every person specially concerned to secure a copy. To conform strictly with the law as it is at present, means the expenditure, under reasonably favorable printing contracts, of approximately $8,000, a sum which can be used to excellent advantage under conditions which ordinarily suggest the greatest care and economy upon the part of those under whose direction the printing fund is expended.

Yours respectfully,
J. T. MANNIX,
State Expert Printer.

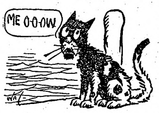
Pet Cat, Saved From Chloroform, Tries Suicide

NEW YORK.—It is little wonder that Minnie, the pet cat at the Staten Island ferry house in Manhattan, attempted to commit suicide. For two days she had more than any cat could bear without being driven to distraction, so she jumped into the bay.



Four of her most intimate cat friends who had long been her companions were taken from her, and she was left to bemoan her lot alone. Minnie had a narrow escape herself and it was only because of the tears of strong-hearted men around the ferry house that she was allowed to remain behind when the others went.

Minnie's history is interesting. The story of how she escaped being chloroformed along with her associates is equally interesting. For more than twelve years she has been a familiar character around the ferry house.

Minnie is now kept inside the candy stand until she overcomes her suicide mania.

He Met a Charming Girl From His Old Home Town

INDIANAPOLIS.—He is a fellow who likes to talk about his "old home town." It is just a little town, but he knows everybody there and enjoys talking about his old friends and neighbors. The result is that all of his business associates in Indianapolis are familiar with names and scenes in his "old home town."

I KNOW YOUR PA WELL

The other day a rather comely woman of middle years met him in front of the courthouse. He is seen and known in that neighborhood. She asked if he was the real estate agent who had promised to meet her there.

"No, I'm not a real estate man," he replied politely, "but I know most of the boys and may be able to find him for you. I will go and bring him to you in a minute or two."

"Never mind, thank you," she said with a friendly smile. "I'll just wait. I'm used to waiting for real estate men. They're always late. There was one, Doug Chalmers, in my old home town at Taskerburg. He was always late."

"Taskerburg!" he exclaimed with delight. "That's my old home town, and I know Doug very well. How long have you been away from there?"

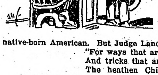
"Only a few weeks. I married again and moved up here. I'm one of the Beaver girls from Jackson township."

"I know your pa well."

They talked on for several minutes. She grew tired of waiting for the real estate man and said she had to do some shopping. Being a stranger in town she didn't know much about the stores, she said. He volunteered to go with her. At the shirtwaist counter she proceeded to buy a waist valued at $5. She looked in her purse and, to her amazement, had only some small change. She had left her other pocketbook at home. Yes, he would lend her $5 and she would meet him in front of the Traction Terminal building at 3 o'clock and return the money. She lived at —— North Delaware street, she said. That afternoon he waited. She did not come. Then he went to the North Delaware street address. It was a church.

Story of Woo's First Shave Didn't Fool Landis

CHICAGO.—The shaving party of a Chinese infant was described to Federal Judge Landis by friends of Woo Pon, a blinking citizen of the new republic, who does not want to return to his native land.



LET THE BAILIFF TAKE YOUR HAT

The witnesses said Woo's father, Woo Ging Gong, had issued the invitations one month after Woo was born, in the tenth year of the reign of Kwangsu (1884) at Folsom, Cal.

As the guests crowded around Papa Woo cried, "You're next," in Chinese, and, grabbing his offspring by the ears, carefully shaved all of the baby's head except where the queue ought to grow.

That story, they figured, should be sufficient proof that Woo was a native-born American. But Judge Landis was thinking of a poem:

"For ways that are dark
And tricks that are vain
The heathen Chinee is peculiar."

So he took a hand in the cross-examination.

"Let the bailiff take your hat," said the judge.

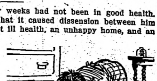
Woo Pon, who was on the witness stand, might not understand the language of the lawyers, thought the judge, but surely he would know a common word like that if he had lived for thirty years in the United States.

But Woo Pon did not understand.

"I don't blame him or his countrymen for trying to put it over on me. If I was in his place I'd do the same thing. But it is my business to keep from being fooled," said the judge. "An order of deportation will be entered. And I suggest that the United States attorney investigate this case in view of that shaving story."

Suicide Prevented by an Elusive Collar Button

LOS ANGELES.—Ralston Wilkes for weeks had not been in good health. His distress so preyed upon him that it caused dissension between him and his wife. Mr. Wilkes thought that ill health, an unhappy home, and an angry wife were too great afflictions for a man to stand, and he notified his most intimate friends that he intended to kill himself.



Such news he forwarded to Mrs. Wilkes, who was in Hollywood, housed by relatives. As soon as she received the alarm she notified the police and the police went to the Wilkes residence, No. 1453 North Coronado street, and questioned the man. He said he felt very bad indeed, that he was consumed by a fever that the doctors had been unable to break, and was depressed. He could not perspire.

As his threats were not sufficiently active to warrant arrest, the police left him there. The next morning Mr. Wilkes, who is a carpenter, arose early and prepared the poison that was to cause his death.

Then he began to don his best clothes, but his collar button fell and skillfully concealed itself. Wilkes made a determined search.

Suddenly along his forehead there popped beads of perspiration. Almost at once his whole body was drenched. He felt relieved, and when he had cooled he felt so good that he was singing when the detectives reached there. They had been notified to go to him again, for he had warned his wife by a message that he would be dead by 10 o'clock.

BRITISH FIRST SEA LORD A GERMAN

The first sea lord of the British navy is a German. Admiral His Serene Highness Prince Louis of Battenberg is his mouth-filling title, but it may be reduced according to taste, beginning eliminations at either end. Whether the title is used in whole or in part, its holder is the directing force back of his majesty's ships, the greatest navy the world has ever known.

The present first sea lord came to England to live when he was but fourteen and was naturalized. He took to the sea immediately and has been there ever since, a total of 46 years. The peculiarity of his present position is emphasized by the fact that he married Princess Victoria Alberta of Hesse, forming another tie to the Fatherland. This was somewhat mitigated by the fact that the Princess Victoria was a granddaughter of the late English queen of the same name. His advancement has been due largely to his technical skill and knowledge. He is a scientist and inventor, having to his credit such creations as a cone signaling apparatus which can flash lights that may be read at a distance of 20 miles. It was because of his technical knowledge that he became adviser to the board of admiralty and director of naval intelligence and was, as early as 1882, placed in command of a battery of gatling guns which landed at Alexandria.

GERMAN WHO INVADES GERMANY.

Gen. Carl Rennenkampf, who commands the Russian army now invading Prussia, is a German himself. He is German in blood, habits and education. There is not a drop of Slavic blood in his veins, yet he is leading the forces of the czar against the fatherland.

Less than a century ago the grandfather of the present czar invited the Rennenkampf family to come to his domain and join his forces. The Rennenkampfs came, settled in the provinces on the Baltic, which are thickly populated with Germans, and the general is the first of the children of the old German family to be born in the land of the Muscovites. When the Germans of the Baltic provinces objected to being Russianized, it was Rennenkampf who repressed them ruthlessly. In the war with Japan he was in command of a huge force of Cossacks. His merciless tactics had much to do with the failure of the uprising of 1906, and after that he became a notorious oppressor of the Poles and Jews.

To his military staff and his army of Cossacks and soldiers Rennenkampf has been a constant enigma—an unsolvable riddle. Though severe by reputation, he has been known to display the most incomprehensible acts of kindness to his soldiers. While aloof and reserved in manner, he at times showed himself to be more than democratic by nature, mingling with his army, drinking and celebrating with them, entirely unconscious of his high rank. This is usually followed by reactions which have been the dread of those who know him well.

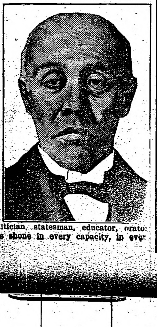
Like Bismarck, Rennenkampf believes in the force of the mailed fist, in the rule of iron and blood.

BRILLIANT YOUNG SEA FIGHTER

Rear Admiral Sir David Beatty, the English victor of the first naval battle of the war, is the youngest man of his rank in the British service. He is but a little over forty. He has an especial interest for Americans as the husband of a daughter of the late Marshall Field of Chicago. They are immensely wealthy and Lady Beatty is one of the foremost social leaders in London. She is now earnestly working on behalf of a fund for the relief of soldiers' families. She is young and noticeably beautiful.

Admiral Beatty gave the first demonstration of a new and unexpected use of the submarine in war. With his cruiser fleet hanging on the horizon he sent in beneath the impregnable defense of Helgoland two of these mosquito craft. One pretended to be disabled and the other pretended to go to its companion's aid. By ingenious maneuvering they succeeded in luring a detachment of German cruisers out into the open sea, where Beatty destroyed three of them. He is a man of exceptional ability and initiative and will probably be given high command in the later developments of the war.

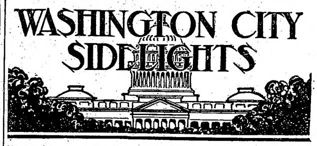
JAPAN'S GRANDEST OLD MAN



There is only one Okuma in Japan or in the world. He is a positively unique character. As far as years go he is called an old man and should long ago have been Oslerized. But he is really only seventy-six years young and has declared that he expects to live 50 or so years longer. And in spirit he is certainly still a young man.

He has never been called one of the "elder statesmen," but he deserved the appellation as much as they did. He was prominent in public service before any one of them; but he was sidetracked into private life because he dared to differ with the policies of others who later rose into prominence and he has been kept in the background because he was considered too liberal, even too radical. He has survived all except three or four of his old colleagues and rivals.

Okuma's career has been a long and versatile one. He has been politician, statesman, educator, orator, author, horticulturist, etc.; and he has shone in every capacity, in every position.



High Cost of Tangoing Threatens Washington

WASHINGTON.—Suffering snakes! The high cost of tangoing threatens Washington. The poor old maxixe and the fox trot and the hippopotamus wiggle and all the rest of those wonderful contortions are going to be soaked. So saith the American Society of Music Publishers, Composers and Authors.

THESE GUYS WANT TH' EARTH
MUSIC PUBLISHER WILL DEMA

A wall of anxiety has arisen in Washington. A number of thousand dancers, hotel and restaurant proprietors and orchestra leaders are making noises indicative of deep distress.

The plan of the A. S. O. M. P. C. A. A., in brief, is that royalties shall be paid to composers whose selections are whanged out in public laces where devotees of the modern dances most do congregate.

"Whadde you mean; tax?" inquired a muscular piano player who nightly ips the internals out of an unstrung tin-pan in an uptown establishment. These guys want the earth. Ain't people got a right to dance without ayin' a tax for it?"

A dear young thing who feels her day has been incomplete unless she as danced from 8 p. m. until 2 a. m. was almost in tears.

"We'll fix their clock," she asserted. "I know a young man who plays he piano delightful. I'll get him to make up some pieces."

The brightest thought of the day came from a piano salesman who ightly assaults a second violin in a dance hall.

"We should worry," he said. "Why, if they put over a stunt like that e'd take Wagner and Beethoven and some of those guys and liven 'em up little and they'd do almost as well as the junk that's being turned out ow."

Aunty Watches the Antics of the Trick Aviator

AS she watched the airship her upturned face reflected with maplike faithfulness the emotions that beset her.

"Dat man better stop his skylarkin' up yander or de fus' thing he knows e's gwine come tumlin' down head omus'—ain't dat so, lady?"

The woman who happened to be ext took up the remark with a riendliness due to that rare and omfortable being, an "aunty" of the ld regime.

"He's all right. You and I will e sailing around like that some day —maybe."

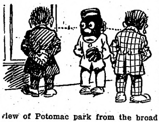
"Don't count me in with you, oney. Ain't nobby gwine trick me nto flyin' in de face of Heb'n, like lat. De good Lawd made de yuth for man, an' de sea for fish, an' de air for irds. An' when man he start in an' grab more'n his share fum de fish an' de irds, den dis worl' is bounter come to an end. Ain't got any washin' for ne, is you, lady? My madam whah I nusses shet up de house in de sumner an' ain't come home yit on accounter de war, anni ben doin' washes all hoo de hot wevver, but now it's turnin' cool people don't change evy day, n' I gotta git me anuther wash. One gen'man cut so close last week that e only gimme thutty cents. Lawser mercy, chile, look at dat fool man swoopin' roun' dat capt'l like a swallow over a barn.

"Ain't he a sight, though? Gimme cricks in my neck watch'n him. But lat ain't nothin' to de misery in mah lef' side. De doctor at de spens'ry gimme black pills, but he ain't drivv away de pain yit—ain't it scanlous de way dat man tempt Province—oh, mah Lawd, he liketer went dat time! Look at him summersettin'. Oh, my Lawd!"

How Eddie the Infallible Failed in Diplomacy

EDDIE the infallible failed the other day. Eddie the the courtly colored messenger who guides diplomats into the office of the secretary of state.

It occurred in the secretary's office, and Baron von Collenberg, late of the German consular staff in Mexico, should have left the room before Eddie ushered in the British ambassador, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice. The two diplomats met.



In the language of diplomacy, it was a contremps. The polished heels of the German baron clicked sharply as he gazed sternly over the head of Sir Cecil at the gallery of former secretaries of state. Sir Cecil drew himself up stiffly and became exclusively interested in the view of Potomac park from the broad windows of Secretary Bryan's office. The baron bowed to Secretary Bryan and "exited."

Baron von Collenberg had called on the secretary to ascertain if the latter had been able to procure for him from the British ambassador a safe conduct across the Atlantic to Holland. Sir Cecil was calling to assure the secretary that he would grant the safe conduct.

Farm Women's Mistake About Smith-Lever Act

MANY letters are being received by the United States department of agriculture which indicate that farm women in various sections of the country have come to believe that the government is about to assist them with grants of money to individuals. This unfortunate mistake which, it is feared, will be the cause of considerable disappointment, appears to have arisen through a misunderstanding of the Smith-Lever act recently passed by congress. Under this act funds contributed both by the federal and state governments are made available for practical demonstration work in agriculture and home economics. Experts from the agricultural colleges and county agents, both men and women, are to show farmers and farm women the value of modern methods in agriculture and housekeeping, and demonstrate the use of labor-saving devices. The purposes of the act are thus entirely educational; and there are no provisions whatever for direct financial assistance.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
Dear Uncle: I would like to have some of that money you are going to give away.

This demonstration work which the Smith-Lever act is designed to pro-cte has already met with considerable success in the states where it has en started, but the additional funds now available will greatly increase efficiency. To avail themselves to the full of its possibilities the depart-nt officials recommend that farm women form local clubs and then com-nicate with the county agent or the state agricultural college. In this y it will often be possible to secure a visit from the county agent or from e home economics expert.

ALL EUROPE, ASIA, AND AFRICA ARE BECOMING INVOLVED

COMPLICATIONS OF WAR INCREASED BY PORTE'S ENTRANCE

AMBASSADORS OF TRIPLE ENTENTE QUIT CONSTANTINOPLE AND PEACE HOPES GO GLIMMERING.

ADVANCE OF GERMANS ON CALAIS IS STILL CHECKED

'Allies' Lines Holding—Berlin Report Declares Dunkirk Prepares for Siege and to Flood Country in Case Teutons Break Through—No Developments in East.

By International News Service.

London, Nov. 3.—The ambassadors of Russia, Great Britain and France have received their passports and have quit Constantinople, and Italy is reported now to be aflame with the war fever, demonstrations in favor of entering the great conflict becoming so violent in a number of cities that troops had to be called out to supress the riotous scenes.

Uneasiness in Balkans.

These, together with the growing uneasiness and speculations as to the probable action of the Balkan states—Bulgaria, Roumania and Greece—are the most startling developments of the newest phase of the international struggle which now threatens not only to involve practically all Europe but also to drag in Asia, India and Egypt.

Negatively there are two features of the situation which are important. These are the continued failure of any power officially to declare war as the next step after the official announcement that diplomatic relations have been ruptured between Russia and Turkey and the absence of a reply from Turkey in response to the demand for an explanation of her naval activity in the Black Sea, made by the Triple Entente powers.

Peace Still Possible.

These are significant in that they still hold out hope for peaceful solution of the Turko-Russian questions, thus avoiding further extension of hostilities.

Dispatches from Rome declare that the Italian people are almost unanimously with the war party and are clamoring for the immediate entry of Italy into the war to protect the nation's interests.

The resignation of the entire cabinet in a body after a stormy session, in which the ministers failed to agree upon a military program because of the strong representation of the peace party, has brought the situation to an acute stage.

Million Italians Mobilized.

The army is now mobilized to a strength of 1,000,000 men and the fleet is ready for action. It is only left for the war cabinet, which is considered certain to be appointed, to decide that Italy cannot longer remain neutral, in face of the situation in Albania. Italy would be seriously threatened if Austria or Turkey were to attempt to seize Albania, and if Italy were caught unprepared, the war advocates urge, the damage that would be inflicted before she could recover from the shock of the attack would be far more extensive than could be indemnified by the amount of the war appropiations sought.

Egypt Being Invaded.

Activity of Turkey on land is reported from Cairo. Large bodies of troops bent on invading Egypt for the purpose of re-establishing the control of the Ottoman Government are reported to be moving. Bedouins have crossed the Sinai frontier in great numbers from Akabah and Gaza to mobilize with several army corps at Mosus and Damascus.

A dispatch from Rome to the Express says a report has reached there that 400,000 Turks are massed on the Caucasian border and that 300,000 are waiting at Beyreut, Jaffa and other ports for transhipment to the Sinai peninsula. The ports, it is said, are well guarded by the British and French fleets

Problem of Allies.

The problem both for Britain and Russia, however, is the attitude of their Moslem subjects, who under ordinary circumstances would prefer not to fight against Turkey. In this war, however, they have rallied to their flag as have all other races under British or Russian rule and care is being taken to explain to them that in this case Turkey, under the direction of Germany, has been the aggressor.

Attitude of Bulgaria.

Another problem relates to the attitude of Roumania, Bulgaria and Greece. Bulgaria, owing her existence to Russia and being under many obligations to Great Britain, besides being desirous of securing Thrace as far east as the Enos-Midia line, which she was awarded by the London conference after the first Balkan war, but which Turkey retook when Bulgaria was attacked by Greece and Servia, would naturally side with the entente powers, but objects, political observers point out, to fighting side by side with Greece and Servia.

No Official Declaration.

London, Nov. 2.—The complications of the European war have been increased by the entrance of the Turkish empire into the conflict on the side of the Teutonic allies. Following the Breslau's exploit in bombarding Theodosia, Russia, Turkish destroyers have sunk the Russian gunboat Donets in Odessa harbor and damaged three Russian and one French merchantmen.

No official declaration of war has been made, but Turkey's action seems to make it probable that the area of conflict may be greatly widened and the issues complicated. The Balkans, whence sprung the present European conflict, present such a network of hostile interests that Greece and the other Balkan nations easily may be drawn into the vortex.

Teuton Attempt Temporarily Off.

News received from the western battle lines indicate that the Germans' desperate attempt to gain Calais and command the English channel has failed for the present. The flooding of the valley of the Yser canal together with the work of the British warships and of the Belgian army along the coast are reported to have compelled the Germans to withdraw somewhat, while the British and French are said to have been able to advance on the line further into the interior.

The British naval force near Nieuport consists of three monitors, three cruisers and a battleship with 12-inch guns. Destroyers are protecting the ships from attacks by German submarines, which have been hovering around the coast.

Dunkirk Prepares for Siege.

A German official report says that Dunkirk is preparing for a siege and that the populace is prepared to flood the locality in case of a German advance.

No important developments are received from Poland or Galicia.

With the announcement that Baron Fisher will succeed Prince Louis of Battenburg as first sea lord of the admiralty the newspapers believe that the warfare on the part of the navy will be prosecuted sternly.

"The essence of war is violence; moderation in war is imbecility," is one of Admiral Fisher's sayings.

Movement Further Inland.

London, Oct. 31.—The battle of the Yser and the series of fight which have taken place along the whole line in Belgium and France, appear, with the troops now exhausted, to have degenerated into numerous isolated attacks and counter attacks in which the gains and losses are about equally divided betwen the combatants.

The French in their communication say there is no change.

"In fact, as was expected, the Germans seem to have transfered their more serious operations further inland and to be trying to break through the allies' line from Lille which, if successful, would compel the allies, who are holding the front through Ypres to the coast, to fall back toward Dunkirk.

Since the fighting of Friday, Saturday and Sunday, which carried the Germans across the Yser in small detachments numbering between 7,000 and 10,000—all that was left after the machine guns had decimated the ranks of corps upon corps that started the desperate charges—the main effort of the Anglo-Belgian forces supported by the French, has been to cut through upon the left flank of the main body of Germans. The blows of this great Teuton triphammer were leveled at Dixmude and the region just north of that point.

Driven Back Into Germany.

At the extreme eastern end of the battle front the allies report another significant victory. Here in the region beyond Nancy the German line, which for six weeks has been stretched, without yielding materially, clear across France, has broken at last. The French official statement issued says the invaders were driven back across the border onto German soil.

★ LATE WAR DEVELOPMENTS ★

Ambassadors of the Triple Entente—Great Britain, Russia and France—have been handed their passports by the Ottoman Government and have left Constantinople. No other official declaration of war, beyond that sent by Turkey to Russia, is reported to have been exchanged, although reports indicate that a state of war is virtually recognized as existing between Turkey and the nations of the entente.

* * *

The probable action of the Balkan states—Bulgaria, Roumania and Grece—is now a matter of a good deal of speculation since Turkey has become involved in the struggle. Russia has warned Bulgaria not to take sides with Turkey.. Greece and Roumania are expected to join the allies.

* * *

Fifhting in France and Belgium is again reported to be of a seesaw nature, with no decided advantages to either side. In the East the Russians claim further successes over the Germans in East Prussia and Russian Poland. In Galicia a new battle is raging.

Berlin reports say that Dunkirk is preparing for a siege.

* * *

The British hospital ship Rohilla is wrecked on the Yorkshire coast. Two hundred lives are believed to have been lost.

* * *

Turkish warships bombarded two Russian cities on the Black sea—Theodosia and Novorossysk—thus opening war between the Porte and Russia and marking the entrance of the eleventh nation in the great conflict. Two Russian boats were also sunk by Turkish torpedoes.

* * *

The late rebellion in South Africa is said to have fallen to the ground; General Beyers' army is reported as having disbanded and that Beyers has left for parts unknown.

* * *

Germany's first effort to reach Dunkirk is declared to have been frustrated, the Allies proving too formidable. The Germans are now reported farther away from the French coast than at the beginning of the battle. A lull is evident in this terrible fighting, the two great armies seemingly having fought themselves out in the ten days.

* * *

The German official statement admitted that they had been forced to withdraw in Poland in face of superior Russian forces. The Russians are bringing up immense numbers of fresh troops and claim to be pressing both the German and Austro-German forces hard.

The British army on rolls and drilling in the United Kingdom, not including the Canadian contingents, is given as 1,500,000 men.

CRUISER EMDEN AGAIN ACTIVE

SNEAKS INTO BRITISH STRAITS DISGUISED—SINKS 2 SHIPS.

Tokio, Oct. 30.—The British embassy hears that the German cruiser Emden, flying the Japanese flag and disguised by the addition of a fourth smokestack, entered Penang, a British possession in the Straits Settlements, and fired torpedoes which sank the Russian cruiser Jemtchug and a French destroyer.

The Emden's entrance into the waters of the Penang was audacious. She came under the guns of the fort, and after sinking the cruiser and the destroyer escaped through the Strait of Malacci. The fate of the crew on board the Jemtchug is not yet known here.

The German cruiser Emden, after her exploits in the Indian Ocean around India, where she sank a score or more of British steamers, has apparently shifted her scene of operations more to the eastward to the vicinity of the Straits Settlements. On Tuesday she was reported as having sunk a Japanese passenger steamer bound for Singapore.

WINTER HAVING EFFECT ON WAR

DISAGREEABLE CONDITIONS IN BIG THEATERS OF ACTION.

Severe Storm Rages on North Sea—Letter From Front Tells of Frightful Weather.

Berlin, Via London, Nov. 3.—The effect of the approaching winter on the campaign already is evident. Heavy frosts are reported in East Prussia and the campaign in Poland has been waged for some time under most disagreeable conditions caused by rain and snow storms.

A severe storm is now raging on the North Sea, making life uncomfortable because of the rolling and plunging of the torpedo boats and submarines. German life-savers Sunday rescued the crews of three German commercial steamers which were wrecked off Heligoland.

A letter received in Bremerhaven from the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha speaks of the frightful weather prevailing at the front. The trenches are filled with water and the men of his regiment, who for 14 days were on duty at the front, stood day and night in water breast high. The enemy's searchlights played constantly on the German positions and it was impossible for one to show his head above the embankment even at night without drawing their fire.

There are indications that both sides have greatly improved the effectiveness of their anti-aeroplane defense. The Germans have installed anti-balloon cannon extensively and have converted a large number of captured French machine guns for use against the flyers, thereby hampering air attacks on the batteries and trenches, such as described in the following letter from an artillery officer.

"We were bivouacked in a little woods. Suddenly we sighted three aeroplanes. Two, evidently French, flew directly toward our battery. Rifle fire against these daredevils was absolutely useless. We crouched like flocks of hens under a hawk, as an aviator circled overhead. A bomb whizzed down, but, luckily, the wind carried it to the edge of the wood, wounding only one man, while the flier was circling to regain his position above us.

"The third machine, which appeared to be a German, and bore the iron cross, the German recognition, on both wings, crossed our position, flying fairly low. We expected him to attack the other machine, but instead there was again that ominous whiz and a bomb landed in our lines, killing four.

"Now we are protected by balloon cannon, which, as I write, are firing on a British flyer who is making off. Yesterday our protectors brought down a British machine. The observer was killed and the aviator was wounded. The machine, curiously enough, was little damaged."

PROTEST SHIP'S DETENTION

U. S. Will Take Immediate Steps to Have Great Britain Release Kroonland.

Washington, Nov. 2.—The state department has decided to protest to Great Britain against the detention of the American steamship Kroonland, held at Gibraltar with some 1,200 passengers and a cargo of copper bound from New York for Italian and Greek ports.

The British authorities will be asked whether the vessel is held because of the nature of her cargo, which has been declared conditional contraband, or because German and Austrian reservists are among her passengers. Full information concerning the case is lacking, but upon the facts in hand state department officials take the position that the ship either should be released or taken forthwith into a prize court.

REPORT GERMANY NOW NEGOTIATING U. S. CREDIT LOAN

GOVERNMENT HAS NO POWER TO OPPOSE SUCH ACTION ON PART OF AMERICAN BANKERS.

VAST SUPPLIES WILL BE BOUGHT HERE AS RESULT

Russia and Fatherland Alone May Purchase $100,000,000 Worth—Pointed Out Proposed Transactions Do Not Clash With Views of Wilson.

Washington, Nov. 2. — Viewing credit loans to belligerent countries as private transactions, the Washington administration will not attempt to interpose its influence against such transactions on the part of the American bankers.

Germany Seeking Loan.

This was learned on the highest authority after it became known that German financiers were contemplating the establishment of a credit loan in this country similar to the $10,000,000 credit fund negotiated by the National City bank of New York and other bankers for the French government.

The decision of the Washington administration may lead to the purchase in the United States of about $50,000,000 worth of supplies by Russia and an equal if not a greater amount by Germany. Details of the expected transactions are lacking here.

President's Views Considered.

High officials of the Washington administration insist that President Wilson has not changed his view announced at the outbreak of the war that the loaning of money to belligerents would be "inconsistent with the true spirit of American neutrality." A distinction was drawn by officials; however, between the loans referred to at that time—such as bond issues offered for public sale and credit transactions intended as a checking account against the purchase by belligerents of foodstuffs and supplies from American firms.

The president realizes that this government has no legal right to oppose loans of any character nor is there any obligation of international law forbidding them. During the Russo-Japanese war, loans were floated for Japan in the United States through public bond issues. The president is understood, however, to be opposed to that form of loan as liable to stir up ill-feeling and prejudice.

Position of Government Embarrassing.

Officials have unanimously decided to refrain from discussing the subject of loans as the position of the government in the circumstances is an embarrassing one.

Under what is known as credit loans, there is no intention, it is understood, to export gold from the United States. Large funds will be established by the belligerent countries with their financial agents here who will pay the bills of the European nations to American dealers in munitions of war and supplies. The bankers will be given short time notes by the belligerent governments with a much better rate of interest, it is said, than ordinaily could be obtained. In return for these considerations European governments will agree to spend large sums of money in the United States for supplies.

Chicago Bankers Interested.

Chicago.—Chicago bankers who are taking part in the negotiations of some of the belligerent nations of Europe for supplies in this country, said purchases for cash have reached a large volume and there is every reason to believe the demand will continue. Chicago alone is said to have come in for $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 of this business to date and more large orders are pending. Great Britain is taking large quantities of supplies here, but that country is not a buyer in a cash sense, payments being made through the workings of the trade balance exchange plan.

Arrange to Deport Chinese.

Washington, Oct. 31.—Immigration officials at Honolulu were instructed to arrange with the Japanese consul for deporation of the Chinese included among the crew of the German schooner Aeolus, who were landed after the vessel was captured by the Japanese battleship Hizen.

Russian-Turk Sea Fight On.

London, Nov. 2.—A dispatch to the Exchange Telegraph from Rome says: "It is reported from Constantinople that a battle between Turkish and Russian fleets is in progress off Odessa."

Endorse Congressional Blacklist.

Chicago, Nov. 2.—Two wrangling sessions of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association, which for a time threatened to disrupt the organization, ended with the adoption of a resolution indorsing the work of the congressional committee of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, of which Mrs. Medill McCormick is chairman, in issuing a blacklist of Congressional candidates opposed to equal suffrage. Action was accepted by friends of Mrs. McCormick as a victory over the administration.

MISS JULIA CALHOUN

© HARRIS & EWING

Miss Julia Calhoun, daughter of Col. and Mrs. John C. Calhoun of New York and great granddaughter of the famous American statesman of that name, is soon to marry Baron de Nagell, attache of the Netherlands legation at Washington. The baron has been in the diplomatic service for five years and has been popular in society at the national capital.

FORMER HEAD U. S. ARMY DIES

GENERAL CHAFFEE SUCCUMBS AT CALIFORNIA HOME.

Veteran of Civil War, Indian Fighter and Hero of Spanish Conflict—Advanced From Private in 1863.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 3.—Lieut. Gen. Adna R. Chaffee (retired), former chief of staff of the United States army, died at his home here. His body will be taken to Washington for interment in Arlington National cemetery.

General Chaffee had been suffering from typhoid pneumonia for a month.

Mrs. Chaffee and her daughter, Mrs. John Hastings Howard, wife of an army officer, were at the bedside when the end came. Two other children Mrs. George French Hamilton, wife of an army captain, and Adna R. Chaffee, Jr., a lieutenant in the army, are in the Philippines.

General Chaffee rose from the rank of private. He was wounded three times.

Enlisted in First Days of Civil War.

Washington.—Lieut. Gen. Adna Romanza Chaffee was one of four officers of his rank ni the United States army all of them being on the retired list. He enlisted as a private in Troop K Sixth Cavalry, soon after the civil war began, and during a career of more than forty years of distinguished service attained the highest rank, finally serving as chief of the general staff.

He fought throughout the civil war, winning a commission as second lieutenant in 1863, and later being brevetted lieutenant and captain for gallant and meritorious service.

Fought Indians in Southwest.

After the war he saw fighting against the Indians in Arizona and Texas and had risen to the rank of lieutenant colonel when, at the outbreak of the Spanish war, he was sent to Cuba as a brigadier general of volunteers. Going back to the regular establishment after attaining distinction, particularly in the Santiago campaign, he was made colonel of the Eighth Cavalry and three years later was promoted to the rank of major general.

Head of Army When Retired.

In 1904 General Chaffee became a lieutenant general, and he was serving as chief of staff when retired at his own request in 1906. He had lived at Los Angeles since that time.

General Chaffee was born at Orwell, Ohio, April 14, 1842. He was educated in the public schools of Ohio, and in 1875 married Miss Annie Frances Rockwell of Junction City, Kas.

Cholera Toll 100 Per Day.

Venice, Nov. 2.—Reports received here from Austia say cholera is inceasing to an alarming extent throughout Austrian-Hunflary and that there is not a single crown land in Austria and scarcely any in Hungary where fresh cases are not reported daily. The epidemic is said to be worst in Galicia, where about 100 deaths are said to occur daily among the troops in the field.

Schools Closed; Teachers Fight.

London, Nov. 2.—A dispatch from Amsterdam says the usual course of instruction in the schools of Germany cannot be continued, as 40,000 teachers are at the front.

Jurors Out Nine Days.

Scranton, Pa., Nov. 2.—Although they have been out for over nine days, members of the Pegram murder jury are still hopelessly deadlocked. John P. Thomas, the foreman, has sent a letter to Judge Edwards, who was on the bench at the trial, asking that the jurors be discharged as there was no possibility of an agreement. William Pegram, the negro defendant, was tried on a charge of murdering Mary Quinn, a white woman, twelve years ago.

The Ambition of Mark Truitt

By
HENRY RUSSELL MILLER

Author of
"THE MAN HIGHER UP," "HIS RISE TO POWER," Etc.

(Copyright, 1913, by The Bobbs-Merrill Company)

SYNOPSIS.

Mark Truitt, encouraged by his sweetheart, Unity Martin, leaves Bethel, his native town, to seek his fortune. Simon Truitt tells Mark that it long has been his dream to see a steel plant at Bethel and asks the son to return and build one if he ever gets rich. Mark applies to Thomas Henley, head of the Quinby Iron works, for a job and is sent to the construction gang. His success in that work wins him a place as helper to Roman Andzrejzski, open-hearth furnaceman. He becomes a boarder in Roman's home and assists Piotr, Roman's son, in his studies. Kazia, an adopted daughter, shows her gratitude in such a manner as to arouse Mark's interest in her. Heavy work in the intense heat of the furnace causes Mark to collapse and Kazia cares for him. Later Roman also succumbs and Mark gets his job. Roman resents this and tells Mark to find another boarding place.

CHAPTER X.

Wounded on the Field.

The accident was one that happened often. Occasionally, after a tap, water would be turned into the cinder pit that the cooling slag might harden and be broken without delay. Not seldom the water would be conveyed under the crust, come into contact with the still molten slag and be converted suddenly into steam. Then there would be an explosion. Men might be seriously injured, or even killed, which was very sad—but one of the hazards of the employment. It happened when Mark had been following his straight road ahead for more than five years.

Five years during which he had won success, substantial if not brilliant! The lack of brilliancy might have been disputed by those few who knew that sundry labor-saving devices installed in the Quinby mills during this period were of his invention.

When Henley heard of the accident he frowned; Henley detested accidents, which spoke of inefficiency somewhere. But when the information was added that the foreman of the open-hearth battery was among the injured, he said: "Damn!" and in person at once called the hospital and his own physician by telephone and through these agencies commandeered the best surgical skill and care for that valuable workman.

The doctors gathered in solemn conclave and did various things to Mark's shattered body. They dogged his steps into the very shadow of death and would not let him die. They did that, knowing they condemned him to a life of pain, and having the security of Thomas Henley's word that their bills should each and every one of them be paid.

While Mark still lingered in the vale of mystery that leads to full knowledge, two men began their daily—and nightly—watches. One was a thin faded man who wore the rusty black of the country preacher. The other was an awkward, gray little man who would sit motionless by the hour, never taking his eyes from the still form under the white sheet.

Mark did not die. His broken body began slowly to mend. He passed out of immediate danger; he was even allowed to talk and to be talked to a little. But in the manner of the nurses, of his visitors from Bethel, even of the calloused doctors, were a grave gentleness, an absence of the exultation to be expected after triumph over death. He felt it.

He put his question to his father. "What are they keeping back from me?"

Simon's glance did not waver, nor did he try to evade with a soothing lie. "Ye'll never walk easy again. Ye'll have to use a crutch, leastways a cane, always."

"It's my hip?"

"Yes."

"Is that all?"

"Ye were hurt innardly. Ye'll have to be careful always. No more work in the mills."

Mark closed his eyes, uttering no complaint. But within was a turmoil of protest and rebellion. A cripple, a partial invalid for life! Half a man! So had ended the dreamed campaign of conquest. Tears of futile rage seeped out through his closed eyelids.

His recovery was slow and very painful; six years of driving ahead at top speed had left him but little reserve vitality for the emergency. The mood of rebellion died down from sheer exhaustion. He accepted his misfortune; but sullenly, with no swelling heroic resolve to defy untoward circumstance.

There was no conscious desire to return to the mills from which he had been banished. They were too much the object of his smoldering resentment just then. He felt toward them as the betrayed toward the traitor.

"I think," he said once to Simon and Richard Courtney, who had not yet left the city, "I'll go back to Bethel."

"It will be a good place to recuperate," said the preacher.

"But I mean to stay."

"We shall be glad to have you back."

Thoughts of Bethel naturally revived the memory of Unity Martin. Mark found a certain grim humor in the recollection.

He had had his period of tragic remorse for Kazia. He had not, however, let conscience push to the extreme of disturbing the fixed desire just mentioned. Nor was he long in attaining a comparative peace of mind in which he could congratulate himself on having avoided a serious blunder. Not many months later he by chance met Piotr, who conveyed the news that Kazia had married Whiting. Piotr's manner of narration implied that, though Whiting was a poor refuge, Kazia had been fortunate to escape Mark. He seemed disappointed that his auditor showed no deep emotion.

Mark's letters to Unity had continued, at erratic intervals. Soon her replies, too, began to dwindle in number and in length; they had never had much to lose in the way of intensity. And then he sent a letter that she failed to answer at all, leaving their love affair suspended, so to speak, in the air. One of Simon's rare and misspelled missives informed Mark that she was, in the phrase Bethel used, keeping company with one Slocum, a prosperous young farmer of the vicinity. This may hardly be regarded as poetic retribution. It caused Mark a few days' surface indignation and a secret relief; one can not feel deeply the loss of a shadow, even though one has paid a price for her.

Kazia married; Unity, having jilted him, keeping company with plodding Bill Slocum! His tragedy had ended in sheer farce. We do well, he concluded, not to take our dramas too seriously.

* * * * * * *

An amazing thing happened one day. There was the sound of a quick unfamiliar tread in the corridor, the door was pushed briskly open and into the room stepped Thomas Henley.

"How are you, Truitt?" he inquired, shaking hands. "I was going by, had a few minutes and ran up to find out for myself."

"Well enough, I guess," Mark replied out of his amazement.

"Good!" said Henley. "Your father, I presume?" He nodded toward Simon.

Mark made the necessary introductions. Simon said: "Pleased to meet ye," and flushed for his son, who had had to own up to the relationship.

Toward the other visitor Henley glanced uncertainly a moment, then held out a hand.

"Ah! Doctor Courtney! Do you happen to remember me?" The question, obviously, was in playful irony.

"I happen to," answered Courtney, who did not share Simon's shyness.

"I remember now, it was you who sent this young man to me. I," said Henley graciously, "am in your debt."

The preacher's shadowy smile appeared. "Is he?"

Henley laughed pleasantly. "I fancy he is. And I have a notion the debt will grow. I am finishing your job, Doctor Courtney."

"I'm Going Back—Home."

He turned to Mark. Simon and Courtney pushed their chairs back from the bedside, that the great man might hold the stage.

"When," Henley asked, "do you expect to come back to us?"

Mark winced and returned to the sullenness that was becoming his habit. "I'm going back—home."

The pause and the slight emphasis on the last word were not lost on Henley; a suspicion as to their import stirred. But:

"Exactly right!" he exclaimed heartily. "Stay as long as necessary to get your strength together. You're too valuable a man to take chances. Your job will wait for you. By the way, about that new charging machine you spoke of before the accident; I suppose the plans aren't where we can lay our hands on them?"

"No," answered Mark, "you can't lay your hands on them. They're in my head."

"An excellent place to keep 'em," Henley agreed. "Suppose then, when you're feeling up to it, I send one of our engineers after you to go over the plans with you? If there's anything in the idea, we ought to install the machines before winter."

"You can send him, if you want to. But I won't go over the plans with him." Mark discouraged the suggestion.

Henley stiffened. "I'm not in the business of stealing inventions."

"I'll see that you don't steal this," Mark responded ungraciously. "Because, when you pay for it, you've got to pay for this, too." He put a hand on the injured hip. "That is, if I ever put the idea in shape."

Henley waved a hand to intimate that allowance must be made for an invalid's humors. "Of course, we expect you to be business-like. Just what do you mean by that 'if'?"

"I mean I'm through with the mills."

"Who," Henley's glance swept Simon and Richard Courtney sharply, "who has been putting fool ideas into your head?"

"You, for one, when you come here because I'm a valuable man, not because I'm a man. Would you come to see me if I hadn't a new invention in mind?"

"Nonsense! You're sick, that's all." Henley smiled kindly but confidently. "I've seen men in your case before. You think you won't come back. But you will. Why? Because you're a valuable man—I stick to that. You've a genius for mechanics, you know how to handle men and you've got a sense of organization. Most men would think themselves lucky if they had any one of those. What does it mean? That you fit in here, of course. And when a man fits into any kind of life, he can no more keep away than molten steel can avoid the shape of the mold. And—you'll find it so—there's something about our business that gets into the bone and blood of a man." He looked at his watch and rose abruptly. "Glad you're getting along. Don't forget, your job is waiting for you."

"But you don't seem to understand," Mark cried. "I'm done for. I'll have to go on a cane, maybe a crutch, all my life. And the doctors say, no hard work at all."

Henley could be very human, when he chose. "Ah!" he said gently. "I had not heard that. I'm sorry. It makes a difference, of course."

It is possible that Henley was not thinking of Mark's commercial value, as he stood looking searchingly down at the querulous patient.

Unexpectedly he leaned forward a little. From his eyes a commanding flash leaped. He put out a hand and caught one of Mark's strongly.

"Your brains don't need a crutch, do they? It isn't brute strength that makes you valuable—we can buy that cheap. You said something about being a man. Now's your chance to be one. What's a little thing like a crutch or a doctor's prohibition? The measure of a man is what he overcomes. Go home and rest, get your nerve together. And when you're ready, let me know. I'll find a place for you."

He was gone. And there was Mark, who had just been weakly if resentfully accepting defeat, athrill like a war-horse that has heard the bugle call.

CHAPTER XI.

The Measure of a Man.

When he met Unity again, he had been in Bethel for more than two weeks.

He had started out for the morning turn on his crutches, to test his returning strength, and before he quite realized it the village lay behind him. He swung along for some two hundred yards farther; then let himself carefully down on the roadside.

He sat there for a long time, baring his head to the summer sunshine.

"This is very good indeed!" It would have been almost flawless but for one thing—he was rather lonely; he felt the need for some one to share the day with him.

He had his wish. Down the valley road appeared a buggy drawn by a lazy heavy-footed horse of the sort distinguished as "safe for women." From within the buggy Mark caught the gleam of a white shirtwaist and a sailor hat. Even before the vehicle drew near enough for recognition, he knew the passenger for Unity.

A slight tremor passed over him. To meet the embodiment of a shadow by whom one has been jilted—or whom one has jilted?—is at least mildly exciting.

A slight tightening of the reins was sufficient to stop that horse.

"Hello, Unity!" Mark felt that this greeting fell short of the dramatic proprieties.

"Oh! How do you do?" she answered colorlessly.

There was a moment of silence during which, without seeming to do so, they inspected each other.

Mark had a twinge of disappointment. This was not the Unity he had loved so boyishly—and so briefly. She was as pretty as ever, in a way even prettier; but one could hardly have thought of her as spirituelle. Her face was fuller, its color deeper, and there was a healthy roundness in the line of shoulder and breast, of the ankle that protruded from under the dust-robe. Not that she was fat! But her daintiness was gone. In the item of dress she would have suffered from comparison with the young ladies of his boarding house. Her hair was done carelessly. And vivacity had gone the way of daintiness. She had the air of having settled into the habit of Bethel, of having accepted its narrow outlook. A faint vertical line between her eyes hinted that she might not have accepted it with complacency.

Therefore he said: "You look the same as ever, Unity."

She brightened a little. "You think so?" There was something almost pitiful to him in the way she caught at the remark. She became spiritless again. "But, of course, that isn't true."

"But, of course, it is."

She laughed unpleasantly. "You wouldn't think so, if you saw the way they treat me here now."

"The men? Surely not!"

She shrugged her shoulders. "No. The women. They're friendly now and they don't giggle behind my back. And when they haven't anything else to gossip about, they talk about how I'm settling into an old maid."

"Isn't that what the rhetorics used to call hyperbole? It should be sparingly used. Besides I hear you have a beau."

"Oh! him!" With another shrug. "He's afraid I'm not a good cook."

"That's a nice way to talk about a lover! Especially," he laughed self-consciously, "since you threw me over for him."

He almost missed the acid look she flashed at him. "It broke your heart, of course!"

"I've had pleasanter experiences," he said dryly. "Why didn't you answer my last letter, Unity?"

Her indifference might have been a little too well done. "For one thing, even I have a little pride. It was easy to see you'd got tired of me. Not that I cared! Those boy-and-girl affairs always die a natural death. There was another girl, wasn't there?"

He Was Still Resting on His Grassy Bank When the Slow-Going Vehicle Reappeard.

"Why, I believe so. In fact, there was. I gave her up for you."

"And I gave you up. You must have thought," again her unpleasant laugh rang, "you'd made a poor bargain all round. Or had a lucky escape!"

"I did," he answered grimly, leaving her to construe the answer as she chose.

"That's an easy conundrum." She gathered up the reins. "Well, I must be going. We're harvesting now and I have to get back in time to help get dinner. Good-by."

She drove on, as casually as if they had been neighbors in the habit of meeting daily. . . . And this was their first meeting after six years.

He leaned back on his grassy bank, having found, if not a companion, at least food for reflection.

He was still resting on his grassy bank when, an hour later, the slow-going vehicle reappeared. With difficulty—for he had not yet become expert wtih his crutches—he rose and stood in the middle of the road. The horse, without urging, stopped with its nose against him. A more skilled observer than Mark might have noticed that some villager's mirror and comb had been utilized to the advantage of Unity's hair and that her hat had been readjusted to its most becoming angle; and would have drawn certain inferences.

Mark did not. He merely smiled at her over the horse's head.

She seemed rather impatient with his obstructiveness. "You've bought the pike, then? I hadn't heard."

He laughed and waved his hand airily. "This morning the world is mine. Do you know, we haven't shaken hands?"

"Oh, haven't we?" Her tone attached no importance to the omission.

Nevertheless, when he stood aside, she drove the horse forward a length and laid a limp hand in Mark's.

"Also," he continued, "you haven't said you're sorry that I was hurt."

"Oh!" she repeated, with perfunctoriness unrelieved, "I'm sorry."

He laughed again. "You needn't mind now. You'll have plenty of chances before long."

"Meaning?"

"The road to your house is still open to the public, isn't it? I'm thinking of buying a new horse. Unity," he returned to gravity, "there isn't any reason why we shouldn't be good friends, is there?"

"People will talk."

He paraphrased a classic formula. "Unity," he said earnestly, "drat the people!"

"You can say that. You don't have to stay here."

"But I'm going to stay here."

"Not for good?"

"For good."

"Why?"

Mark laughed shortly. "When you're put out of the race, you don't want to stay where you have to watch the others still running."

She inspected him again, more closely. He thought he was sincere. But he did not know that despite the crutches and his drawn white face he had not the resigned dispirited air of the man who has accepted a permanent seat on the shelf.

"Look as long as you want to," he suggested at last. "In the meantime—will you set the dogs on me when I drive down your way?"

"Oh, well!" She tried unsuccessfully to return to indifference. "If you really want to come—! It's been a dull season. I suppose it would be a mercy to the gossips to give their tongues a chance to clack once more." She drew the reins taut.

"A real philanthropy," he assented, grinning, as the horse lumberingly resumed its journey.

Mark swung slowly along homeward. He smiled pityingly. He had read aright the new interest in Unity's face—that of the condemned prisoner who has heard rumor of reprieve. He was sorry for her. And pity—we have it from the poets—is love's poor relation.

Mark regained a measure of strength. He discarded one crutch and began each day to take a few steps experimentally with no support but a cane. He spent many beautiful idle hours, alone or with Richard Courtney, driving his new horse among the hills.

Sometimes—often—Unity was with him on these drives. Tongues clacked according to prophecy. But Mark did not care. And Unity did not care.

Mark fell placidly and easily in love with Unity again. At least, the while protesting, he decided that it must be love.

But the protest was half-hearted. He wanted to love.

"Are ye goin' to stay here in Bethel?" Simon broke a long silence to inquire, one rainy evening.

"I don't know," Mark answered out of a brown study, off his guard. But he added quickly: "Yes, I do know. I'm going to stay."

"Then, what are ye goin' to do?"

"I don't need to do anything. I've got twenty thousand dollars. That'll last me—in Bethel."

Simon shook his head gravely. "Ye can't stand that. Ye've got to do somethin'. An' there's nothin' to do here—yet."

"And never will be."

"Mebby not. All the more reason why that Mister Henley's right."

"Would you have me go back to the city?"

"Yes."

"You don't know what you're saying," Mark began irritably. "I could never take a pen pusher's job. The mills are all I know. And that life—you don't know it. It costs too much. It takes it out of you, drives you like a slave. It—I'm not fit for it now. It—oh, let's not talk about it."

But Simon had more than one of Mark's problems on his mind.

"Are ye," he went on, "goin' to marry Unity Martin?"

"I don't know. I suppose so."

"If ye don't find out purty soon," remarked Simon most surprisingly, "she'll do your knowin' fur ye. I wouldn't."

Mark stopped at a window, looking frowningly out at the sheets of rain that dashed across the square of light.

Simon must have felt deeply on the subject, for he repeated, "I wouldn't."

"No," said Mark testily, "I suppose you wouldn't. I don't know. But if I do it, it will be with my eyes open." Which seems a most unlover-like saying.

There was an evening when he was alone with Unity on Squire Martin's front porch. It was one of the soft languorous nights that sometimes come to Bethel in early September. They talked little and that in low tones.

Once he leaned toward her. He had to peer closely to make out her look of content.

"Do you know," he remarked, "you ought to be glad I came back?"

"Indeed! And why?"

"Have you looked in the mirror lately? When I first came you looked—well, cranky and as though you didn't care whether school kept or not."

"Well, of all the conceit! I suppose you take all the credit." Thus she admitted certain improvements.

"And why not?" he laughed lazily. "When you come right down to it, Unity, you never really, definitely threw me over."

"It isn't too late."

"Yes, it is too late."

She said nothing. But when he reached up to take her hand he found it a tightly clenched little ball.

"Unity, do you remember the drive we took that Sunday before I went to the city?"

"I think I do."

"She thinks she does!" he apostrophized the night. "I have a scheme. Tomorrow, right after dinner, I'm going to drive down here for you. Unity, let's have the Sunday over again—in every particular."

Again she was silent.

"You don't agree?"

"I—I'm not sure."

"That you love me?"

She shook her head. "That I want to marry you."

But when he drew her down and kissed her, she did not resist. "Wait," he whispered fatuously, "until tomorrow. Then you will be convinced." Although what virtue the morrow would hold he did not say. He probably did not guess.

Unity did not scruple to change the current of another's life; she saw no occasion for scruples. She thought she loved Mark. But she did not believe his expressed resolve to stay in Bethel was, could be, genuine; or, if genuine, that its execution would be good for him. And, principally—she knew exactly what she wanted.

Next day they drove over much the same road they had taken seven years before. They chatted in lighter vein, with intervals of eloquent silence. On a hilltop whence they could see only other hills and the sinking sun they ate the lunch put up by the thoughtful Susan. Then they waited to watch the sunset.

"Unity, what must I do to convince you?"

"Nothing," she murmured.

He considered his happiness.

And after a while she said: "Tell me about your life in the city. You've never said much about it."

Innocent demand! Not in vain is the trap set in the sight of a young man in love. He began to describe the mills to her. And as he went on, into his words crept the unconscious eloquence of a real enthusiasm. His face became eager. Before he had ended he was on his feet declaiming to her, who was a very attentive audience. He saw what he described.

"Ah!" she breathed, as he reached a period. "What a life! And you could leave it?"

"You forget," he reminded her, "I was put out of it."

She leaned forward suddenly, resting her hand on the one that held the cane. "Mark, why don't you go back to it?"

He jerked his hand free, as if he had felt a twinge of pain. "Don't suggest that, Unity!" he cried. "There's that other side. It's hard and cruel and narrowing. It eats up all the best of you. Sometimes it kills you. It makes you a machine, not your own man. I used to feel it when I was there, sometimes terribly. Here I see it from a distance and I understand better. It's just one hellish scramble, that life—" He stopped abruptly, with an impatient gesture.

"If I go back, Unity, you won't—"

But how could he phrase his fear or interpret the hot surging that drowned it?

She sighed happily.

He was soon to learn.

A man and a woman entered into the most trying of human relations. Both were young, but both had hardened in the pursuit of selfish desire. Neither had the love that finds its chief joy in yielding.

CHAPTER XII.

A Man and His Wife.

In the down-town offices of the Quinby company and in the particular room which may be called the headquarters of the Quinby army, two men were sitting late one winter afternoon. The one was Henley himself, now chairman of the company, a bit stouter than when we first met him twelve years ago, his arrogance a little less evident in manner albeit time had not altered the fact. The other was a youngish man whose thin bony face and hands and streaks of premature gray hair spoke of physical frailty.

It was common knowledge in the Quinby company that no one was more welcome in Henley's office than the young superintendent whom the master's influence had put in command of the big new open-hearth plant. It was even suspected that Henley had taken Truitt in with him in his speculations.

At the end of a long discussion of company affairs Henley pressed a button. His secretary appeared from the adjoining office.

"Bring in the light and heat account."

The secretary returned with the account of the latest successful speculation. Henley gave it a rapid glance and handed it to Mark. The latter studied it carefully, questioned certain items, questioned the explanation and finally accepted them. Henley smiled again. He knew men who would have hesitated to question his accounts. Everything he knew of Truitt he liked.

At the Door a Crippled Beggar Accosted Them.

"Make out Mr. Truitt's check," he directed the secretary, who withdrew and promptly returned.

Henley signed the check and delivered it to Mark. The latter receipted the accompanying voucher.

"I've another thing in mind," Henley suggested. "Care to go in?"

Mark hesitated, his brow suddenly wrinkling. "I think not," he said at last. The note of irritation did not escape Henley. "I've my eye on a new house."

"I thought you were pretty comfortably fixed."

Mark shrugged his shoulders. "It seems the neighborhood leaves something to be desired."

"Yes? I see." Henley indicated Mark's heavy furred overcoat, "you're driving out. You can take me home—unless you're in a hurry to reach that delinquent neighborhood?"

A quarter of an hour later the two men emerged from the corridor of the Quinby building. At the door a crippled beggar accosted them. Henley ignored him. Mark slyly gave him a coin.

A beautifully matched team of blacks, harnessed to a light sleigh awaited him. Evidently Mark had not forgotten his early knowledge of horse flesh. Only a man whom fortune had kissed could have afforded such horses. For Mark—with his "leg and a half"—they were hardly an extravagance, almost a necessity.

Election is over, the people have spoken. Now let us have peace.

With the war in Europe as it is to-day, and prospects for it to continue, we think the small farmer had better hold onto his grain until spring, for prices are sure to advance.

We always dread a campaign, with that same kind of a dread, that a rheumatic has for winter. It is all right to talk about the newspapers' harvest, but we don't care for that kind of a harvest, and we always feel after it is all over, like a fellow who comes home from a 4th of July celebration, and swears that he will never attend another one.

The investigation of some of the county officers' records has led us to the conclusion that a law should be passed by the next legislature fixing the fee of county officers, either by a direct law, or a law giving the County Commissioners authority to fix a certain salary, and then have all county officials turn all the fees collected by them into the county treasury. This would prevent county officers from charging excessive fees and pocketing the money.

We have for sale one of the best quarter sections of land in the town of Highlanding, located one mile south of Highlanding, Creamery. This farm will be sold cheap as the owner is a non resident and desires to use the money invested in other business. For terms and full particulars call on W. G. Hunt, Sunbeam, Minn.

Bows In Warfare.

The bow is first seen depicted on Egyptian monuments about 2000 B. C. Its form then did not differ greatly from that in use among boys at the present day. It was used in European warfare as late as 1640 and was deemed quite as effective as the arquebus then employed.

White Crowned Sparrows.

Caterpillars, beetles, ants, wasps, bugs and black olive scales make up only a small amount of the food of the white crowned sparrow. Like most of its family, it is a seed eater by preference, and weed seeds comprise about 75 per cent of its total foods.

So It May.

She was a beautiful woman—and his wife. But one night, getting home late and having some excited conversation with her in the hall, he said to himself:

"A thing of beauty may be a jaw forever."

TRY THIS FOR YOUR COUGH

Thousands of people keep coughing because unable to get the right remedy. Coughs are caused by Inflammation of Throat and Bronchial Tubes. What you need is to soothe this Inflammation. Take Dr. King's New Discovery, it penetrates the delicate mucous lining, raises the Phlegm and quickly relieves the congested membranes. Get a 50c. bottle from your druggist. "Dr. King's New Discovery quickly and completely stopped my cough" writes J. R. Watts, Floydale, Texas. Money back if not satisfied, but it nearly always helps —adv.

AN ACTIVE LIVER MEANS HEALTH.

If you want good health, a clear complexion and freedom from Dizziness, Constipation, Biliousness, Headaches and Indigestion, take Dr. King's New Life Pills. They drive out fermenting and undigested foods, clear the Blood and cure Constipation. Only 25c. at your druggist.—adv.

IT REALLY DOES RELIEVE RHEUMATISM.

Everybody who is afflicted with Rheumatism in any form should by all means keep a bottle of Sloan's Liniment on hand. The minute you feel pain or soreness in a joint or muscle, bathe it with Sloan's Liniment. Do not rub it. Sloan's penetrates almost immediately right to the seat of pain, relieving the hot, tender, swollen feeling and making the part easy and comfortable. Get a bottle of Sloan's Liniment for 25 cents of any druggist and have it in the house—against colds, sore and swollen joints, rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica and like ailments. Your money back if not satisfied, but it does give almost instant relief.—adv.

DON'T DELAY TREATING YOUR COUGH.

A slight cough often becomes serious, Lungs get congested, Bronchial Tubes fill with mucous. Your vitality is reduced. You need Dr. Bell's Pine-Tar-Honey. It soothes your irritated air passages; loosens mucous and makes your system resist Colds. Give the Baby and Children Dr. Bell's Pine-Tar-Honey. It's guaranteed to help them. Only 25c. at your Druggist.—adv.

We Do It on the Fourth.

It is curious that the Fourth of July has become the American day of celebration, since it was on July 2 that congress passed the really important motion for independence, and the Fourth only saw the adoption of the Declaration. John Adams wrote to his wife: "The 2d day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations from one end of this continent to the other from this time forward for evermore." But they do it on the Fourth.—London Chronicle.

How Loch Awe Was Formed.

Highland tradition gives a quaint explanation of the creation of Loch Awe, that noble mirror of the mountains in the magnificent scenery of Argyllshire. The bed of the loch was once, it is said, a fertile valley, with a fairy spring, which had always to be kept covered, bubbling from the mountain side. A careless girl, however, having drawn water, forgot to recover the well. All through the night the spring flowed, and by the morning Loch Awe had come into being. No one need regret the carelessness of that highland lassie. Loch Awe is now one of the most exquisite of beauty spots in Great Britain—a charming sheet of water, studded with pretty islands, while around the shores are many places associated with interesting legends and historic incidents of the highlands.—London Answers.

A Roundabout Reply.

Cause For Suspicion.

A mother who frequently went out to spend the day with her friends had been accompanied always by her seven-year-old son. One evening on returning home very much bored with the day's experiences, he said to her:

ANCIENT FOOTWEAR.

And the Old Ceremony of Baring the Feet at Worship.

The India Hindus and Mussulmans alike wear both sandals and shoes (slippers) and the latter boots also. The sandal (the word is Persian) was evidently the original covering for the feet over all southern and eastern Asia, while the shoe was probably introduced into India by the Persians, Afghans and Mongols, together with the "tip tilted" (Hittite and Etruscan) boot. Both are usually made in India of leather, but never of pigskin, and, while the shoes are always colored red or yellow, the boots are generally brightly particolored, both among the upper classes being also richly embroidered in gold and silver and variegated silk thread and with bangles, bugles and seed pearls after the manner of the ancient Persian boots represented on Greek vases.

But, of however rare and costly elaboration, the invariable rule is to remove them after entering a private house just when stepping on to the mat or carpet on which the visitor takes his seat. They must be cast off, the right boot or shoe first, before the worshiper enters a temple or mosque, and it is still regarded as an absolute profanation to attempt to enter either fully shod.—Westminster Gazette.

Kid Gloves.

The majority of the fine kid gloves used in this country are imported from France. The superiority of French kid gloves over all others, according to an importer, is due above all to the perfection of the skins, the kids being reared in villages by poor peasants who own only a few goats and therefore take great care of them.

Another reason is that in France one workman takes the prepared skin and manipulates it himself right up to the finished glove. In Germany, on the contrary, division of labor is extensive and great factories turn out in two or three hours what requires two days' labor on the part of the French workman.

The best kid gloves still come from France, but the factories of Stuttgart are a formidable rival.—New York

DALLES OF THE ST. CROIX.

Its Quaintly Shaped Rocks Formed by Plunging Waters.

At Taylors Falls, the terminus of the Taylors Falls branch of the Northern Pacific railway, the dalles of the St. Croix form a most interesting feature. The St. Croix river here tumbles over a bed of trap rock. The theory of its production is that a great outburst of lava was overwhelmed by a glacier. This very hard rock has been weathered into a great many quaint and curious shapes, and the vertical cliffs of from one to three hundred feet in height form a little canyon where the water is very deep.

Among the quaintly shaped rocks are the Devil's chair and Pulpit rock, in proximity to each other. These are on the Minnesota side of the river, and the trains pass beside them. On the Wisconsin side of the river is a remarkable profile rock. It is known as "the Old Man of the Dalles" and has a resemblance to the profile of George Washington. Minnesota and Wisconsin have set aside the land bordering the river as an international park.

Among the interesting features of the place are the cistern-like holes, known geologically as potholes. These range from one and one-half feet in diameter and six feet in depth to ten feet in diameter and ninety or a hundred feet deep. These potholes indicate the presence of former rapids high above the present surface of the water. The stream by its great eroding power and carrying pebbles and stones in its circular movement slowly excavated these potholes.—Exchange.

The British Crown.

The present crown of the English king was originally made for Queen Victoria at her coronation in 1838. The principal jewels were taken from older crowns. The most noted stone is the great ruby which was given to the Black Prince by Peter the Cruel after the battle of Navarette in 1367. It was also worn by Henry V. in the crown encircling his helmet at the battle of Agincourt in 1415.—Philadelphia Press.

THE LOCAL NEWS

Joseph LaCounte is reported to be seriously ill.

This is certainly fine Indian summer weather that we are having now.

The Deer Park Young Peoples' Society will meet at O.M.Mandt's place Nov. 8th. All are welcome.

We would have liked to glance over Adolph Eberhart's shoulder last Tuesday, when he voted for Lee.

There was a heavy rain storm last Tuesday, which made the county vote comparatively light, compared to what it would have been, if the weather had been fair. However quite a number of candidates got "snowed under."

The Eleven Towns certainly got a large amount of political advertising, in fact they got so much of it for one of the candidates, that he ought to be entitled to wholesale rates, in view of the fact that the advertising was more famous for extensiveness than effect.

We drove over to the new Mayfield church last Sunday afternoon, in which dedication services were being held. This is one of the finest churches in eastern Pennington county, it is certainly a credit to the builders and the thriving people of that locality.

One of the candidates for county office got so badly "rattled" that he thought he was running against Hunt, instead of his opponent. We were not a candidate for any office, but was busy breaking mosskeg on our farm at Sunbeam, and occasionally "sawing a little wood."

We enjoyed a pleasant trip to Erie on last Friday evening, and heard a good speech delivered by G. Halvorson of Thief River Falls, although Hammond won in the state, he did not win in this county, and such speakers as G. Halvorson helped to secure the majority for Lee.

The Highlanding post-office has been discontinued for the time being, and it now looks as if the development of this part of the country was to be seriously retarded by the mail service. There is now no post-office left on the north side of the river between Kratka and Erie. The people have been placed out in the wilderness, by the slick work of unprincipaled post masters, who are working for their private gain. The same conditions, and worse exist regarding the people of Mayfield township, and you can just as well sit down and whistle, as to petition the post-office department, as Singers are the post office department for eastern Pennington County at the present time.

ELECTION RETURNS

Up to the time of going to press, we have the following election returns:

Governor W. S. Hammond, with the balance of the state ticket Republican.
State Senator D. P. O'Neill.
Representative Oscar Stenvick.
County Auditor T. P. Anderson.
County Attorney H. O. Kjomme.
County Treasurer Theodore Liden.
Judge of Probate Wm. Michelet.
Sheriff W. J. LaBree.
Superintendent of Schools E. A. Mostue.
P. C. Wold, and A. B. Mandt, were re-elected as County Commissioners.

A Kipling Anecdote.

The old postman at Westward Ho, near Bideford, in Devon, and the scene of "Stalky & Co.," is reported in T. P.'s London Weekly as telling an interesting anecdote of Rudyard Kipling, dating from the time when Kipling himself was a boy at school at Westward Ho. It appears that Beckwith, the aquatic expert, came to Westward Ho to give an exhibition from the pier, which was crowded with the usual summer sightseers and a fair sprinkling of boys from the school. After some evolutions in the water the swimmer commenced a series of diving performances, and it was after a sensational dive from the top of the pier that the spectators were amazed to see a chubby, stocky boy run to the edge of the pier and repeat the dive with all the mannerisms of the expert. Inquiry elicited the fact that the boy was named Kipling, and it is by this incident more than any other that the Bideford people remember the now famous author.

Size of the Sea.

An officer of a liner once remarked that most men seemed to be as ignorant about the size of the sea as they are of the distance between the heavenly planets. Here are a few facts: The Pacific covers 08,000,000 miles, the Atlantic 30,000,000 and the Indian ocean, Arctic and Antarctic 42,000,000 To stow away the contents of the Pacific it would be necessary to fill a tank one mile long, one mile wide and one mile deep every day for 440 years. Put in figures the Pacific holds in weight 948,000,000,000,000,000,000 tons. The Atlantic averages a depth of not quite three miles. Its waters weigh 325,000,000,000,000,000,000 tons, and a tank to contain it would have each of its sides forty-three miles long. The figures of the other oceans are in the same startling proportions. It would take all the sea water in the world 2,000,000 years to flow over Niagara.

The Man or the Gun?

The man rather than the gun is a nation's military asset, asserts H. G. Wells, whose essay on "The Common Sense of Warfare" is included in his book, "Social Forces in England and America." "Every penny," he says, "we divert from national wealth making to national weapons means so much less in resources, so much more strain in the years ahead. But a great system of laboratories and experimental stations, a systematic industrious increase of men of the officer-aviator type, of the research student type, of the engineer type, of the naval officer type, of the skilled sergeant instructor type, a methodical development of a common sentiment and a common zeal among such a body of men, is an added strength that grows greater from the moment you call it into being."

A soaring scavenger soon spied it and swooped down for a feast.

Seizing the fish in his talons the voracious bird flapped its great wings and screamed greedily as he tried to make off with his find.

But the fish was too heavy to be lifted. The only result of repeated attempts was that the fish began to slide toward the water and soon fell in with a splash.

Diving after it, the gull brought it to the surface, and then began a curious spectacle. Time after time the gull hoisted the fish as high as his strength would permit, only to weaken and let the fish fall again. The noise attracted other gulls and a battle ensued. First one gull and then another would dive for the fish, lift it part way above the water's surface and be set upon by other gulls until the fish slipped back, a sacrifice to jealousy and greed.

For almost an hour this struggle lasted, ending only when all the gulls were tired out. The prize was lost.

A fraction of the energy thus spent in scrapping over an object too big to handle would have secured for each gull an ample meal of smaller fish, with which the lake abounded.

Or, a little co-operation, instead of so much crazy competition, would have lifted the fish to a safe place on dry land, where all the gulls could have feasted at their leisure.

But they were only gulls; hungry, unthinking, gluttonous gulls.

Of course, men would have known better. Yes?—Cleveland Press

The Hunter and the Wind.

In hunting against the wind in open forests more game is passed than many hunters would suppose. The animals see the man, note that he will pass them and hide by getting as near to the ground as possible. If they scent him after he has passed they evidently realize that the danger is over, though some, mostly the younger, inexperienced animals, then sneak off. Where game is very wild it is often in such localities as I have mentioned only possible to approach them with the wind by outdistancing the latter, because a big game animal at rest depends on its nose to save it from danger in the direction from which the wind comes and on its eyes to watch the side from which it can get no other warning.—"Track and Tracking," by Josef Brunner.

Worth of Icelandic Ponies.

Icelandic ponies aroused the admiration of the great traveler, Mme. Ida Pfeiffer. "In spite of scanty food," she wrote, "they have marvelous powers of endurance. They can travel from thirty-five to forty miles per diem for several consecutive days. They know by instinct the dangerous spots in the stormy wastes and in the moors and swamps. On approaching these places they bend their heads toward the earth and look sharply around on all sides. If they cannot discover a firm resting place for their feet they stop at once and cannot be urged forward without many blows."

First Titled Doctor.

The title of doctor was invented for the especial benefit of the learned Inernius of the twelfth century. The title was conferred by the University of Bologna. The first doctor of medicine was William Gordenio, who received the title from the college at Asti in 1329.

We Do It on the Fourth.

It is curious that the Fourth of July has become the American day of celebration, since it was on July 2 that congress passed the really important motion for independence, and the Fourth only saw the adoption of the Declaration. John Adams wrote to his wife: "The 2d day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations from one end of this continent to the other from this time forward for evermore." But they do it on the Fourth.—London Chronicle.

How Loch Awe Was Formed.

Highland tradition gives a quaint explanation of the creation of Loch Awe, that noble mirror of the mountains in the magnificent scenery of Argyllshire. The bed of the loch was once, it is said, a fertile valley, with a fairy spring, which had always to be kept covered, bubbling from the mountain side. A careless girl, however, having drawn water, forgot to recover the well. All through the night the spring flowed, and by the morning Loch Awe had come into being. No one need regret the carelessness of that highland lassie. Loch Awe is now one of the most exquisite of beauty spots in Great Britain—a charming sheet of water, studded with pretty islands, while around the shores are many places associated with interesting legends and historic incidents of the highlands.—London Answers.

THE CHARM OF MOTHERHOOD

Enhanced By Perfect Physical Health.

The experience of Motherhood is a trying one to most women and marks distinctly an epoch in their lives. Not one woman in a hundred is prepared or understands how to properly care for herself. Of course nearly every woman nowadays has medical treatment at such times, but many approach the experience with an organism unfitted for the trial of strength, and when it is over her system has received a shock from which it is hard to recover. Following right upon this comes the nervous strain of caring for the child, and a distinct change in the mother results.

There is nothing more charming than a happy and healthy mother of children, and indeed child-birth under the right conditions need be no hazard to health or beauty. The unexplainable thing is that, with all the evidence of shattered nerves and broken health resulting from an unprepared condition, and with ample time in which to prepare, women will persist in going blindly to the trial.

Every woman at this time should rely upon Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, a most valuable tonic and invigorator of the female organism.

LYDIA E PINKHAM

In many homes once childless there are now children because of the fact that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound makes women normal, healthy and strong.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

COUNT VICTORY FOR MARIA

Mr. Jollyboy's Better Half Met His Intended Humor With Overwhelming Counter-Stroke.

"Maria!" said Mr. Jollyboy, very solemnly, thinking to take a rise out of the wife of his bosom. "I heard of a dreadful operation which was undergone by a girl. She seemed in danger of losing her sight, and the clever ophthalmic surgeon who operated on her found—"

"Yes!" breathlessly interposed Mrs. Jollyboy; "found what?"

"That the poor girl had a young man in her eye!" rejoined hubby, with a chuckle.

Silence reigned supreme for the space of five minutes, at the end of which time Mrs. Jollyboy said quietly:

"Well, of course, it would all depend on what kind of a young man it was, as there are many men she would have been able to see through!" And, with a serene smile, Mrs. J. resumed her knitting, leaving the enemy completely routed.—London Answers.

How the Minister Is Treated.

PRESSED HARD.

Coffee's Weight on Old Age.

When people realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are usually glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

"My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker, had been troubled with her heart for a number of years and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making a visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat unusual flavour of the 'coffee' and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum.

"I was so pleased with it that, after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal. The whole family were so well pleased with it that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart, and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was well and hearty.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but not in so marked a degree as in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

BOOSTERS OF GOOD ROADS TO GATHER

WILL MEET IN FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION IN ST. PAUL, NOV. 16 AND 17.

NATION'S EXPERTS TO SPEAK

Aim Is to Educate People to Need of Better Highways and to Teach Public How to Go About Securing the Same.

St. Paul.—The first annual convention of the Minnesota Good Roads Federation will be held here Nov. 16-17.

Members of the federation, which is the Minnesota division of the National Highway Association, are delegates to the convention. In addition to these the governor is appointing delegates at large from over the state, selecting members of commercial boards, members of farmers' clubs and civic organizations. Commercial clubs are invited to send delegates and the convention promises to be very successful in securing the co-operation of the good roads boosters of Minnesota.

Many Good Speakers.

Speakers of national reputation have been secured and the program contains men who have for many years been interested in the campaign for better highways.

The officers of the Minnesota Good Roads Federation for the present year are: M. J. Dowling of Olivia, president; Alvah Eastman of St. Cloud, vice president; Roe Chase of Anoka, secretary-treasurer, and George M. Davis of St. Paul, state director.

The Official Call.

The following is the official call for the convention:

This association was organized for the purpose of engendering enthusiasm for and interest in the betterment of the public streets and highways of our state. Its aim is the education of the people of the state to know just what sort of road improvement is needed and just how to go about the securing of the improvement in the most expeditious and economical way.

Wise, equitable and uniform road legislation, the total elimination of politics from our road construction, the introduction of skilled supervision and the equitable distribution of road funds where most needed are among the aims of this federation.

In past years many thousands of dollars have been wasted through faulty methods, improper supervision, political juggling and indifference upon the part of the taxpayer as to the ultimate destination of the money which he pays for road building purposes.

Aim of Association.

This association aims to educate through literature from the highest road building authority in the country; to concentrate the good roads enthusiasm found in all parts of our state so that by co-operation the energies of the individual may be made effective; and to participate actively in the work of affiliating and promoting the widely differing ideas, plans and requirements of the various good roads associations of the state.

This year is pivotal in the road building history of the state. From now on we must build for the future as well as the present; we must husband our resources, and make every dollar count so that the close of each succeeding year will mark a distinct increase in our permanent good roads mileage and show to the taxpayer that his money is being well spent.

When such confidence is once inspired among the people of Minnesota then the means for road improvements will come rapidly and willingly to hand.

Must Be Successful.

It is highly important that this first convention of the Minnesota Good Roads Federation be an emphatic success, both in point of attendance and in point of enthusiasm in order to show to the people of Minnesota that hereafter a concrete, cohesive force of public-spirited men is solidly back of the campaign for better highways.

Every member of the association is a qualified delegate to the convention. Delegates from commercial clubs, farmers' clubs, good road associations, civic clubs, automobile clubs and from the state at large have been appointed and these will make up the body of the convention. Good roads enthusiasts from any part of the state may participate in the convention by making application for membership in the Minnesota Good Roads Federation to the secretary at any time previous to the meeting or at the state headquarters during the convention at St. Paul.

M. J. DOWLING,
President.
ROE CHASE,
Secretary.

Thieves Set Fire to Store.

Albert Lea.—Had not a sprinkling system been recently installed in the big department store of Skinner Chamberlain & Co., the principal business block in Albert Lea would probably have been destroyed by fire. The fire originated in the clothing department under the elevator shaft. The heat opened the water stations and kept the fire confined to the first story until the fire department arrived. Upon examination it was found that the store had been robbed of fur coats, clothing, hats, etc. Entrance was made by cutting a screen window in the alleyway. It is thought the thieves dropped a lighted match in the clothing.

Son Slain; Another in Prison.

Winona.—A letter received in Winona by Mrs. Fred Ribs from her sister, Mrs. A. Zaffka of Hamburg, depicted the inroads of war upon the German homes. One son, a nephew of the Winona woman, fell in the conflict while another is held as a French prisoner. "We are in deep sorrow," the letter read. "The people everywhere are making sacrifices for the soldiers. Auto and trainloads of provisions are being carried to the fronts of Russia and France daily."

THREE COMBINED MURDERS

Minneapolis Has Plethora of Dual Tragedies—War Seen as Cause of Epidemic.

Minneapolis.—Three dual or combined murders and suicides in Minneapolis within three weeks. Two Monday and the third Oct. 5.

It may be a problem for psychologists. Could it be considered an epidemic of murder-suicides, or does the atmosphere of bloodshed in Europe have something to do with it? Perhaps it is both.

Oct. 5 Roy Rogers shot and killed his wife as she was walking toward home near Grant street and Vine place. He shot himself and died on the way to the city hospital.

Monday morning Ignatz Sniadeski shot and killed his wife, Sophie, in their house, then killed himself.

Monday night a girl whose given name probably is Hazel was shot and killed by a man who then killed himself. The police haven't found out what Hazel's surname is. The man who shot her was C. E. Stanley, judging from the name written on his linen. It happened in Stanley's room at a hotel.

When the police arrived about 10 minutes after the shots were heard they found the keyhole of Stanley's room stuffed with paper wads. The key was in the keyhole. When they broke into the room they found the girl's body near the door. Apparently she tried to escape before the shot stopped her. Stanley's body was on the other side of a bed.

INMATES MOST ALL MARRIED

Willmar State Hospital Gives Interesting Data and Figures on Farm for Inebriates.

St. Paul.—Married people are more addicted to the liquor habit than unmarried ones, according to a bulletin issued by the state board of control describing the state hospital for inebriates at Willmar.

In the 18 months since the farm was started there have been 112 married patients admitted; single, 83; widowed, 14; separated, 3, and divorced, 15. Of the female patients 21 were married. All acknowledged a good education. Fourteen had attended the university. Most of the patients were over 21 years old. The majority of those registered admitted they formed the liquor habit when under 20 years old. Bad associates were held to be responsible by 160 patients. The steady drinkers numbered 130 and the periodical drinkers 76.

Contrary to the claims of some who contend that insobriety is hereditary, 104 patients furnished records to show their parents were abstemious.

Of laborers there were 50 at the farm; farmers, 21; clerks, 14, and painters, 11. Only four barkeepers and two saloonkeepers were listed. On the women's side of the house 24 housewives were registered.

ESCAPES SERVICE IN WAR

Swedish Seamon In Little Falls Tells of Service on German and British Ships.

Little Falls.—O. F. Lindquist, a Swedish sailor, told on his arrival in Little Falls, of how he had escaped first from a German and later from a British vessel shortly after the outbreak of the war.

While he was quartermaster of the German boat it was chased by British cruisers off the coast of South America, but evaded them and got safely into Pernambuco, Brazil There the German ship prepared to take on reservists for the Germany army and he was refused permission to leave the boat. He appealed to the Swedish consul, who obtained his release.

He wished to reach the United States and signed on a British boat, which also was carrying reservists from Rio de Janeiro to Liverpool, intending to desert when the ship touched at Newport, R. I. He injured his hand, however, and was put ashore at Newport to receive treatment and his ship sailed without him.

Winona Entertains Gaelic League.

Winona.—Winona has been entertaining representatives of the Gaelic league, including Miss Nellie O'Brien, Miss Teresa Halpin and Fionan McCollum. The Gaelic league is an Irish organization with about 600 branches and 50,000 members scattered all through Ireland. Douglas Hyde is president. Its object is to preserve and develop the distinctive native Celtic culture of Ireland. It is having the Gaelic language of Ireland, which was dying out through the hostility of the English administration, revived and introduced into the education and the public life of the country.

Despondent Inventor Hangs Self.

Minneapolis.—Worry over an invention on which he had been working for several years, and his failure to make it a success, is believed to have caused Nels Runberg of Dassel, Minn., to end his own life. He was found dead in his room at a hotel. He had hanged himself to a bedpost. He had been at the hotel before, and registered there when he arrived from Winnipeg, where he had been on business concerning his patent. In a grip were blue prints for a labor-saving device for harvesting machinery.

PORK DEAL CAUSE OF SUIT

Parkers Prairie Business Man Says Losses Are Due to Farmer's Withdrawal.

Fergus Falls.—G. H. Schoultz, who is engaged in the grain business at Parkers Prairie, has begun suit in the district court in this city against Peter Freudenberg to recover money alleged to have been advanced to carry on a pork deal.

Mr. Schoutz alleges that Mr. Freudenberg, who is a farmer, came to him in the summer of 1913 and told him he had a lot of pork on hand in the form of live hogs and as he believed the market was going down he wanted him to sell 100 barrels of pork for him for January delivery. Mr. Schoutz made inquiries and learned that the commission offices would not sell less than 250 barrels and required $1 a barrel as a margin.

Mr. Freudenberg then asked him to sell 250 barrels for him and to advance the money to carry the trade until fall, when he could sell his wheat and hogs. The latter did so. Soon after this the market went up instead of down, but Mr. Freudenberg was sure there was some mistake, and asked the agent to buy another 250 barrels, as there was sure to be a drop later. He again did so, but the market stubbornly refused to fall. Then Mr. Freudenberg appears from the complaint to have become a little more reckless and called for 500 barrels. This was also purchased. The market still going up, he called for 500 more, and this was also bought.

He was now fully hedged against a decline. The purchases had been made at $19, $19.47½, $19.55 and $20.20½ a barrel. Mr. Schoutz finally notified him that he would not furnish money for the necessary margins above $20.75, should the market go that high and when $20.77½ was reached he let go, and called on Mr. Freudenberg to make good. The latter, according to the complaint, appeared to have lost interest in the deal, and Mr. Schoutz claims to be out $1,862.50 and interest, and asks judgment accordingly.

CUYUNA TO TREBLE OUTPUT

Next Year's Production on the New Iron Range Estimated Will Be 2,500,000 Tons.

Brainerd. — "The Minnesota state tax commission's blue prints of drilling by mining companies," said Chas A. Russell, who represented Brainerd and Crow Wing county at the Cuyuna range hearing, "show a total ore body of approximately 82,000,000 tons on the Cuyuna range. Of this amount 30,000,000 tons are reported low grade Of the 52,000,000 tons left about half is said by the mining companies to be less than 49 per cent dry and therefore not merchantable ore."

The hearing was continued to Nov 9 to take up the question of the value of the ore. Until that is determined no one can tell the amount of the assessment. One thing is certain however, Crow Wing county has a source of revenue which never before adequately contributed its share in taxation.

Estimates of the ore production on the Cuyuna iron range for 1914 vary but these figures, unofficial, come close to the year's production: Rowe pit mine, 120,000 tons; Thompson pit mine, 200,000 tons; Cuyuna-Mille Lacs 40,000 tons; Cuyuna-Duluth, 40,000 tons; Barrows, 20,000 tons; Armour No. 2 mine, 275,000 tons; Kennedy mine, 225,000 tons; Iron Mountain mine, 500 tons, making a total of 920,500 tons. It is confidently expected that the Cuyuna range in 1915 will ship 2,500,000 tons.

DULUTH BOYS STEAL HORSE

Runaways Held After Posse Traces and Captures the Two.

Carlton.—Allen McLeod, aged 1 years, and James Monohan, aged 15 both of Duluth, are in the county jail here charged with horse stealing Sheriff McKinnon brought them from Blackhoof in response to a telegram stating that the boys were held at that station.

McLeod and Monahan left Duluth walking over the Soo line, and on Sunday forenoon reached Holyoke, where they found a one-horse rig belonging to Herman Kelley tied in front of the church. They took the outfit and drove south and had been gone almost an hour before the owner discovered his loss.

A posse was formed and traced the buggy to a point four miles distant Here the roads became impassable for the vehicle and the boys unhitched and mounted the animal. The posse overtook them near Blackhoof and held them until the arrival of the sheriff.

Would Give Cargo of Flour.

Minneapolis.—A Minneapolis miller whose name has not been made public is reported to have offered to head a movement among American millers to donate a cargo of flour for the relief of the thousands of Belgian refugees The project is contingent upon whether shipping arrangements can be made. It was discussed in Washington yesterday at the State Department by the Britsh ambassador, Sir Cecil Spring Rice, and Acting Secretary Lansing.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION PLANS TO AID BELGIANS

MILLIONS OF DOLLARS AVAILABLE IF NECESSARY TO SAVE STARVING NON-COMBATANTS.

PROVISION SHIP READY TO SAIL FOR EUROPE AT ONCE

Will Give Preliminary Aid While Commission Investigates Needs of Country at First Hand and Makes Report on Best Way to Handle Relief.

New York, Nov. 3.—The Rockefeller Foundation has determined to employ its immense resources for the relief of non-combatants in the countries afflicted by the war and stands ready to give "millions of dollars if necessary" for the purpose. This was announced by John D. Rockefeller, Jr. president of the foundation.

Will Get Report First.

In pursuance of this philanthropy the foundation will send a commission to Europe in a few days to report first hand as to how, when and where aid can be rendered most effectively At a cost of $275,000 it already has chartered a ship and loaded it with 4,000 tons of provisions for the relief of the starving Belgians.

"This action is taken," Mr. Rockefeller says, "as a natural step in fulfilling the chartered purposes of the foundation, namely, 'to promote the well being of mankind throughout the world.'"

Sails Direct to Rotterdam.

The ship is the Massapequa, the largest neutral vessel now in New York harbor, and it will sail direct to Rotterdam with a certification from the British consul at New York that its cargo is destined for the use of Belgian non-combatants only and should not be delayed in transit. The supplies are consigned to the American consul at Rotterdam and will be distributed by the Belgian Relief Commission.

Mr. Rockefeller has been in communication with Ambassador Page at London and made public a cablegram in which the ambassador describes the dire need of the Belgians and says that "it will require $1,000,000 a month for seven or eight months to prevent starvation."

Many Sure to Starve.

"In fact," the ambassador said "many will starve now before food can reach them." He added that the British government forbids the export of food and that none can be bought on the continent.

It was in response to this urgent message and a similar one from H. C Hoover of the American relief committee in London that the Foundation decided to send a relief ship "at the earliest possible moment."

Mr. Rockefeller makes clear in his announcement that whatever steps are taken by the Foundation in the administration of its relief work will be "absolutely neutral."

Headed by Wickliffe Rose.

The commission of investigation will be headed by Wickliffe Rose, director general of the International Health Commission and will visit the several countries affected by the war. The announcement begins:

"It having become clear that one of the most terrible and appalling effects of the war will fall upon the non-combatants—those most innocent of any part in the cause or the conduct of the conflict—the Rockefeller Foundation has determined to exert itself to the extent, if necessary, of millions of dollars for the relief of non-combatants in the various countries involved.

Writes American Ambassador.

"I have written the American ambassador in London that 'We foresee the probability that large resources will be very much needed for rehabilitation at a time when the resources now being drawn upon for the immediate relief will be perhaps very nearly exhausted. Under the circumstances we feel the need of future advice.'

"In order to obtain expert opinion as to the time, place and means of rendering aid most effectively, the Foundation has arranged to send to Europe within the next few days a commission which shall visit the countries affected and advise us first hand.

"To avoid delay and provide relief at the earliest possible moment for the suffering people of Belgium, the Foundation has chartered the largest neutral ship available in New York harbor and purchased a full cargo of supplies to be dispatched immediately."

French Hospitals Inadequate.

London, Nov. 2.—The hospital accommodations in northern France are insufficient to cope with the number of wounded being received, according to a medical correspondent of the Times. Writing from Boulogne, the correspondent says: "The hospitals are full, but the stream of wounded continues and will continue. The plain facts are that the hospital accommodations in northern France are insufficient. The policy of shipping as many wounded as possible to England is being pushed to a dangerous extreme."

VIENNA MELANCHOLY AS A SEPULCHER AS WAR GOES ON AND NEWS IS BARRED

(The following story is the first received in the United States telling of actual war conditions in Vienna. It is written by the first American-trained newspaper woman who has had an opportunity to see things as they are in Austria.)

By ALICE ROHE.

(United Press Staff Correspondent.)

Vienna.—Vienna is a city of lost hope, of gloom, of gray despair.

The once gayest and most beautiful capital of Europe is today the saddest, the most distressed. Silent, hopeless protests against the horrors of war which have turned this wonderful, joyous city into a melancholy sepulcher for the living, permeates every stratum of society.

I have seen a procession of 4,000 mothers, whose husbands have died in Galicia, carrying in their arms their fatherless babes. They filed past the great cold palace of the ministry of war. It was their mute appeal for peace.

I have seen a procession of little children, plaintive and futile emissaries of life, silently protesting against needless death.

Dazed by War Horrors.

I have seen trains arriving, every one crowded to suffocation with the wounded and dying. From the midst of these maimed and mutilated, sickened and suffering men, I have seen uncomprehending soldiers, dazed by the horrors of war, crazed with joy at being home again, dragged from their companions and placed under arrest. Their crime?—Why, they cried out in the delirium of excitement their curses against the Russians who had brought such terrible defeat to the Austrian armies. For no news must be whispered by the wounded or the fugitive which reflects the truth of Austrian disasters.

And above these visual pictures of the melancholy Vienna of today, I have sensed the touch of those gray wings of dread which cast their shadow over the town—the soiled, the sordid, the horrible wings of cholera.

I have felt with the people, stalking beside this hideous enemy, the plague—its sister specter, hunger.

Seventy Thousand Now in Hospitals.

In Vienna today 70,000 wounded are being cared for in hospitals, schools, universities, hotels, churches. The Red Cross admits its inability to care for all the wounded, and the sight of helpless men, suffering needlessly and hopelessly, is one which confronts the worker in the cause of humanity.

In all Europe there does not exist today another capital where the public is treated so inconsiderately in regard to war news. The newspapers publish nothing save the official statements—and their "news" can be guessed at.

Arrests are made hourly of Viennese who whisper words of Austrian defeat. Spies are everywhere.

In a cafe on the Praterstrasse I sat in a nervous crowd and saw whispering refugees from Galicia passing their story on, furtively and fearfully. Suddenly I saw a young man whose pale face told of recent suffering deserted by his companion, who went to the door, whispered to an officer and departed. In a moment the fugitive was arrested. He had talked to a spy.

Talks to Young Mother.

At the same station where the incoming trains bring new misery for gay Vienna that was I talked with a young mother whose husband lay dead on the battlefield. She had fled to the capital to plead with the government which had taken her husband and robbed her children of a father for means of support and some of the necessaries of life. She told in patient, resigned tones of her sufferings in bringing her three children from Galicia, where her home was to be her haven no longer, and where blood ran deep in the garden beds which she had tended so faithfully waiting the return of her husband.

"When we arrived at the frontier," she said, "the scenes were awful. We were herded like animals and were treated worse than we treat our dogs. I was days in securing a place in the trains because I had no money. There was a police officer on the train, and he demanded our passports, such money as we had, and when we could show neither he refused for days to let us go on."

The natural impulse of these fugitives here is to speak of the evil days which have befallen them, of their losses and the carnage—and they cannot understand why they are arrested for it.

Moves Citizens to Despair.

The sight of automobiles carrying wounded soldiers past the brilliant Hof theater, past the opera, past the gothic splendor of St. Stephens, where formerly gay cars sped on, bent on pleasure, is one that moves the Viennese to despair.

I talked to one of these wounded soldiers as the car in which he was being carried was stopped in front of the Burg theater for repairs. He told me in whispers, while the guards were busy with the car, of the frightful ravages made by the Russians and the Servians upon the Austrians.

"They have buried our dead in heaps," he said, tears coursing down his face. "They were killed like sheep driven to a slaughter yard. The Russian artillery has done unbelievable things. The Russians waste their ammunition as though it were free as air. Their infantry is not good, but how terrible is the artillery—how terrible—"

The spirit of patriotism in the Viennese runs to its highest flood when these wounded men are being conveyed through the streets.

Show Captured Arms.

Before the palace of the minister of war, beside the monument of Maria Theresa and of Prince Schwarzenberg, the cannons and arms captured from the Russians are on view. They are insignificant arms, but the people do not tire of caressing them. The meager signs of Austrian success are like gleams of hope in a leaden sky of despair.

And patrolling the streets one sees increasing in number daily nondescript army uniforms. Every color and sort of ancient regalia has been brought forth from old storehouses.

In the hour when war and its horrors are keeping a pall over Vienna the sight of religious processions, headed by priests praying for Divine aid, brings out in relief the picture of faith. The churches are constantly filled with women and children, praying for husbands and fathers and brothers who may never return. In the time of sorrow too great to endure alone the people are throwing themselves more and more upon the bosom of the church, which has offered them consolation so many times before.

Rich Are Accused.

While the devout are filling the churches and the wounded are filling the hospitals, while the wretched fugitives are bringing with them famine from Galicia, accusations and protests are rising above the murmurs of distress, against the rich.

On different subscription lists opened daily for the Red Cross the sight of unbelievably small sums given by members of the nobility and by millionaires has brought forth waves of indignation. A feudal prince who is among the richest men in Europe has subscribed 20 crowns ($4). Everywhere one hears criticism of the aristocracy, of the high nobility and their avarice. This selfishness, say the people, is traditional, but the public believed that in an hour like this even the tightened purses of the nobility would open. It has been suggested that a list be published, giving the names of the nobility, of the rich who have been guilty of avarice, and who have added to the general public depression. Emperor Francis Joseph does not conceal his indignation against these grasping members of the nobility.

HESSIAN PRINCE SHOT IN BACK, SAY ALLIES

By HAROLD ASHTON.

(International News Service.)

Calais.—Hospitals, both in the field and at the base, are full of work just now, for the fighting that is going on is fierce and reckless.

Troops upon entering a small village, held strenuously for several days by the Prussians, came upon the body of Prince Max of Hesse. He had been dead three days. The body had been stripped of everything but the tunic and socks and was marked with five revolver wounds made from behind. The tale is whispered that he was the victim of his own soldiers.

A rough coffin of real boards was made for the boy—he was little more than that—and then for three long days the body lay in an outbuilding of a small farmhouse. The body now has been sent into the German lines.

Continual night fighting has been going on. The nights have been desperately cold, but the men and horses of the allies have a splendid supply of blankets and good, hot food is turned out smoking from the traveling field kitchens.

Troops Have Plenty.

The troops have more than enough of coffee, jam galore and cigarettes by the tens of thousands. Their spirit is excellent, their health good, their hearts high and they are still singing. They are looking forward cheerfully enough to a tempestuous Christmas day in the trenches.

Calais is taking it all placidly enough. The city is filled with Belgian refugees wandering at will anywhere, anyhow, sleeping under the stars, amid stable litter in byways, in filthy back streets, on steamboats and on fishing boats.

In the harbor, where hundreds and hundreds of fishing boats from all along the coast lie thick as their own packed fish after a spell of great hauling, there is a living population almost equal to the population of the town at normal times.

Whole families are herding in an intolerable atmosphere. There are families in rags and tatters with all their cherished household goods, while clustering around them are families of the well-to-do, fat and well-fed, with furs to warm them and jewels to decorate them.

Waiting for Boats.

Every day hundreds of them are marshaled off to the quay, where they wait in long, dreary, patient lines, in rain or shine, for an English boat to carry them away.

We are murdering one another as hard as we can and in the wake of it all comes this pitiable, heartbreaking stream of innocent sufferers, crouching submissively to the lash.

Annexing a Broken Fragment.

In taking possession of German New Guinea the Australians have annexed what once formed a physical part of their own vast continent. For that mysterious island of cannibals—the largest island in the world if we agree to shut Austria out—in comparatively recent times had no Gulf of Papua to isolate it from its big neighbor. Alfred Russel Wallace found that an upheaval of 100 fathoms would serve to join the land once more together. But the curious fact remains that in spite of their common origin and ancient connection New Guinea and Australia are peopled by different races, showing that the former must have been visited for the first time by human beings after the separation from the mainland of Australia took place.

ITCHING BURNING ECZEMA

R. F. D. No. 3, Caldwell, Ohio.—"When our baby was about two months old she broke out over her body, face and head with eczema. It was bad, about as thick as it could be. It broke out in a kind of pimples. They were red and sore. She was very cross and restless. The eczema would itch and burn till she couldn't sleep. It looked very badly and would peel off where the places were. Her clothes would irritate the eruption.

"We gave her medicine, but it didn't do any good. We had heard about Cuticura Soap and Ointment so we sent for a sample and it was not very long till she was better. I bought some more Cuticura Soap and Ointment which cured her completely." (Signed) H. E. Smith, Mar. 21, 1914.

The Hydraulic Ram.

She was a Delaware county girl. She lived near Gaston and was in Muncie with her escort, watching a piece of engineering work that was being done about a new bridge. Every once in a while there came a peculiar grinding noise whose origin she could not locate.

"Jim, what makes that noise?" she asked.

A Home-Made Poison

Uric acid, unknown in the days of a simple, natural, out-of-door life, is a modern poison created inside the human body by a combination of meat-eating, overwork, worry, and lack of rest. Backache or irregular urination is the first protest of weak kidneys. When the kidneys fall behind in filtering out the excess uric acid, there is danger of gravel, dropsy or Bright's disease. Doan's Kidney Pills strengthen weak kidneys, but if the diet is reduced, excesses stopped, and fresh air, exercise and sleep increased, the medicine acts more quickly. Doan's Kidney Pills have a world-wide reputation as a reliable kidney tonic.

Reading about Doan's Kidney Pills I tried them and a couple of boxes made me feel better. I continued until cured and during the past seven years I haven't had a sign of my former trouble."

Revelations of the Kaiser's Personal Spy

By DR. ARMGAARD KARL GRAVES

Who, for a Number of Years Prior to His Arrest and Betrayal in England in 1912, Was Emperor William's Most Trusted Personal Spy

(Copyright, 1914, by the Wheeler Syndicate, Inc.)

My Mission to the Balkans and What Came of It.

For more than a year the gentlemen at the Wilhelmstrasse (the German foreign office) had kept me on the run, and a vacation at Albeck, much like your Atlantic City, only smaller, was not only welcome but needed. I was just settling down to a period of quiet in and around the Kurhaus when there came a wire for my attendance at the Wilhelmstrasse. "At your earliest convenience" was the phrase which, of course, meant at once. Germany's language to her secret agents is always polite.

I knew that something big must be in the air, else I would never have been recalled from a vacation that was only beginning. Wiring a reply, I stated that I would arrive in Berlin on the 7:30 train and that any further commands would receive attention at my standing quarters in the Mittelstrasse.

During the three hour run to Berlin I speculated on what was likely to be required of me. I knew that the kaiser believed that, as a result of the meeting, in October, 1911, of the representatives of Germany, Austria and Great Britain in the Black Forest (about which I have already told you), he had smashed the Triple Entente—a diplomatic stroke that would leave the way clear for the execution of Austro-German policies in the Balkans.

I also reflected that since the Russo-Japanese war, Russia, weakened as she was in that struggle, had felt her influence in European affairs waning, and I knew that it was about time for her to make a desperate effort to regain European prestige—and where would she more naturally strive to do this than in the Balkans?

I recalled that, because of Russia's plight after the Japanese war, Austria had dared to annex Herzegovina and Bosnia, and that she had done this with the tacit understanding and backing up of Germany. I knew that, as a result of this, Russia had again been at work in the Balkans. The nature of her moves I did not know, though I recalled having heard not so far in the past high Servian officials speculate as to their chances of reviving their ancient empire; and I had also heard Bulgarians indulge in a dream of empire. I know there were armies mobilizing in these states all out of proportion to the size and resources of these countries. They were at a high mark of efficiency, they were equipped in a way totally beyond the means of such little nations. Who was supplying this driving force, the money, ammunition, equipment? Who else, I said to myself, but Russia, and what I am to be used for is to make certain of this for the kaiser and his Austrian ally.

Caller From Wilhelmstrasse.

Arriving in Berlin, I made my way to my quarters on the Mittelstrasse. It was about eleven o'clock when I put my key in the door. I found Kim very much awake and somewhat excited. At this ungodly hour there was a visitor! This was all the more unusual since I was not in the habit of receiving even my most intimate friends at my private quarters.

"Koom, massa! (Salute, master!) Gentleman him here see you. Kim him don't know if he do right, maybe wrong, but gentleman said it all right that him come in."

Rather curious, I walked into the sitting room and found a man I had seen pretty often at the Wilhelmstrasse. I knew him to be Herr von Stammer, the right hand man of Graf von Wedel, privy councillor to the German emperor. Although we were well known to each other by sight, we had hardly conversed ten words outside of official business. I thought it a little odd that the usual procedure was not observed; that someone had come to my room instead of me going to the Wilhelmstrasse, seemed a bit unusual. As things developed, however, I saw that it was to save time and get instant action.

"Your quarters are pretty well guarded here, doctor," said Herr von Stammer. "Your Cerberus did not want to let me in."

He half smiled, approvingly, and then continued:

"We received your wire from Albeck and, as the count is inaccessible, your orders will come through me this time."

There was an interruption, for Kim had appeared with cigarettes.

"The count," pursued Von Stammer, driving direct to the point, "wishes you to go to Belgrade and get in close touch with existing conditions there. We wish you to ascertain the undercurrent situation. The official status is, of course, well known to us. But we want definitely to find out just how far Russian influences are at work in Belgrade and Sofia, just how far they have progressed, and how far they are prepared to go in this Balkan affair. If you cannot get in Belgrade the desired information—and absolute accuracy is imperative—go to the Bulgarian capital. But—and this is important—no time must be lost—not an hour. A definite insight of the inner workings of the situation must be in my hands at the earliest possible moment—the very earliest."

Here, indeed, was a task.

"Understand," continued Von Stammer, "you will have the assistance in this case of Austrian secret service employees. But, as I need not point out to you, it is inadvisable to take any of them with you, as all the Austrian agents are known to the Russian agents down in the Balkans. I suggest that you stop at Budapest and get all connecting links of possible help to you. You will obtain these from Kasimir Kowalsky, an Austrian agent whom you will find at Donaustrasse 24. By the way, do you know him?"

I said no.

Mission That Did Not Appeal.

"In this case," went on Von Stammer, "I shall give instructions to facilitate matters. It is necessary for you to have passports. Have you any reason to fear your previous mission to the Balkans?"

He referred to an incident in 1903, a week previous to the assassination of King Alexandra and Queen Draga of Servia—an incident I don't like to think of, for it landed me against a blank wall looking into six ugly Mauser tubes.

I considered that there were only two men in the Balkans who could have placed me from that incident. One, Colonel Niglitch, was dead. He was slain at the time of the double assassination. the other was Stamboulof, and he was no doubt moving in the circles where my mission would take me. No, I was in no way keen to undertake this mission. My previous experience in the Balkans had given me a thorough distaste of the people there. There is no mixture of races so dangerous. Based on my experiences, nearly every man there is for a small sum a traitor and a potential assassin. I had had a taste of Balkan methods, and I didn't want another.

Von Stammer must have noticed my hesitation, for he grinned and said:

"Nervous about it?"

I was, and frankly told him so.

"Yes, I understand your attitude. Besides, you have been on the go for quite several months and should have a rest. I beg of you to consider, though, that you are the only man we have at our disposal who can see this thing through."

He then began to hint in such a way that it became plain to me that refusal on my part would not be at all to the liking of the Wilhelmstrasse. Refusal would mean loss of favor and with it the choice jobs. As an added inducement, Von Stammer promised to double the usual remuneration. Frankly, this was a point. I considered that the mission would not take me over three or four weeks and he had agreed to pay me $2,500 aside from the bonus always attached to successful and quick work.

Still, I wasn't sure that I wanted to go. I knew there was the danger of recognition, and I knew the kind of hot headed people I was going among. It was far more difficult, far more hazardous, than any mission I had ever undertaken in England or France, even the tremendous responsibilities of the affair in the Black Forest carried with them none of the personal dangers that this did. Pressed for a decision, I requested some little time to think things over. Asking me to telephone his home before one o'clock at the latest and let him know what I was going to do, Von Stammer departed.

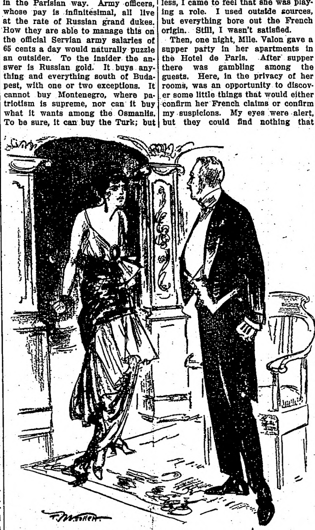
Matter of Solitaire.

I hope I am still a Christian, but contact and intercourse with the mysticism of Africa and India have made me superstitious. I have a curious habit at momentous times of indecision of taking two full packages of cards and playing Napoleon's solitaire. If I get it out once in three times I generally go into the matter in hand without question. It never has failed me. Twice in my life I went against it; twice I had bitter cause for regret.

Well, I didn't give Von Stamer his decision on the moment because I wanted to try the old test. Kim produced the cards and I began to play. I got it out the second time. Going to the telephone, I called Von Stammer and told him I would undertake the mission. He asked me to come at once to his house, and there I received final instructions and passports, the latter essential south of the Austrian frontier.

At three o'clock in the morning I boarded the Orient express, via Vienna, and made a stop-over of a day at Budapest. I went immediately to Donaustrasse 23 and saw the Austrian agent Kowalsky. From him I gained points that were invaluable to me. For instance, he gave me the names of men who frequented certain places in Belgrade, men who would be of use to me. He also warned me of certain persons, especially women, whom he knew to be in Russian employ. That night I caught a train for the Servian capital, well satisfied with the results of my visit in Vienna.

Before dinner time the next day, I was installed at the Hotel De Paris in Belgrade. My rooms had been engaged for me beforehand and they were the most expensive in the hotel—for a reason. I found myself in an elaborate suite, on the first floor, known as the suite Des Princes. This was a necessary show of parvenuism as money is the first and last word in the Balkans. Belgrade and everybody in it pride themselves on their up-to-date Parisian style. Everybody lives in the Parisian way. Army officers, whose pay is infinitesimal, all live at the rate of Russian grand dukes. How they are able to manage this on the official Servian army salaries of 65 cents a day would naturally puzzle an outsider. To the insider the answer is Russian gold. It buys anything and everything south of Budapest, with one or two exceptions. It cannot buy Montenegro, where patriotism is supreme, nor can it buy what it wants among the Osmanlis. To be sure, it can buy the Turk; but there is a vast difference between an Osmanli and a Turk.



The Look She Gave Me Was Venomous With Hate.

A Major and a Lady.

Through my lavish expenditure of money, I soon was a very remarked person and courted by all the gay officers of the capital. One of their number was a Major Schuwaloff. A bon vivant and gambler, Major Schuwaloff had the tastes of a Russian grand duke. On a mission of this kind a secret agent always likes to find a man who is "fast." I knew the major to be in the Russian pay; Kowalsky had tipped me off to that. I felt that if I handled the situation right, it was from him I could get everything I wanted, even though he was taking the czar's gold.

Into the gay life of Belgrade I plunged, with the major as my quarry. I gave a series of dinners at the Hotel De Paris. After the dinners there was gambling. I invariably lost to the major. He lost to others, but I was careful never to win from him. He fell into the way of dropping around at my quarters. Like most of his set, the major was a heavy drinker. When his face would become very flushed and his tongue very glib, I would try to draw out of him things that I wanted to know, but I never could get anything worth while. The slightest suspicious question, no matter how artlessly asked, always made him close up as tight as an oyster.

I had seen him often in the company of a French lady, a Mlle. Renee Valon. It was obvious that she and the major were on pretty good terms. Little incidents, things that happened in a room full of people, led me to guess that she was extremely fond of him. I made it my business to cultivate her acquaintance, for experience had often shown me that where gold and myself failed, a pair of flashing eyes and ruby lips would often succeed. Like all other women of that set in Belgrade, Mlle. Valon was woefully extravagant. She gambled heavily, and one night I assisted her with a loan of 50 francs. I came to know her fairly well.

Importance of a Bit of Candy.

I had no indication of her being in any way connected with any foreign service. Indeed, everything pointed to the contrary. Mlle. Valon's French was perfect. She looked French, her mannerisms were French. But when on any mission a German secret service agent is always on the qui vive. It is always wise to be suspicious of everyone, and so I began to make the most delicate inquiries concerning Mlle. Valon and her antecedents. In conversation with her I tried to draw out little things that would give me some clue to her place in the scheme of things. I failed; nevertheless, I came to feel that she was playing a role. I used outside sources, but everything bore out the French origin. Still, I wasn't satisfied.

Then, one night, Mlle. Valon gave a supper party in her apartments in the Hotel de Paris. After supper there was gambling among the guests. Here, in the privacy of her rooms, was an opportunity to discover some little things that would either confirm her French claims or confirm my suspicions. My eyes were alert, but they could find nothing that would show any connection with Russia. That is, they found nothing until Mlle. Valon got up from the table, went to her boudoir and returned nibbling on a piece of candy. It was the candy that gave her away.

I saw at once that it was a particular brand of Russian candy, quite distinct from the confections of France and Turkey. In reality, this brand of Russian candy consists of natural flowers, such as roses and violets, preserved, with their fragrance and natural taste, in a champagne colored, crystal substance, the nature of which is a secret of a firm of Moscow confectioners. This candy is usually appreciated only by a born Muscovite. The taste for it must be acquired. Only a Russian, or one who had for years lived in Russia, would have it.

Five out of every ten of the women who take part in the gay life of the European capitals are invariably known to the secret service branches of the Continental police. My suspicions as to Mlle. Valon confirmed, it was an even chance that I might be able to place her. I procured two snapshots of her and a specimen of her handwriting. These I forwarded to the chiefs of the secret service sections of the Vienna and Berlin police departments, with a request to wire me any possible information about her. Within forty-eight hours I had a reply. Mlle. Valon was well known to the Austrian police as a one-time keeper of a fashionable gambling resort in Cracow. She had left the country hurriedly after a stabbing affray. She was known in Cracow as Paula, and she was wanted.

I engineered my next meeting with "Mlle. Valon" to be private. After presenting her with a box of perfumes, I said abruptly:

"This is a change from Cracow, Paula."

It is always wise to smash right out, and not to put the one you are working on on guard through leading questions, and the trick had the desired effect with Mlle. Valon. She recoiled. To your high American standards of chivalry it may seem brutal to take advantage of a woman in this way, but it had to be done.

"Grand Dieu! Who are you?" she exclaimed.

"That does not concern you, ma fille. I know that, and a good deal more. Austria would be very glad to know where you are. Shall I tell them?"

She had recovered to an extent.

"What is your price for not telling."

I replied: "Let Russia slip this once, gain me the information I seek and nothing further shall be said."

Her air of surprise was perfect.

"Russia? I know nothing at all about Russia."

I smiled, walked to her desk, where there was a silver tray, and picked up a sugared rose.

"You're clever, Paula, but careless. Know nothing about Russia, yet have acquired a taste for the fine candies of the Muscovites? Remarkable, Paula."

She bit her lips.

"What do you want?"

"Now, before we begin, Paula, let it be understood that there is to be no double-crossing here. It would be an easy matter for you to have me legitimately assassinated.' (I knew she could force a duel on me. All she would have to do would be to tell one of her many admirers that I had insulted her. Then I would come downstairs some morning to be slapped in the face before a hotel full of people, and what could one do? It would be a case of pistols, and I would get a bullet, for I am not a good shot, while everyone who frequents the Balkans is.) "Remember," I cautioned her, "if anything happens to me here, if they do not hear from me every six hours, on the seventh you will be arrested. You will be arrested on an imperial Austrian warrant. Your friends in Belgrade, army officers though they are, will not dare to help you. Servia will not take the chance of angering Austria by refusing to acknowledge the imperial warrant. Remember, Paula, there is now an Austrian army on the Servian border."

The look she gave me was venomous with hate.

"I'll Tell You What I Want."

"Now, I'll tell you what I want," I continued. "Major Schuwaloff is in the Russian pay. He has got the key to the Russian influence here. He knows just how far Russia has gone, how far it is prepared to go. I want that key. You've got to get it. I have the major pretty well sized up. Money, I think, would be very acceptable to him for—well, let us say for selling out Russia. But he fears your supervision. I know that you were sent here by Russia, Paula, just to keep your eye on agents in Russian pay, and principally on our friend Schuwaloff. I know you have not the situation in hand like he has. If you had, I wouldn't bother going any further, I'd get it from you. Now, your part is to give him to understand that he has nothing to fear from you, that no lapse by him will be reported—this time. You're pretty well fond of him already, aren't you? If you value his safety, you'd better do as I ask. Otherwise, I shall also let him go up. I've got something on him, too."

This last shot in the dark seemed to bear the most weight with her. She said:

"What guarantee have I that you'll keep your side of the bargain?"

I said none, for the simple reason that I could not give any.

"Your own sense," I explained, "and knowledge of the work you're doing should tell you that it is to my interest to get results, and not to trouble about other things. I'll promise you, however, no further trouble over this affair in Cracow. There will also be the price of a diamond collar in it for you. (I subsequently filed a requisition for $1,000 to be paid to her, but I think she got more.) You agree? Good!"

The agreement closed, I went back to the hotel well satisfied with the night's work.

The Major Makes an Early Call.

Early the next morning a very perturbed Major Schuwaloff was shown into my chamber. I greeted him cordially and opened fire with the remark:

"I see Mlle. Valon has conferred with you."

He started.

"How did you know?"

"Mon cner major, this early visit, your sobriety, your nervous manner are indications enough. My time is valuable, and, although your petite Paris here is very entertaining, I prefer the Baltic seashore. If you have anything to say to me, say it quickly and to the point. I leave this afternoon for Vienna. It may interest you to know that you are absolutely safe. I put no stop to your no doubt valuable services to your employer. In fact, I don't give a continental what you do after I leave. But I want the whole of your knowledge of Russian activity here and in Bulgaria."

He replied:

"I know very little about Bulgaria."

I shook my head.

"This will not do, major. You know about as much about Russian influence in Bulgaria as you do of Russian intrigue here. I want the whole thing or nothing. As Mlle. Valon—Paula—doubtless has told you, neither you nor she is in a position to hold back a single thing."

Without further attempt to bluff it out, he gave up what I wanted. The gist of it was this:

With the aid of French money, Russia had united and was heavily subsidizing Bulgaria and Servia against Turkey, and had intoxicated both with wild dreams of enlarged boundaries and empire at the expense of the Turk, and, ultimately, with Russia's backing, at the expense of Austria herself. Numerous non-commissioned officers were coming quietly into Belgrade and Sofia, and were ready to take the field with the armies of the allies, which could count on support from Montenegro, through its hereditary hatred of the Austrian, and on Greece through its hatred of the Turk and desire to settle old scores with that nation. Most of the leading officers and men of affairs of Servia and Bulgaria were in Russian pay. In fact, a systematic Russianization of Servia and Bulgaria was in progress. Their armies were being equipped with a new kind of French gun; the troops were being paid with Russian and French gold. And they were all ready to move forward on word from Russia.

Obviously the menace of the czar, abetted by France, to Austro-German interests in the Balkans was to be a tremendous factor in the European situation. Clearly, Russia was in so deep there was no pulling out.

This, of course, had been suspected by the cabinets of Germany and Austria. But how far and how thorough the actuality was, I had been sent to find out. The knowledge in my hands showed beyond all doubt the urgent need of Germany and Austria to start their machinations to offset the rising of Russian power in the Balkans. I took the night's Orient express for Berlin direct and, as soon as there, made my report to Von Stammer, as Wedel was still inaccessible, being away with the kaiser.

A solid coalition of Bulgaria, Servia and Montenegro, with a Russian dominance, would have played the deuce with the Balkan policies of Germany and Austria, would have threatened the very integrity of the Austro-Hungarian empire itself, through its racial appeal to the empire's southern Slavs. From the Austro-German point of view, therefore, all chance of such a coalition, with Russian backing, must be shattered, and once for all.

Now, see how cleverly the diplomats of the two kaisers set about smashing the predominance of Russian influence in the Balkans. Knowing full well the national heredity, jealousies and animosities of the Balkan nations, they waited until, the allies' war with Turkey won, there came the question of dividing the spoils wrested from the Turk—and Austro-German influence, having meanwhile insidiously worked on King Ferdinand, set Bulgaria against Servia. The shadow of a Balkan confederation, with the dreaded Russian backing, was instantly dispelled. Russia was helpless to consummate her dream, with the two states she had counted on as the key of her Balkan scheme at each other's throats in a death grapple.

* * * * * * * *

Before closing, perhaps I should add that Dr. Armgaard Karl Graves is not known in the Balkans, but among the gay, extravagant army officers of Belgrade. "Count Arthur zu Wernigerode" is.

Koenigsberg and Kant.

Koenigsberg did not treat its most famous citizen, Kant, any too generously in money matters. Barring the ten years spent as tutor in private families, Kant passed the whole of his long life in Koenigsberg, where he was born in 1724. During his early tenure of the chair of philosophy his sole emoluments consisted of £20 a year, a sack of wheat every month and sufficient firewood to warm his house in cold weather. On becoming rector of the university, only another £20 was added to his yearly stipend, so the greatest of all German philosophers was not much better off than the pastor of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village." However, in the latter years Kant's scanty means were supplemented by an annual allowance of £26 from the privy purse of Frederick the Great.—London Chronicle.

Skeleton Is Proof.

That California was at one time the home of almost every kind of animal has received further proof by the discovery of a skull and other bones of a huge wild boar in Imperial valley. The find was made on a big ranch, where a tractor plow was breaking up the ground for a cotton field. One tusk of the great pig lacks just a fraction of being 10 inches long. The other is broken.

Music of the Future.

London has listened to a futurist orchestra composed of whistlers, thunderers, cracklers, gurglers, murmurers, rattlers, roarers and buzzers. To get an idea of what it must have been like sit in a New York apartment house neighborhood in the open window season while all the tango music machines on several blocks are in full blast.—New York World.

Be Swift to Love.

Do not let us wait to be just or pitiful or demonstrative towards those we love until they or we are struck down by illness or threatened with death. Life is short, and we have never too much time for gladdening the hearts of those who are traveling the dark journey with us. Oh! be swift of love, make haste to be kind.—Amiel.

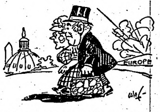
NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Europe Being Closed, the Rich Flock to Washington

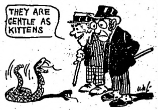
WASHINGTON.—War in Europe will increase Washington's winter population. Last winter, in what is known in the light words of the "common people" as the "swell section" of the city, there were scores of vacant houses. In the main these empty residences will be occupied during the coming winter, for already the "to let" signs in most of the staring windows have disappeared.



It is reported that many American families who have been living abroad are to come this year to see the capital of their country, for which some of them seemingly cared little or nothing until they found that the homeland was about the only place in which their sacred necks and still more sacred pocketbooks were safe. There are a good many rich Americans who go to Europe to spend the winter, or at any rate a part of it. Some of these this year, it is known, are to come to Washington, and their numbers, added to those of the hitherto more or less permanent dwellers in Europe, will come pretty near filling all of Washington's houses in which the visitors would care to live.

Banker Ailes Has Chance to Get Rich on Snakes

MILTON A. AILES, vice-president of the Riggs National bank, has had fresh opportunity for fortune thrust upon him. Heretofore he has pursued the jade with marked success. But it remained for his casual recital of a snake story to bring him an unexpected chance for wealth beyond the dreams of avarice.



THEY ARE GENTLE AS KITTENS

Mr. Ailes is in receipt of a letter from Forrest W. Brown, an attorney at law in Charlestown, W. Va., in which is laid down the tentative plan for the accumulation of vast riches, the establishment of a rattlesnake farm. Mr. Brown writes:

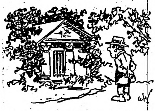
"I tried a case two or three years ago in Morgan county, involving the title to several thousand acres of land, which the witness described as not being worth anything except to raise rattlesnakes on. I succeeded in getting a judgment in favor of my client. Then an old friend of mine inserted in a New York paper a communication in which he said that I had acquired a large tract of land in Morgan county, and had organized a corporation for the purpose of raising rattlesnakes."

This, according to Mr. Brown, was the beginning. Many letters followed from all quarters. Exporting companies in New York and New Jersey wanted to make arrangements to take all the rattlesnake skins that could be furnished. They would tan them, in case Mr. Brown lacked the facilities. The skins were wanted for export trade to Paris and London.

"I had letters from a number of friends," continues Mr. Brown, "stating that they wanted me to reserve large blocks of stock for them. I think that if I had taken all these offers I would have had $1,000,000,000 worth of stock in the enterprise by now. But it all failed because I could not find a general manager. Kindly write and tell me whether you will accept, so that the great enterprise can be inaugurated and continued with success."

No More Persons Will Be Interred in This Tomb

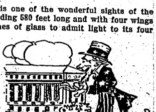
A QUAINT and curious old family tomb, built according to the custom prevalent in portions of the South early in the last century, is to be found on the old Patterson estate, in the northeast section of the city, and adjoining the Gallaudet college. It is constructed of solid granite blocks, almost square in shape, and surmounted by an arched roof set off by a heavy projecting cornice, resembling somewhat those used by the ancient Egyptians at Luxor and Karnak. An ivy vine, with thick roots and branches, nearly covers the sides and roof of the tomb, while the immediate surroundings are so heavily grown with deep underbrush and trees that it is almost impossible to see the vault before actually reaching it. Attention was in recent years directed to the tomb by the request of Francis Winslow, a trustee of the Patterson estate, made to the health board of the district, for information relative to the burial laws governing the use of such vaults. Mr. Winslow stated that no interments had been made in the tomb in many years, and that, with one possible exception, none of the descendants of the Patterson family desired to be interred within the place. In view of the possible application for interment within the vault, Mr. Winslow requested information as to whether the health department would permit it.



As a result of the request, Health Officer Woodward had the records of his office searched, but nothing concerning the old tomb could be found. The question was referred to the city solicitor, who replied, in an opinion, stating that under the new code no person could be buried in any grounds except those known as private or public burial grounds, or such as may be so designated in the future by the district commissioners.

Uncle Sam's Money Factory Is Best in the World

UNCLE SAM'S great money factory is one of the wonderful sights of the world. Housed in a brand new building 580 feet long and with four wings each 285 feet deep, it takes 32,840 panes of glass to admit light to its four stories. The structure of the bureau of engraving and printing is built of Indiana limestone and it presents to the shining Potomac, which it faces, a row of columns on the front as imposing as those on the east side of the treasury.



This probably is the finest manufacturing plant in the world in point of scientific equipment to conserve the health and comfort of its inhabitants. The chiefs of divisions say that the records show 80 per cent less sickness in the new than in the old building. The whole plant is virtually the creation of Director Joseph E. Ralph, who was determined that in the equipment and operation of the bureau of engraving and printing the United States should lead the world in welfare work

The European war hit the bureau of engraving and printing as hard as any other American establishment. Its normal output of bank notes was 40,000 sheets a day and it is now turning out 300,000 sheets of four notes to the sheet. In addition to this currency its normal output of silver certificates and gold notes was 225,000. It is now printing 310,000. The moment war was declared Director Ralph jumped to New York, Philadelphia and other places and bought up all the imported dyes in the country suitable for use in coloring inks.

PRIME MINISTER TAKES THE FIELD

Gen. Louis Botha, premier of the South African Union, has taken the field in supreme command of the operations against German Southwest Africa, and the revolt of Colonel Maritz and his forces hastened the movements of the former leader of Boer armies. Before the Boer war General Botha was unknown outside the Transvaal, but his dashing work in that conflict soon made his name a household word. He taught the British generals some severe lessons in open field fighting and in artillery work, and earned their respect and even their liking.

Kitchener's dealings with Botha during that war were always frank and cordial. At one meeting—a hasty conference of two hours' duration when some glimmering of peace appeared on the horizon—"K. of K.'s" temper might have been tried to snapping-back point, but it stood the test. "I must get off now," he said; "I have an armored train to catch seven miles down the line." "Don't hurry away on that account," answered Botha, with a smile; "we caught it first thing this morning."

Since then the English trains that General Botha has had to catch have been boat-trains to England. No coronation is complete without him. He is recognized as a great statesman; he has come to be regarded as one of the most remarkable men in the empire. He has been premier of the Union of South Africa since 1910.

BRUSSELS' INTREPID BURGOMASTER

Even such awful gloom as that which envelops Europe has its light spots, and one of the brightest of these is Adolphe Max, the irrepressible burgomaster of Brussels. He had no chance to fight for his city, because it was surrendered to the Germans without defense, but he met the conquerors with undaunted spirit, though they locked him up as surety for the war tax of 50,000,000 francs, which was levied on Brussels. M. Max paid 3,500,000 francs of this sum and gave notes for the remainder up to 20,000,000 francs, but later he refused to redeem the notes, so he was carried a prisoner to the fortress of Namur.

It is related of Burgomaster Max that when the German commander entered his office to discuss with him the terms on which Brussels should yield and the methods by which the citizens should be restrained from attacking the invaders, the representative of the kaiser bore himself with even more haughtiness than might properly be expected from a victorious enemy. His honor, the burgomaster, promptly stiffened up and prepared to meet the Teuton on his own ground. The officer strode up to a table in the center of the room and with a flourish drew his sword and slammed it down, merely as a preliminary. M. Max immediately and with as big flourish drew from his waistcoat pocket a fountain pen and slammed it down beside the sword. The officer saw the point and the interview proceeded without further friction.

MRS. LITTLETON WINS LONG FIGHT

Mrs. Martin W. Littleton, wife of Congressman Littleton of New York, has won her three years' campaign for government ownership of Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, father of the University of Virginia, and founder of the Democratic party of the United States.

The other day Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan penned an appeal to Congressman Jefferson M. Levy of New York, owner of the property, asking him to consent to the change of ownership and Mr. Levy agreed to part with the property for $500,000, though it cost him $1,000,000. Mr. Levy inherited the old home of Jefferson from his uncle, who was a captain in the navy and who bought it from the owner, who purchased it at public auction after Jefferson's death, when Jefferson's daughter, unable to meet her debts, was obliged to sell it away from the family.

When Mrs. Littleton started her campaign she put out a brochure entitled "One Wish," and signed by "Peggy O'Brien," her pen name. At last her one wish is to be gratified. Before her marriage in 1896 she was Maud Wilson of Dallas, Texas.

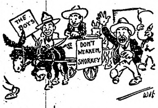
MAHARAJAH JAM IS LOYAL

Not long ago a poor student and tutor at Cambridge, but now one of the greatest and richest of the princes of India, the Maharajah Jam Saheb of Jamnagar, has demonstrated his loyalty to the imperial government by offering for service against Germany a force of 1,000 infantry, two squadrons of lancers and 15 motors. In his college days the Maharajah Jam was known as Ranji, and under that name became a world famous cricketer. Just after his graduation at Cambridge the late maharajah of Jamnagar disowned him as his heir and discontinued the large allowance the young man had been receiving. Without rank or money, he was compelled to earn his living, which he did after a fashion by writing on sports and giving lessons in Hindu and Sanscrit and in Indian history at Cambridge. Then the throne to which he had formerly been heir became vacant and he was placed upon it. He now possesses a number of magnificent palaces, his strongboxes are overflowing with money and jewels, and his income is so large that whenever he revisits England he leases some one of the country's finest country houses.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Dan Cupid Corrals "Snorky Dan," Cowboy of Chicago

CHICAGO.—"Snorky Dan" Sammons tied his pony to the rack at the stockyards the other day, doffed his chaps, wiggled into "the conventional black" and, with the able assistance of 300 wildly enthusiastic "boys from the yards," was roped, tied and branded at the altar.



It was the biggest "cowboy wedding" the yards ever saw. When "Snorky" knocked off buying hogs for the Bismark Packing company early in the day and got ready to hit the trail for the Holy Cross church, East Sixty-first street and Maryland avenue, he had no hint of the scheme on foot.

Late in the afternoon the South side, however, became aware there was something doing besides the Cubs-Sox battle. First a two-wheeled phaeton, dragged along by a gaunt, underfed mule and driven by a cowboy, made its appearance. A big banner was stretched across its sides giving the bridegroom this welcome admonition:

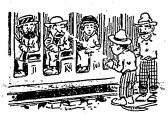
"Don't weaken, 'Snorky.'"

At its heels came a "hungry five" German band playing Irish melodies, riding in a "cripple wagon" driven by a red-coated negro. A tractor engine, pulling a chain of 12 "clean-up" chariots, came next, and in its wake a couple of hundred yelling, plug-hatted cowboys led by "Rags" Murphy and Tom Dorney. As marshals of the "round-up" there were "Tex" Hobart, "Jim" McGuirk, "Spuds" Grady and "Skinny" Kenny. Even young Edward Morris, who recently went to work in the packing business, was on the job.

The cavalcade drew up in front of the church and awaited "Snorky." It was about five o'clock when he arrived in a big touring car with bride-to-be, Miss Mary Cowman.

When Play Really Became More Serious Than Work

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—As the street car banged along, the men working on the tracks crawled away from in front of it somewhat more leisurely and more good-naturedly than a tribe of ants retreating before the assault of a stream of water from the hose. They were not indifferent to the small amount of pleasure their work afforded them. Some of them enjoyed keeping one leg on the track until even the motorman was a bit worried, and then jumping away and grinning at the nervous passengers.



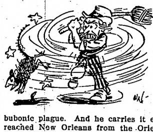
Many of them waved or laughed, but all of them took their pleasure lightly and went back to work seriously.

It was not that way with the boy in the gang. He was much younger than the others. He worked hard and fast to keep up, but he laughed as he worked. He was taking the place of his father, who was ill, and felt proud and rather pleased, although he was a little tired and it was not yet noon. He talked about everything he did and seemed to consider it a new and interesting game. It was when the car approached that he grew serious.

He climbed from between the tracks, frowning and searching his pockets. As the car passed he drew out a small piece of a broken mirror, manipulated it skillfully in his hands and flashed a terrifying bolt of sunshine in the eyes of everybody on that side of the car. Then, the serious business of the moment finished, he began whistling and chopping cement.

Making New Orleans Ratless to Keep Out Plague

NEW ORLEANS, LA.—The federal government is helping this city to rid itself of rats, those carriers of the fleas that carry the bubonic plague. On June 19 a case of bubonic plague was discovered here. A hurry call was sent to the public health service, and a strenuous campaign was started to stamp it out. The government was concerned in preventing its spread to other sections of the country. And the task is costing the government $27,000 a month.



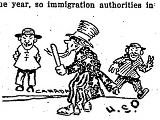
There are three kinds of rats, but the worst is the Norwegian rat. He is the nomad of the rodent family, a militant brute that soon cleans out all others of his tribe. It is he who carries the flea whose bite causes bubonic plague. And he carries it everywhere. Plague is thought to have reached New Orleans from the Orient via Liverpool, which trades largely with the East.

The rats are being exterminated with poison and with traps. Several expert rodentologists were brought from San Francisco and they have trapped as many as 7,724 rats in a single week.

It is a herculean job to ratproof an ancient rabbit-warren of a city like New Orleans. The city has been divided into districts, each under the charge of a doctor of the public health service, and a survey has been made of each district, of all rat-breeding or rat-harboring places noted; and now they are cleaning up the place.

Hard to Keep the Chinese Out of the United States

DETROIT, MICH.—If Uncle Sam would bar the Chinese bent on entering the United States, then the aged gentleman clad in glad raiment and high hat must stay awake every night in the year, so immigration authorities in Detroit aver. For John Chinaman is wily, and John Chinaman is shrewd when it comes to a realization of purposes. From the days of "Sand Lot Kearney" in San Francisco down to today, John Chinaman has shown a disposition to enter the United States whether the laws said him nay or yea.



Detroit immigration authorities estimate that a large number of Chinese successfully "smuggle" from Windsor to Detroit, and thence on to various destinations year in and year out. Withal, the immigration authorities have nipped many a smuggling "party" in the bud and in every instance where they do this they fine the "runner" and deport the would-be residents of this country.

The plan usually followed in Windsor and neighboring towns is for ten or twelve Chinese to gather in a laundry or store conducted by a "runner." The sum of either $200 or $300 is paid by each applicant who desires to get into the United States.

The money in hand, the chief runner makes ready for the night trip across the Detroit river. He places the party in charge of one or two aides, in many instances young white men who own launches. A landing is made at some point along the water front where cabs are in waiting for a quick run to Toledo.

HAMMOND GOVERNOR; CITIES PILE UP BIG LEAD

Republicans Carry Most of the Congressional Districts and Re-elect State Officers--G. O. P. Gains in Other States.

St. Paul, Nov. 9.—Winfield Scott Hammond, Democrat, has defeated William E. Lee, Republican, for the governorship of Minnesota by a plurality of over 15,000.

Andrist Next Highest.

C. M. Andrist, Democratic candidate for lieutenant governor, led the Democratic ticket on offices below the governor.

The eleven amendments are still in doubt, with the ninth, providing for reforestation of state lands, the only one appearing still to have a chance of passage.

An unexpected jump in Mr. Hammond's plurality came when complete returns from Stearns county were received. Stearns is a Democratic stronghold and it gave Hammond better than 3,000. The vote in Stearns county was: Lee, 798, Hammond, 5,209. Another county to help out the Democratic gubernatorial candidate was Dakota county, which increased his lead nearly 1,000.

The vote was the heaviest in the history of the state.

Cities Defeat Lee.

W. E. Lee, the Republican gubernatorial candidate, has a lead in the country, but his chances were hopelessly lost in a perfect deluge of votes from the population centers, all of which were Hammond's way. Ramsey county alone gave Mr. Hammond 13,000 more votes than his opponent, Mr. Lee.

The population centers elected Mr. Hammond. Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth each gave the Democratic candidate a handsome vote and his lead in the case of these three cities was augmented by returns from two-thirds of the second and third-class cities in the state. The country districts generally were with Mr. Lee.

Two Republicans Defeated.

The defeat of Congressman Stevens of St. Paul, for 18 years representative in Congress from the Fourth District, was one of the big surprises. Likewise the election of Thomas Schall, Progressive, in the new Tenth District.

The lone Democratic Congressman from Minnesota is Carl C. Van Dyke, and he got by with a lead of nearly 5,000. With all precincts heard from in the Fourth Congressional District, which takes in Ramsey county only, Van Dyke's vote is 15,151; Stevens, 11,265. There may be some corrections when the official canvass is made, but they will not materially affect Van Dyke's lead. Van Dyke is a young man untried in the political game and his success is regarded as phenomenal. The labor unions are credited with Stevens' defeat.

Wife Won for Schall.

The election of Thomas Schall, who will be known as "the blind congressman" from the New Tenth District, is credited to the activities of his wife, who was constantly with him during his campaign. At each meeting of voters where he spoke, Mrs. Schall mingled with those present and distributed cards which each voter was asked to sign. They were in effect pledges, and she secured nearly 15,000 signatures.

Lindberg Hard Pressed.

Dubois gave Lindberg a close call in the Sixth District. Partial returns credit Dubois with 4,254 and Lindberg 3,785 votes, but the capital count will give Lindberg a lead. His majority, however, will be small. Congressman Miller in the Eighth, Steenerson in the Ninth, Anderson in the First, Charley Davis in the Third and Volsted in the Seventh, the present Republican incumbents, were returned.

Congressman Anderson in the First district will have a majority of at least 5,000. Witherstine of Rochester was his Democratic opponent. Frank Ellsworth in the Second, Congressman Hammond's district, will win out by at least 5,000.

Returns indicate that Ole Sageng of Ottertail county, a candidate for the senate, has pulled through. The report is that he defeated A. G. Anderson, his rival, by 123. Early returns were that he had been beaten.

The only changes in the legislative make-up occasioned by late returns is the election of Olaf Gjerset as state senator over C. M. Anderson. Both are of Montevideo. Mr. Gjerset is law partner of Attorney General Lyndon A. Smith.

State Officers Re-elected.

St. Paul.—Despite the fact that the gubernatorial race was close, the Republican nominees for state offices apparently have been elected without exception.

J. A. A. Burnquist, present lieutenant governor, is re-elected by a large plurality. There was not much evidence that those who scratched Mr. Lee for Mr. Hammond extended the courtesy to Charles M. Andrist, Democratic nominee for lieutenant governor.

J. A. O. Preus will be the next state auditor. He was forced by illness to abandon his campaign, but the voters give him a vote which places him already far in the lead of his Democratic opponent, A. J. Rush.

O. P. B. Jacobson, Republican nominee for railroad and warehouse commissioner, also is assured that the voters have preferred him to Loren A. Smith of Martin County, his Democratic farmer opponent.

Lyndon A. Smith Wins.

The voters approved the administration of Lyndon A. Smith and have re-elected him attorney general. Neil M. Cronin of Minneapolis was the Democratic nominee and throughout the campaign made a splendid empression all over the state, but the odds against him were too great and he must yield to the present attorney general, though not without the satisfaction of polling a fine complimentary vote.

Julius Schmahl is re-elected Secretary of State by a big vote. N. M. Bergheim was his Democratic opponent, but was practically unheard from during the campaign.

Winfield Scott Hammond.

State Treasurer Re-elected.

As usual, Walter J. Smith, present state treasurer, walks off with that office. The vote puts him far and away ahead of E. M. Engelbret, Democratic nominee. The Democrats possibly saw the hoplessness of the race before he started for little has been heard from him during the battle.

Democratic Majority Reduced.

New York, Nov. 6.—Latest returns from Tuesday's election indicate that the Democratic majority in the house of representatives for the Sixty-fourth congress will be reduced to twenty-five. The probable Democratic majority in the senate will be fourteen.

Party Representation in House.

Of the six missing districts it is estimated that the Republicans and Democrats have elected three each.

Heaviest Republican gains resulting in almost overwhelming the Democratic majority, were 13 in Illinois, 12 in New York, 11 in Pennsylvania and 9 in Ohio.

Penrose and Cannon Win.

New York, Nov. 5.—Sweeping Republican gains throughout the country, which reached a climax in this state by the overwhelming victory of Charles S. Whitman for governor and James W. Wadsworth to succeed Elihu Root in the United States senate, were indicated in late returns of the general election.

Heavy falling off of the Progressive vote in many states, the return to congress of former Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, decisive Republican gains in New York and Illinois in the house membership, and the overwhelming defeat of Representative A. Mitchell Palmer by Senator Boise Penrose in Pennsylvania, were features of the early returns.

Democratic leaders, however, were pleased by a triumph in Massachusetts where former Representatives Samuel W. McCall was defeated for the governorship by Governor Walsh.

Indiana Goes Democratic.

Senator Shivley, Democrat, found in the Indiana early returns a strong opponent in Hugh Miller, the Republican candidate, with former Senator Beveridge, the Progressive candidate, polling a smaller vote than had been expected. Senator Shively's vote began to pick up later and administration leaders claim his re-election by 25 to 30 thousand.

The triumph of Senator Penrose in Pennsylvania over A. Mitchell Palmer, Democrat, who was one of the original supporters of Woodrow Wilson, and Gifford Pinchot, Progressive, was overwhelming.

South Remains "Solid."

Democratic senators in the south were re-elected without difficulty, new senators from southern states chosen being Representative Oscar Underwood of Alabama and Representative Thomas W. Hardwick of Georgia. Former Governor J. C. W. Beckham, Democrat, of Kentucky, was chosen for the long term.

Illinois Republicans Returned.

Other Illinois Republicans who were turned out of the House in the last Democratic landslide who will be returned to Congress were William V. McKinley, Charles E. Fuller and John A. Sterling.

Sereno E. Payne, Republican, of New York, one of the oldest members of the House in point of service, was re-elected without difficulty.

Few Turn-Overs.

Election of state officers resulted in a few turn-overs. In New York Governor Glynn, the Democratic candidate for re-election, was defeated decisively by District Attorney Whitman, Republican. Frederick M. Davenport, Progressive, in support of whose candidacy ex-President Roosevelt devoted most of the campaign, was left far in the rear, his vote being exceeded by that of William Sulzer.

In Tennessee also a change of party control was indicated. Early returns pointed to the defeat of Governor Ben W. Hooper, the Republican incumbent, by Thomas Rye, Democrat.

In Pennsylvania, where occurred one of the most spirited campaigns, Martin G. Brumbaugh, Republican, early took a long lead over Vance McCormick, Democratic candidate for governor who was idorsed by the Progressives.

Sherman Beats Roger Sullivan.

Chicago, Nov. 6.—Lawrence Y. Sherman, Republican, was re-elected to the United States Senate over Roger C. Sullivan, Democrat, by an estimated plurality of 6,000 or more, according to the latest returns from Tuesday's election. Raymond Robbins, Progressive, ran a poor third. With only [illegible] small rural districts to hear from [illegible] an average plurality of 22 to the precinct for Sherman outside of Chicago, Sherman's downstate lead was 62,631, as against a plurality for Sullivan in Cook county of 56,599.

HAMMOND'S STATEMENT.

Congressman Hammond said:

"The returns seem to justify my faith that the people of Minnesota would repudiate the character of campaign made against me.

"It is my ambition that I shall prove entirely worthy of the distinction the people have conferred upon me. The office of Governor of Minnesota opens up opportunity with a big 'O.'

"I am pleased to find that the citizens of my home city have given me a fine plurality and it seems sure that I will carry my own congressional district. Both of these things appeal to me as especially gratifying."

GOV. McGOVERN LOSES LEAD

Husting, Democrat, Slightly Ahead for Senator—Recount May Be Necessary.

Milwaukee, Wis., Nov. 7.—An official count of the votes cast in Wisconsin for United States Senator appears to be the only way of arriving at a definite conclusion as to whether Paul O. Husting, Democrat, or Governor Francis E. McGovern, Republican, has been elected United States Senator to succeed Isaac Stephenson. Unofficial returns received from every county in Wisconsin by the Milwaukee Journal give Husting 122,315 and McGovern 120,760, or a plurality of 1,555 for Husting. Inaccuracies in tabulation and various changes in figures sent in from several counties throughout the day caused the advantage to shift several times from one candidate to the other, causing much bewilderment.

In figuring out the results in such a close contest, the "second choice" votes may possibly figure in favor of either candidate. However, reports received on the second choice from several counties indicate that these votes slightly favor Hustings.

Hanna in North Dakota.

Grand Forks, N. D., Nov. 5.—Governor L. B. Hanna has a majority of about 10,000 over Frank O. Hellstrom, Democratic nominee for Governor. A. J. Gronna defeated W. E. Purcell for United States senator by a majority of almost the same proportion, while three congressional candidates of Republicans are safe by big majorities.

Republicans were victorious in the entire congressional and state ticket being elected.

The Democrats, however, have made big gains in many sections, particularly in the congressional ticket, but their gains were not sufficient to overturn the heavy normal Republican majorities.

Whitman May Oppose Wilson.

Washington, Nov. 6.—President Wilson has begun his actual preparations for the 1916 presidential campaign. The president is convinced that one of two men will be his republican opponent in the race. They are Charles S. Whitman, governor-elect of New York, and Frank B. Willis, governor-elect of Ohio. The main factor about the Whitman presidential candidacy which worries the president most is his triumph over the personal opposition of former President Roosevelt. Whitman has tried the Roosevelt steel and he has broken it.

Result of Prohibition Fights.

Chicago, Nov. 5.—Prohibition was defeated in four states, with both sides claiming victory in a fifth. California and Washington voted against the ousting of saloons and alcoholic manufacturers. Arizona decided to remain wet. Colorado is claimed by both factions. Ohio defeated a prohibition amendment also. Illinois "drys" claimed a victory in electing a State Legislature composed of a majority of Prohibition advocates.

GENERAL SHIFTING OF WORKING ORDER IN LOWER HOUSE

MANY CHANGES IN ORGANIZATION AS CONSEQUENCE OF REDUCED MAJORITY WILL BE FORCED ON DEMOCRATS.

SHIFT OF 12 VOTES WOULD GIVE MINORITY CONTROL

Republicans Likely to Gain Larger Representation on Committees and Progressives Lose What They Had, Due to Election Changes —"Uncle Joe" to Be Back.

Washington, Nov. 7.—Many changes in the organization of the house of representatives will be made when Champ Clark and "Uncle Joe" Cannon once more face each other across the center aisle at the beginning of the next congress. The dwindling of the Democratic majority, which will drop after the close of the December session from 40 to 24 will necessitate a general shifting of the working order in the house.

Perfect Organization Necessary.

With their slender majority, the Democrats, while able to re-elect Speaker Clark and retain control of the committees will be forced to maintain an almost perfect organization. With a full attendance in the house a shift of 12 votes would thrown the control to the minority side.

Practically complete returns give the Democrats 229, Republicans 196, Progressives 7, Socialists 1, Independents 1, and doubtful 1. This would give the Democrats a plurality of 33 over the Republicans and of 24 over the combined opposition.

This narrow margin will probably result in a rearrangement of committee representation, the Democrats now holding overwhelming majorities in all of the standing committees. The falling off of the Progressives from 19 in the present house to 7, probably will cut their committee representation materially, and even may lose them the few important places they hold in the present house.

Kitchin Probable Leader.

Democratic leadership in the House will undergo great changes. Representative Underwood was elected to the Senate and will leave the House at the close of the December session. Representative Kitchin, of North Carolina, the ranking Democrat on the ways and means committee, will claim the Democratic leadership by right of seniority and is expected to have the support of southern Democrats generally.

Representative Mann of Illinois undoubtedly will retain the Republican leadership, facing the Democrats with formidable support. His ranks will include, besides former Speaker Cannon, numerous other Republicans who have recaptured the places they lost in the 1912 campaign.

Five Tariff Framers Out.

The election will vacate five of the fourteen Democratic places on the ways and means committee, which framed the Underwood tariff law. Representative Underwood goes to the Senate. Representative Hammond was elected governor of Minnesota. Representative Mitchell of Massachusetts, who succeeded Representative Peters on the committee when the latter became assistant secretary of the treasury, was defeated at the polls.

Representative Palmer of Pennsylvania surrendered his seat to run for the Senate and was defeated and Representative Stanley of Kentucky sought the senatorial nomination in Kentucky and lost his place. Representative Murdock of Kansas, the Progressive leader and member of the committee, lost his seat in an effort to go to the Senate.

Other Committee Changes.

Two Democratic members of the rules committee will not return. The labor committee lost two Democrats. Four Democratic members of the banking and currency committee failed to be re-elected. The Democrats also lost five members who were on the military affairs committee, the Republicans one and the Progressives one. The judiciary committee will be practically unchanged.

In the Senate the indicated increase in the Democratic majority was welcomed by administration leaders, who have been hampered during the present Congress by the narrow margin of their control.

U. S. Acts For Turkey.

Washington, Nov. 6.—The United States embassy has taken charge over Turkish affairs in London.

Kansas City Pens Destroyed.

Kansas City, Nov. 9.—Twenty-five acres of cattle pens, one-third of the local stock yards, were destroyed with a loss estimated at three-quarters of a million dollars by a fire that was still burning today. Three men were injured by burns and falling timbers. While it was impossible then to determine the full extent of the damage it was apparent that the local yards would be seriously crippled in handling the unusually heavy shipments of stock expected here as the result of the quarantine of the Chicago yards.

SOME TERRIBLE WAR BILLS

That of the United States Government Heads the List in Point of Size.

The wars of Napoleon in 13 years cost France $1,000,000,000 writes Wendell Phillips Dodge in Leslie's. Our Civil war expenditures of the Civil government amounted to $3,400,000,000, or nearly thirteen times as much a year as Napoleon's. The Franco-German war cost France $1,580,000,000, besides an added war indemnity of $1,000,000,000. This same great war, which lasted only 190 days, cost Germany $450,000,000 for an average fighting force of 1,250,000 men. The other big European war of the past half century, the Russo-Turkish war, cost Russia $786,140,000, but she had two years' fighting for her money. The war in the far East cost Japan $650,000,000 and Russia $723,000,000, not counting lost ships. Only toward the end had either side anything like a million men in the field. Italy's little war with Turkey cost $400,000 a day, allowing for a mere 60,000 fighting men; and the Boer war, in which England's army averaged 200,000, cost $1,055,000,000 in two and a half years.

Preparing for Eventualities.

Shortly after the declaration of war in Germany, the cashier of the largest bank in Berlin received from a stranger the following letter, postmarked Dresden:

"Dear Sir: A few weeks ago, while in Berlin on my vacation, I found myself temporarily in need of money and pawned my diamond ring. I enclose the pawn ticket to you, asking that you redeem the ring, sell it for what you can and turn the proceeds over to the Red Cross fund. It may be that I shall have no further use for jewels."

Likes Sensible Women.

Montague Glass, the author of "Perlmutter and Potash," says that he would not marry a woman who did not have sense enough to want equal rights for her sex. He has a wife who, needless to say, comes up to his expectations of what a sensible woman should be.

The Ambition of Mark Truitt

By
HENRY RUSSELL MILLER

Author of
"THE MAN HIGHER UP," "HIS RISE TO POWER," Etc.

(Copyright, 1913, by The Bobbs-Merrill Company)

SYNOPSIS.

Mark Truitt, encouraged by his sweetheart, Unity Martin, leaves Bethel, his native town, to seek his fortune. Simon Truitt tells Mark that it long has been his dream to see a steel plant at Bethel and asks the son to return and build one if he ever gets rich. Mark applies to Thomas Henley, head of the Quinby Iron works, for a job and is sent to the construction gang. His success in that work wins him a place as helper to Roman Andrzejski, open-hearth furnaceman. He becomes a boarder in Roman's home and assists Piotr, Roman's son, in his studies. Kazia, an adopted daughter, shows her gratitude in such a manner as to arouse Mark's interest in her. Heavy work in the intense heat of the furnace causes Mark to collapse and Kazia cares for him. Later Roman also succumbs and Mark gets his job. Roman resents this and tells Mark to find another boarding place. Five years elapse during which Mark has advanced to the foremanship, while his labor-saving devices have made him invaluable to the company. In the meantime Kazia has married one Jim Whiting. Mark meets with an accident which dooms him to be a cripple for life. He returns to Bethel intending to stay there. He finds Unity about to marry another man and wins her back. Unity urges him to return to his work in the city.

CHAPTER XII—Continued.

There had been a snow, hard packed by traffic, and the blacks caught the sleigh swiftly along through the dusk. When the crowded business section lay behind them, Henley remarked casually:

"I saw your little charity back there."

"He was a cripple."

"I see," Henley nodded. "That's your greatest asset."

"What is?"

"Your health."

"My lack of it, you mean," Mark answered grimly. "But I don't quite get your point of view."

"It keeps you from making a fool of yourself. There's Hare, for instance, a capable man, drinking himself into incompetency. And Harmon, with his women. For them prosperity means indulgence. You keep your appetites under control."

"I have to."

"Exactly my point." For a few blocks Henley apparently gave himself over wholly to the agreeable exercise of breathing in the keen frosty air. When he resumed, no one could have guessed from his tone that he was working toward a given point. "Higsbee's case is worse. One woman."

"Has he—"

"His wife. A smooth catty creature, with a craze for display. Married him after he made his stake, of course. Always nagging him for new jewels, new carriages, a new—house. Makes him dress for dinner. Drags him around to dances and receptions and box parties—when 30 minutes of that takes it out of him more than 12 hours at the rolls used to." Mark might have been sitting for his portrait. "Egging him on until he's scheming as unscrupulously as a toothless old dowager to get into society—or what with her passes for society. He spent six months beating about the bush to get me to send my wife around to call on her. Queer, how a big talented man will let a pretty useless woman pull him around by the ears!"

"Damned queer!" said Mark.

"I suppose we, who aren't in the same case, can't understand it."

Henley, Mark thought, seemed to understand it very well.

A few minutes more brought them dashing up to a stop under the porte-cochere of Henley's big house.

"Much obliged for the lift," said Henley as he sprang out of the sleigh. He added casually, "Er—by the way, I think I heard my wife say she was planning to call on Mrs. Truitt in the near future."

Despite a quick flush, Mark looked at him steadily. "Higsbee, then, was a parable?"

"By no means," Henley returned blandly. "It seems they have met at St. Swithin's and were—mutually interested." He paused, but as no reply came from Mark, continued in the impersonal tone of one who philosophizes generally. "After all, there's a Higsbee in all of us. We affect to jeer at this society thing. But we want our wives to have the best. It's more comfortable, too. And besides, when a man has a charming wife, he can't hide her light under a bushel. Good night."

"Good night. Especially," Mark muttered to himself, "when she proposes to let it shine." He gave the reins an angry jerk. The horses leaped and raced down the driveway and into the street. The music of the sleigh bells rang merrily on the keen air.

Once he laughed aloud, sneeringly. "Complaisant toady!" He did not refer to Henley. He had, in fact, himself in mind. One can not well openly resent the insolent if friendly interest—even in one's domestic affairs—of the man whose eccentric favor spells prosperity. Still it stings, especially when it argues a shrewd guess as to the fact. And the fact was, Superintendent Truitt's domestic estate, like the neighborhood in which he lived, left something to be desired.

He stopped at a brick house that differed from its neighbors only in that the lot was wide enough to allow for a driveway to the little stable in the rear. A groom, who had come to the front in answer to the summons of the bells, took the team.

Mark, leaning hard on his cane, limped stiffly up the terrace steps to the porch. The parlor—Unity was beginning to refer to it, not easily, as the drawing room—was lighted, the shades were not drawn.

Unity was reclining in graceful attitude—she could be relied upon to present graceful poses at all times—in a big easy chair. Her gown, of some soft, pale green stuff, vastly became her and, as did every detail of her from the carefully achieved coiffure to the black velvet slippers that peeped out from beneath her skirt, avouched the fact that Unity had mastered more than the rudiments of the art of personal decoration.

He went into the house, doffed his heavy overcoat and limped into the drawing room. Unity did not by so much as a glance around disturb her graceful pose until he was at her side. Then she languidly held up a hand to him.

He brushed it with his lips. "You're looking scrumptious, Unity." He went so far as to give a brief admiring pat to her hair.

She moved petulantly. "Don't! You'll muss my hair."

He dropped her hand. "That would be a shame, wouldn't it?"

He sat down near her. She sighed. The sigh, one might have thought, was one of alarm and was because she had noted his pallor, which even after the spirited drive was so pronounced.

"Been a hard day?" But the question was not Unity's. She had not marked his air of exhaustion or, if she had, was so used to it that she was not concerned.

"So hard!" She sighed again very plaintively. "So very exciting! And you know how excitement always affects me."

"Yes, I know." Just the edges of his satirical smile showed again. "What has been the particular excitement today?"

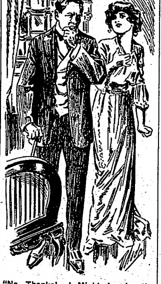
"Mrs. Henley called!"

"Yes?" Mark's voice did not reveal the interest so epochal an event demanded.

"Yes?" mimicked Unity. "Is that all you can say? But I suppose, of course, you don't care, though you know what it means to me."

"Just what does it mean to you, Unity?"

"It means," somewhat dithyrambically, "that I have won the friendship I have tried so hard for three years to win."



"No, Thanks! I Might Acquire the Taste."

"Then she came up to the plans and specifications?"

"She's a dear. So sweet and refined! So intelligent and ambitious! It's no wonder a man with such a wife has got as far as Mr. Henley has. Though I suppose he would never give her credit."

"I fancy Henley does her justice," Mark ventured.

"That is more," Unity's tone was one of patient dignified reproach, "than some people I know do for their wives."

Habit put a seal on his lips.

From lesser beginnings the Truitts had found, in the earlier years of their marriage, steel and tinder for quarrels—nasty quarrels in which tempers were lost and cutting words spoken and that invariably had the same issue—the husband, humiliated by the sordidness of it, suing for peace. But that stage had passed. Now, at the first sign of hostilities, he promptly hung out a white flag.

She eyed him covertly for a little. "I was so ashamed this afternoon," she murmured at last pathetically.

He opened his eyes with a start; he had almost slept. "Ashamed—? Oh, yes—Mrs. Henley. What did you do?"

"I did nothing. It was this house. I could see her looking around at all this and trying to hide her amusement over it. Though she was careful not to take too much pains to hide it."

"But, for a friend, isn't that—"

"Oh, you can't understand. Or won't," she amended bitterly. "You've no conception of the pride a woman likes to have in her home. Of course, she looked down on this. Anybody would."

"We used to think it mighty fine. In Bethel we never dreamed of anything so good."

"You didn't. But I did," she retorted. "Besides, we aren't in Bethel now. We're here and growing rich. And we ought to live like the rest of our kind."

"Just what is our kind, Unity?"

"If you didn't have me to give you ambition, we'd still be homely dowdy nobodies."

"Then we are somebodies?"

"We can be. We're going to be." She sat up suddenly, her thin lips tightening. "Mark, we must—we simply must—move. We can afford it, I know."

"Yes, we can do it." He made a gesture of resignation. "But it will clean me out of ready cash."

"You can make more," said Unity negligently. "You're so clever at that. And besides, what's the use of having money if it doesn't buy the things we want?"

"For one thing," he smiled grimly, "I can't get insurance, and men have been known to die and leave their widows penniless. However," he rose with an evident effort, "we've gone over all this a hundred times. I'll see."

Yielding was in his voice.

She fell back into her languid graceful pose. She gave him her very sweetest smile, which she meant to seem lovingly grateful. He saw in it only triumph.

"You can be such a dear!" she purred. "I'm so proud of you! And now you'd better hurry and dress. You know the Higsbees are coming for dinner."

He repressed an oath. "I'd forgotten." And he limped heavily from the room.

In his own room he dropped on the bed, yielding for a brief interval to the pain and weakness of which it was his pride never to give a sign before others.

He descended barely in time to join Unity in greeting their guests.

He did not see a deeper vanity in his feeling of superiority over his guests. Higsbee was a big beefy man, red of countenance and with a raucous voice that grated on Mark's nerves. He was rough, not to say boisterous, in manner, and his notion of wit was veiled smuttiness—essays to which Unity, incomparable hostess! paid the perfect compliment of a shocked laugh and a blush.

The dinner was well cooked and served, which was not always true when the Truitts dined alone. Mark ate sparingly, the while eying covetously the viands with which he dared not indulge himself. He talked little, neither Higsbee's coarse daring nor the ladies' light gossip of plays, latest books and mutual acquaintances—especially of mutual acquaintances—being fields in which he felt at home. But he was secretly much amused when to Unity's casual mention of Mrs. Henley's call, Mrs. Higsbee replied with the invidious suggestion that Mrs. Henley was a good deal of a snob. And when Unity countered sweetly, "Do you think so? I haven't found her so," he chuckled aloud.

He explained the chuckle. "One mustn't look a gift horse in the mouth." At which crude remark Higsbee guffawed, Mrs. Higsbee tittered maliciously and Unity looked pained. All three had a suspicion of what he knew—that Mrs. Henley's call had been under orders, a gift from Henley.

Later he smoked, slowly and very appreciatively, a mild cigar, which lasted until Higsbee had consumed the second.

"How," Higsbee asked once, untactfully, "did you get Henley to send his wife around?"

Mark resented the question. "I didn't get him to."

"No?" Higsbee looked a bit incredulous. "Well, you certainly do stand well with him. Say, if you get a chance, I wish you'd drop him a hint that we'd be glad to have her call."

"I'm afraid," Mark said coldly, "Henley isn't a man to take that sort of a hint kindly."

"I wish you would," Higsbee urged. "Mrs. H. is crazy for it. And I reckon," he laughed lumberingly, "the best way is to get a woman what she wants. It's comfortablest, anyhow."

"I haven't found it so," Mark lied, adopting Unity's tactics, and promptly changed the subject.

But at last the Higsbees left.

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed Mark. "And to think that that man is one of the best labor handlers in the country!"

"Bourgeois!" Unity gave a shrug and a nod to include the departed guests.

"Spell it."

Unity complied.

"Hmm! I happen to know what it means." He gave her a look of mock admiration. "Unity, you're a wonder. You've got the nerve of a winner. You travel too fast a gait for me. Who could believe that less than six years ago you were back in Bethel, keeping company with tight-fisted Bill Slocum."

But Unity was too well pleased with herself just then to resent this cruel reminder. "Don't you see why I am so anxious to get up above such people?"

"I can see," he said, "I shall have to give in."

She went to him with a little cuddling movement, locking both hands over one of his shoulders and looking up at him. She made a pretty picture. A mirror over the mantle reflected it for him.

"Oh, Mark, you make me so happy! Tell me the truth. Aren't you glad I made you come back to the city, and that we've got so far—and that we're going so much farther?"

"You insist upon the truth?" He looked thoughtfully at the reflection. "Well, I suppose I must be. Otherwise you couldn't force me to buy the new house, even though you are a very capable bully—"

"Bully!"

"Exactly. Only," he continued, "I still have a sense of proportion. We are rather absurd, you and I, Unity."

She laughed contentedly. "I know you. It's like you to growl when you're doing a specially nice thing." She held up her lips to him.

"And is this my reward? Magnificent!" But he did not kiss her. He looked curiously at her. Long ago he had been undeceived. He knew that the shallow tenderness and admiration summoned by her sweetness of flesh and perfect grooming were not love. He gently disengaged himself.

"No, thanks! I might acquire the taste. And it's too expensive." He limped away from her and pretended to examine a book that lay on the piano.

She assumed an air of gentle reproach. "Oh, Mark, you don't mean that?"

She did not detect the warning note in his laugh.

"Oh, no! Of course not!"

He returned to her. They kissed.

CHAPTER XIII.

Trophies.

"Meteoric" was the word most often used to describe Truitt's rise. It was a career possible only in his chosen industry and at that time when, no matter how fast plants were multiplied and new devices adopted, the output could not keep pace with the world's insistent demand for steel. It did not differ notably from the careers of several other young superintendents of the Quinby company, save in the one particular, that Henley's preference had deepened into something approximating friendship. On Mark's side the friendship was not open to question; his admiration and liking for Henley were unbounded and not dependent on favors received.

The Truitts had moved into their new house. It was a rambling, red-brick, ivy-grown structure containing eighteen rooms and surrounded by wide neglected grounds, and had been built half a generation before as a wedding present to Timothy Woodhouse III.

For several months Mark secretly congratulated himself on the purchase. Unity had the new house to wander over and admire. She had four servants to direct. Within the allotted time she had returned Mrs. Henley's call, and after an anxious period, Mrs. Henley called again; seeing which, certain other ladies of St. Swithin's who had attained the half-way station where they were very careful upon whom they left cards, called and invited her to share the activities of the guilds. All of which made for happiness, content. Unity found little to criticize, she was engrossed with the game of being a fine lady, which she felt sure was her vocation.

Thus peace abode in the Truitt household and Mark, freed from the irritation of constant bickering, was enabled to give himself wholly to work. He did not realize that during this truce he grew away from his wife more rapidly than when domestic inharmony kept her constantly in his thoughts. During these months he completed his improved process for rolling steel cold, which made some noise in the industrial world.

But there is nothing to which our species so readily adapts itself as to luxury. Content dissolved. Unity began to complain of the heavy labor of ordering so big a house. She resumed her criticisms of Mark, finding fault with his fashion of dress, his manners, his habits and his neglect of her. She was seized with a devouring mania for amusement, filling the house almost every evening with guests and demanding that Mark perform his duties as host. Other evenings she dragged him to the theater, which he detested. When he, rendered peevish by late hours and boredom, suggested that there were matinees, she put on an injured air that was more irritating to him than outright distemper.

"Other men are glad to go out with their wives."

"Other men don't have to work so hard as I do."

"You think of nothing but money."

"Devilish lucky for you," he was indiscreet enough to retort; and she did not emerge from her sulks for several days.

But at last the gnawing canker was disclosed. One evening so stormy that no guests had come, Unity went up to his study where he was making the most of this respite. She talked ramblingly for a while.

"Well, Unity, out with it!" he exclaimed impatiently, after several minutes. "What do you want? As you see, I've got a great deal to do."

"I wonder what is the matter with Mrs. Henley?"

"You ought to know. You see her often enough, don't you?"

"Yes, I see her—at church! And we call. But she never invites us to the things she gives. I wonder why?"

"Probably because she doesn't want us."

Unity looked her protest at this blunt speech. But she did not abandon her project.

"I should think, if you're such good friends with Mr. Henley, you could manage it easily enough."

"Now you can stop right there," he answered emphatically. "I'm pretty soft, but there's one thing I draw the line at. And that's 'managing' to get invited to other people's houses. That's flat!"

And on that he was firm, though he was made to pay in many ways for his refusal.

But in due time and without management a dinner invitation came; on whose initiative, being a secret neither Henley nor his wife has ever disclosed. Hence we may not speak surely as to the accuracy of certain inferences that Unity drew.

"You see!" she cried, showing the note to Mark. Her manner said plainly, "I alone did it, in spite of the indifference of my husband."

"I see," he responded dryly. "Are you going?"

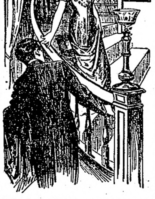
She treated this question to the contemptuous silence it deserved.

And as Mark stood in the hall and watched her descending the stairs for the start, he was bound to confess that she made a fair—oh, a very fair—picture.

"Why," he wondered, "did the Almighty make so pretty a shell and put nothing in it?" This seems to prove that he had been pretty effectually disillusioned.

However careless he might affect to be, he was himself keenly elated over the event. Often he had asked himself why Henley, so friendly in all else, had never let down the bars before his home. And as he mounted the steps toward the opening door, he could not repress the thrill of exultation.

He had need of the stimulus of this exultation as he and Unity faced that roomful of people who—well, were in longer practice at this sort of thing than was he. He limped, with something less than Unity's aplomb, across the room to meet his hostess, who murmured graciously something quite unintelligible, and Henley, who seemed rather bored. Then he was introduced to his dinner partner, Mrs. Belloc, who mistook his set expression for sternness, and was in the end led by her without mishap to their places near Henley's end of the table.



"Why," He Wondered, "Did the Almighty Make So Pretty a Shell and Put Nothing in It?"

He had no small talk and Mrs. Belloc, after one or two barren essays, allowed him a breathing spell.

Unity was at the very apex of her existence. She was the prettiest woman present, with the loveliness of physical full bloom just before it begins to fade. Her heart's desire had been granted—no longer must she be content with carelessly tossed crumbs and crusts of preferment; she sat, both literally and figuratively, at the table of the city's elect.

The salad was being served when Mrs. Saunders turned to Mark. Mrs. Saunders was one of the insecure ladies who, following Mrs. Henley's example, had called upon Unity. She had just been listening, too long for patience, to her partner's praise of Mrs. Truitt.

"I should think you'd be jealous. Mr. Hare is more than enthusiastic over your wife tonight."

"How very tactless!"

"Oh, no!" said Mrs. Saunders sweetly. "I quite agree with him. I think she's adorable. She reminds me so much of that portrait by—you know, the one that hangs in the Louvre."

"But I don't know. I've never been in the Louvre."

"Oh! I thought everybody had been there."

"You see, Mrs. Saunders, I'm not anybody."

"You would say that, of course. One hears—"

"But it's quite true. To prove it, I've never been east of this city. In fact, the first time I came to this house—not so very long ago—I peeked through the window at the party. Henley caught me." He grinned wryly. "The next day I got a job handling pick and shovel."

"How very romantic!"

"You wouldn't call it romantic, if you'd been in Houlahan's gang."

"And then, of course," Mrs. Saunders beamed, "you set out to win the princess?"

"The princess? Oh! my wife. Yes, I suppose so."

"She has always lived in the city, hasn't she?"

"You'd think so, wouldn't you?" Mark glanced critically at Unity. "But she hasn't. Eight years ago she was living in Bethel. And Bethel, Mrs. Saunders, you'll never find on the map."

"Oh!" Mrs. Saunders said innocently. "I had inferred—but that perfect manner! She must have acquired it at her finishing school?"

Mark chuckled. "Finishing school! I wish you could see Miss Smith's seminary for young ladies. It isn't even a starter."

Mrs. Saunders laughed admiringly. "How very clever! I must tell your wife."

She leaned forward a little toward Unity. "Oh, Mrs. Truitt—"

Unity gave ear.

"I must tell you the clever thing your husband just said. We were talking about your school—Miss Smith's seminary, wasn't it? And I called it a finishing school. And Mr. Truitt said"—Mrs. Saunders' voice carried well—"it isn't even a starter. Awf'ly good, I think." A faint titter ran down the table. "Ah—where is Miss Smith's seminary, Mrs. Truitt?"

It was Henley himself, strange to relate, who came to Unity's rescue.

"Never, Mrs. Saunders," he remarked, with an edge to his voice that the men recognized, "never uncover the past—here, at least. Only the other day Saunders was telling me he often wakes up in a cold sweat, because he has heard in his dreams, 'Dig in, ye tarrier!'"

The men all laughed reminiscently. Unity and Mrs. Saunders exchanged sweetest smiles. The dinner resumed its even tenor.

"Now," Mark grimly reminded himself, "I've let myself in for it."

But anger was surging. He deemed that, through Unity, he had been made ridiculous.

The evening passed. Mark handed a smiling Unity into their carriage. Not a word passed between them during the drive homeward, nor until they were in their house. Mark led the way to the library. The gas jets were not lighted, but the glow from a generous log fire threw their angry faces into sharp relief, as they faced each other.

"Well, Unity, I suppose we're going to have this thing out."

"How could you?" she began stormily. "And on this night of all nights! Didn't you know she was leading you on?"

"Yes—when it was too late."

"The sugary jealous snob! She thinks because she's been abroad and came from Philadelphia she's so aristocratic. And you—you—helped her to shame me before them all."

"How could I know that my wife had been—fibbing about her antecedents?"

"Would you have me admit them to her and have her patronizing me? Haven't you any pride?"

"Haven't you any self-resp—"

But the bitter retort was halted, bitten off by the quick tightening of his jaws. When he resumed, he spoke in a slow, distinct, quiet voice that Unity had never heard.

"On second thought, we will not have this out. We couldn't agree as to where the offense lies. No!" He raised a hand, sharply, in protest, as she began hotly to interrupt. "I mean that—quite. I'll remind you that I'm not a culprit boy but a husband—who has at last cut his leading strings. Also that we have had enough scenes in our pretty career together; one more would be too many."

"You take that tone—to me?"

"Even to you."

She stared, too amazed for anger.

"Why, what do you mean?"

"You may take it as a declaration of independence."

"Are you thinking," she gasped, "of—of divorce?"

"Not yet. That may come, though. It depends—" He even smiled.

She tried a weapon that had been effective, her pose of long-suffering injured innocence. But Unity, like all the pampered, was a coward. He was, intuition again told her, capable of carrying out the cool menace in his last words. The pose broke down miserably. Forgetting the anger in which she had come to the interview, she went toward him with a frightened whimpering cry.

"Oh, Mark!"

He turned away with a careless lift of his shoulders and a curt, "Good night."

* * * * * * *

Alone in his workroom he sat before the fire, staring despondently into the dancing flames.

"I have been a fool," he said. "I have given up enough. Now I will let go."

As well as he could, he tried to keep that promise to himself.

Test for Mental Deficiency.

A Belgian physician, Doctor Demoor, has been making observations on the capacity of different people for judging which of two weights is the heavier, and has satisfied himself that, while ordinary people, especially children, fail to appreciate a small difference, the reverse is the case with the imbecile, idiotic and half-witted. He prepared two bottles, differing in size, partly filled with a heavy mineral but covered all over with black paper and exactly equal in weight. These he handed to 380 children of from six to fifteen years of age. Of these 370 judged one bottle to be the heavier. The other ten said the two were the same weight. These ten children were all abnormal or degenerates.

How the Boy Scouts Help.

A story illustrating the helpfulness of Boy Scouts to those on the road is related by a correspondent.

"I had a puncture near Farnborough, Kent, a few days ago," he said, "and I was busily mending it when a troop of scouts came along and, to my surprise, the scoutmaster ordered them to halt.

"'Can we help you, sir?' he said. 'We have motoring experts in the troop.'

"Two very small scouts—who had proficiency badges for 'motor repairing' and 'puncture mending'—stepped forward and saluted. I am sorry I did not need help."—London Mirror.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Well we will get rid of Adolphus O. on January 1st, and there is some glory in that.

As The Eleven Towns have now moved to Goodridge, they are out of the territory for the publication of final proof notices.

Thief River Falls acted very fairly on the election of Superintendent of Schools, by dividing their votes and allowing the choice to be made by the country voters.

R. T. Buckler the anti County Option candidate defeated Sugstad the Option candidate, over in Polk County for State Senator. This has the appearance that the people are beginning to realize that there are other matters of vital interest to northern Minnesota, besides County Option.

With this issue the Herald is six months old and according to law, is from now on entitled to recognition by the U. S. Land Office at Crookston as a medium for the publication of final proof notices.—Oklee Herald.

Yes, so is The Minneapolis Tribune six months old, and entitled to publish final proof notices, but the trouble is there is no final proof notices to publish in their territory, and they are like the Herald, without circulation in the locality in which the final proofs are to be published.

One part of this campaign looks disgusting to us, and that is people voting for a Democratic governor, and the rest of the state ticket Republican. Why turn down the balance of the state Democratic ticket? All of those Democratic candidates for state office were honorable men, Why not vote for them as well as Hammond? With Hammond elected as governor this state passes into the Democratic column, and you might as well let the Democrats have a feed at the public crib, as to put them old fat fellows in for another term. Be a Democrat or a Republican, not a Mugwamp.

Two Germantown farmers reached Berlin on the day war was declared, and one of them was immediately pushed into the army to fight for the Kaiser. The other one, who is American born was not forced into the army, but was set to work on the farms, to take the place of men in the army. German-American citizens should keep away from that country at the present time, if they are not ready to fight for the Kaiser. However if they want to get mixed up in the European war they had better go over there, than to try to drag the war over to America.

The Farmers Alliance of 1892 reformed the methods of conducting the county offices of Polk County. At that time there was more or less talk of bonding, the county for this or that proposition, while the county officials were rolling in wealth. Last year the Register of Deeds of that county turned in over $7000 to the county treasurer's office for the benefit of the tax payers, while he got his check from the county for $1500 salary, and if Polk County should want to build a county hospital to-day, they would not have to bond the county to get money to build it. Which county should the baby Pennington pattern after, that county or Beltrami County? Graft and mismanagement ran riot in Beltrami County, until the governor had to intervene to stop it, and to-day they are rated rather light financially as compared with other counties in northern Minnesota.

The Thief River Falls News-Press is certainly entitled to credit for the fine and hasty report made of the county election. Few people who were smoking their cigars waiting to get these accurate returns realize the amount of enterprise and work it is to get them, and place them before the public at the first possible moment. The last week's issue of the News-Press was a credit to the publishers and the city of Thief River Falls, as it was the best report made of any county election in northern Minnesota.

AS TO MR. LEE'S RECORD.

Now that the campaign is over, and there is no longer any danger of hurting the candidacy of Mr. Lee, we want to say that the attacks made by the Democratic campaign speakers on the temperance record of Mr. Lee were facts, and we know they were facts from personal observation. We were a member of the 3rd House of the Legislature in 1893 during the entire session, and it was a surprise to us when Mr. Lee came up in this campaign as a County Optionist. Mr. Lee was speaker of the House, and J. D. Knuteson was our Populist member, indorsed by the Prohibitionists, but Mr. Knuteson's name was not mentioned by Mr. Lee, when he appointed the temperance committee.

Under the Green Light.

Cube sugar and ivory piano keys are inspected under the ghastly greenish rays of mercury vapor lamps with greater speed and accuracy than can be attained in ordinary daylight. Any impurity in sugar manifests itself by changing the white to a shade of yellow. To detect impurities, plates of the crystallized sugar one inch thick are examined by a man looking through them toward a mercury vapor lamp of the kind which is a familiar adjunct of the galleries of postcard photographers. When thus viewed, according to the Electrical World, the yellow impurities stand out clearly in the bluish green light. The color of ivory varies from the outside to the center of the tusk to such an extent that manufacturers sort the pieces into sixteen different shades. Formerly this sorting could be done only in bright daylight, but with the light of the mercury vapor lamp grading can be done without limitation at any hour of the twenty-four.

A Military Secret.

The plebe, sitting on the monument beside the first class man, looked across the river from West Point to Constitution island. The plebe was inquisitive. He wanted to know what the government intended to use Constitution island for. The first class man coughed discreetly, blushed and looked around him carefully for eavesdroppers.

"It isn't generally known," he said, "but you're a cadet now. If the signal corps experiments go through successfully they'll use it as an aviary." His voice dropped mysteriously.

"For birds, eh?" said the plebe. "Carrier pigeons?"

"Not exactly," answered the knowing one. "They'll be pigeots, as they call 'em—cross between a carrier pigeon and a parrot—to carry verbal messages, you know. Don't tell."

And the plebe didn't.—New York Post.

THE LOCAL NEWS

John Quirk was the first one to bring out the winter sleighs this morning.

C. L. Clark made a business trip to Thief River Falls and Red Lake Falls last Saturday.

We want to buy a few bushels of Marquis wheat for seed. Anyone having good clean seed of this variety, please let us know.

We note that Trovaton has advised Cutter to start reading the Bible a little. Surely that campaign was a warm one.

The Young Peoples' Society of Deer Park held their meeting at the residence of O. M. Mandt, on Sunday last, and a very nice program was rendered.

In our returns of election last week, we had it that A. B. Mandt was elected County Commissioner. This was a mistake as Mr. Peterson was elected from that district, chiefly from the Hickory township votes.

We had our first flurry of snow yesterday, about one inch, just to remind us that we lived in northern Minnesota, but we may have some fine Indian summer weather before it closes down for winter.

If your house and contents are heavily insured, you should be sure to have your winter's supply of potatoes and flour in an out building, so if the house SHOULD CATCH on fire they would not be burned.

We are publishing several cards of thanks this week, to the voters for favors received by those who won. Those who lost of course have nothing to say, but some of them might tell how it happened which would make interesting reading.

How long since you paid any subscription to this paper? This is the time of year that our bills as well as yours become due, and we ask those who know they are indebted on subscription to please remit one or two years subscription to this office.

Miss Myrtle Fuller, from Montana, is visiting her sister Mrs. Walter McAndress this week. Miss Fuller highly praises the climate of Montana, as she has a homestead farm on the Rosebud lands, which were opened for settlement two years ago.

Miss Lou Green won out for Superintendent of Schools of Red Lake County by an overwhelmingly majority. Miss Green's father is an old resident and prosperous farmer of that county, and Miss Green was raised and educated in that county, and when she became a candidate the people promptly saw to it that she was elected.

On Thanksgiving Day, November 26th, the Ladies Aid of Mayfield township, will hold an Auction Sale, in the Malone school house. In the forenoon from ten to twelve o'clock the children of the school will render a fine program, and at noon lunch will be served. The auctioning of the articles starts at one o'clock. Everybody invited to attend.

The discontinuing of the Highlanding post-office was a surprise to the common people, who were running around looking for an opportunity to mail letters. As the star route drivers do not deal in postage stamps or have to collect money from boxes the people can drive or walk five or six miles to get their stamps and mail their letters. Surely the mail service is advancing under the present administration.

Literary Tragedy.

Ned—That was a hard blow to literature yesterday. Ted—What was that? Ned—Why, lightning struck a house, setting fire to a magazine in the cellar, which exploded, shattering the first and second stories and killing two authors who were at work on the third story.

ACTION AGAINST FLORSHEIM FOR FARM DAMAGES

SHOE MANUFACTURER IS SUED BY NUMEROUS FARMERS IN THREE COUNTIES.

A large number of farmers in Polk, Pennington, and Red Lake Counties, residing along Clearwater river, have combined and brought suit against Simon Florsheim, a well known shoe manufacturer of Chicago, for $14000.00 alleged damages arising from the overflow of the river which occurred last June, and resulted in drowning out their crops, that the overflow was due to the negligent operation of the river Dam at Clearwater Lake, owned by Florsheim.

Florsheim made application to have the case transferred to the United States Court at Fergus Falls, the motion was argued before Judge Watts in District Court in Crookston, on Saturday afternoon.

STEENERSON EXPRESSES APPRECIATION FOR THE VOTE IN THE NINTH DISTRICT

To the People of the 9th Congressional District;

As the returns indicate my reelection to Congress by a large majority I take this opportunity to tender to the people my sincere and grateful thanks for this evidence of their continued confidence and esteem, and to assure them that this appreciation of my efforts to serve them in the past will be an incentive to highest effort in the future.

Respectfully,

One Way to View It.

Queen Victoria made a visit to the Trossachs in 1850. On the road between Callender and Kilmanog the Laird of Leny displayed a number of banners bearing words of welcome. But on the return to Callender the mottoes were indecipherable through the backs of the banners. Some one suggested that with a little extra expenditure "Welcome, Victoria," might have been inscribed on both sides. "There's nae need o' that," said old James Buchan of Kilmanog. "The queen will just think that the English letters as seen through the bunting are Gaelic."—London Express.

Welsh National Costume.

When the French made a half hearted attempt to invade Great Britain in 1797 a landing was made at Fishguard, Wales, but the soldiers of Napoleon were frightened off by the sight of a great number of Welsh girls and women, whom they mistook at a distance for soldiers on account of their red dresses and tall black hats. That is still the national costume of the Welsh women.

Poor Consolation.

"Better," the girl who had rejected him replied pointedly, "better from their point of view, because they may never be caught."—Exchange.

TOWER OF LONDON.

It Once Had a Menagerie With a Murderous Orang Outang.

It is not generally known that until the year 1834 there was a menagerie of wild beasts in the Tower of London. In his book, "London Survivals," the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield writes:

"A word or two may be said about this collection of beasts. It commenced with the present of three leopards from the Emperor Frederick to Henry III.—an appropriate gift, as our sovereign bore three of these animals on his shield of arms, and then a white bear was added, for which the sheriffs of London were ordered to provide a muzzle and an iron chain to secure him when out of the water and a long, stout cord to hold him when fishing in the Thames. We fear his successors at the zoological gardens do not enjoy the like diversion. Then came an elephant. In the time of Edward II. there was a lion, for which the sheriffs, who must have deemed these creatures troublesome beasts, had to provide daily a quarter of mutton.

"Paul Hentzner saw here in 1598 three lionesses, a lion of great size—called Edward VI. from his having been born in that reign—a tiger, a lynx, a wolf, 'exceedingly old,' a porcupine and an eagle. James I. often visited the menagerie and used to enjoy baiting the lion with dogs or seeing a fight between a bear and a lion. In 1754 there were two 'man tygers'—orang-outangs—one of which killed a boy by throwing a cannon ball at him."

DRYING OUT GASES.

Various Methods by Which the Moisture Is Eliminated.

In the manufacture of gases like oxygen, acetylene or illuminating gas, to be used immediately in chemical processes, it is often necessary to free them from all moisture.

One of the commonest means is to bubble the "wet" gas through concentrated sulphuric acid or through a heap of glass beads covered with this liquid. Concentrated sulphuric acid has a powerful tendency to absorb moisture from other substances—a property which is aptly illustrated when a splinter of wood is dipped into the liquid. The acid extracts from the cellulose (which is the principal constituent of wood) all the hydrogen and oxygen, which cellulose contains in just the proper proportions to form water. The only other component of cellulose is carbon, and this alone is left, leaving the wood charred as if by fire.

Another way to dry a gas is to pass it through small chunks of calcium chloride. This extracts water or vapor from everything.

The most efficient of all methods is that adopted by the bureau of standards at Washington, where a machine is used which, by lowering the temperature of the gas passed through it, freezes out all the moisture and leaves the gas absolutely dry.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Working Butter.

Butter is worked enough when the salt is evenly distributed. Just when this point has been reached cannot always be told from the appearance of the butter immediately after working. But butter that has not been sufficiently worked will show white streaks or mottles after five or six hours. Whenever such streaks occur the butter must be reworked until all the streaks have been removed. To avoid mottled or streaky butter the only safe rule to follow is to work the butter twice. The first time it is worked lightly, just enough to fairly distribute the salt. It is then allowed to stand six hours or longer, when white streaks will be noticeable. The butter is then worked again until the color is uniform.—Chicago News.

We Do It on the Fourth.

It is curious that the Fourth of July has become the American day of celebration, since it was on July 2 that congress passed the really important motion for independence, and the Fourth only saw the adoption of the Declaration. John Adams wrote to his wife: "The 2d day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations from one end of this continent to the other from this time forward for evermore." But they do it on the Fourth.—London Chronicle.

How Loch Awe Was Formed.

Highland tradition gives a quaint explanation of the creation of Loch Awe, that noble mirror of the mountains in the magnificent scenery of Argyllshire. The bed of the loch was once, it is said, a fertile valley, with a fairy spring, which had always to be kept covered, bubbling from the mountain side. A careless girl, however, having drawn water, forgot to recover the well. All through the night the spring flowed, and by the morning Loch Awe had come into being. No one need regret the carelessness of that highland lassie. Loch Awe is now one of the most exquisite of beauty spots in Great Britain—a charming sheet of water, studded with pretty islands, while around the shores are many places associated with interesting legends and historic incidents of the highlands.—London Answers.

I Want Some U. S. Cartridges

U. S. Cartridges have won more Government tests than all other makes combined. World's Championship Rifle Teams habitually use U. S. Cartridges.

The U. S. Primer is different. Instead of being a mechanical mixture of fulminate of mercury and ground glass, the U. S. Primer is a strictly chemical mixture that combines uniformly and makes a uniform explosion—one cartridge acting just like the others—quick, regular and with an unvarying accuracy of bullet flight.

A non-mercuric primer means a hotter primer flame because it contains no heat-absorbing ground glass. A hotter primer flame means quicker powder ignition and more driving power. The U. S. Primer sends no glass to grind the rifling of your gun, and contains no mercury to make the cartridge cases brittle.

All Government-made cartridges are required to have this type of primer.

U. S. Cartridges will improve your marksmanship, at least to the extent of hitting where you aim.

Accuracy First.

Far down in the basement is a machine of particular interest to astronomers and scientists. It is the celebrated dividing engine, which makes it possible, to the delight of mathematicians, to divide a circle accurately, even to within one second of arc—surpassing the records of all previous dividing engines. This degree of accuracy was accomplished after years of experiments in a room heated to 80 degrees, or as near as practicable to the heat of the body of the operator, for even a breath might interfere with the tiny scratches on the silver bands of the revolving disc.—An afternoon with Ambrose Swasey, by Joe Mitchell Chapple, in National Magazine.

Muscovites Say Kaiser's Men Have Fallen Back Across Frontier Into Their Own Domain—Berlin Reports Plan to Crush Army of Czar With 3,000,000 Men.

BY GEORGE A. DORSEY.
By International News Service.

Pekin, Nov. 10.—Enticing offers have been made to Japan by agents of the allies in China to induce the Mikado to throw 200,000 of his seasoned troops into the Eureopena Theater of war.

Allies Exert Pressure.

Following the fall of Tsing-Tau, which releases Japanese troops and warships, and removes German menace to Japan's prestige in the Orient, the allies are exerting every effort to bring Japan into the western conflict.

A guarantee of a freer hand in the affairs of China is the price offered for the Mikado's troops. The younger statesmen are said to have welcomed the proffer with enthusiasm, but the more conservative are dubious.

Effect on Tsing-Tau.

The effect of such a move on the status of Tsing-Tau is problematical. Japan has insisted that her only intention is to restore the territory to China, but this, it is learned, will be done only under a rigid agreement that China shall cede no more territory to any European power.

Failing this undertaking from China, Japan will proclaim her title to Tsing-Tau in perpetuity. Japan's announcement following the fall of Tsing-Tau made no admission of British influence in the future of the province.

A Herculean Task.

To carry 200,000 troops to the Russian battle front by way of the trans-Siberian railroad, Japan would have to perform the Herculean task of transporting them nearly 800 miles across the Sea of Japan to Vladivostock and then 5,500 miles over a single track railroad. This movement will have to be made in the dead of the Siberian winter and would require at least until the late spring to accomplish.

To reach France the Japanese would have to use the Panama canal, to which she has a right for transporting soldiers or warships under the treaty.

Claim Russians Advance.

London, Nov. 9.—The German and Austrian armies are on the defensive both in the East and West. They have at least for the present given up their efforts to break through the allied lines around Ypres, in Belgium, where the British and French have taken the offensive and, according to the reports from French headquarters have commenced to advance, and in the East they have fallen back to and over their own frontiers in East Prussia, and in Poland have crossed the border, while the Russian cavalry has penetrated Silesia, to the north of Kalisz, and cut the German railway.

The Russians are following up their advantage in Galicia and, it is said, have succeeded in cutting the retreating Austrians off from Cracow, and the German army is retiring through Poland. In fact, at only one point on the two battle fronts do the Germans claim success. That is to the west of the Argonne region, where the German emperor's forces have succeeded in taking from the French an important height near Vienne-Le-Chateaux.

Elsewhere the French troops have made progress and retaken the positions which they had lost during the course of the week. This is notably so in the Aisne valley around Soissons, where they have regained the ground which the Germans, by fierce assaults, had taken from them.

Belgians Claim Progress.

The Belgians, who are holding the line reaching to the coast, also have made progress and it would thus seem the Germans are waiting for additional reinforcements before renewing their attempt to smash through to the French seaports.

While the reports of the allies' offensive in the West have given hope in London that the Germans will fall back to a line further removed from the sea, all uneasiness has not passed, for they have shown wonderful recuperative powers. The presence of the Russians in East Prussia and Silesia, however, although the latter are only cavalry, it is believed here, will prevent the Germans from sending any more troops to the West, for it does not then compel them to withdraw some of their troops from that front.

Greece Near War.

Nothing of first class moment has occurred up to the present in the near east, but Turkey is being attacked in isolated spots by the Russians and British, and the Turks apparently are coming very close to war with Greece, that situation having been aggravated by the sinking of a Greek steamer by the Turks and the threatening of Greeks in Asia Minor.

Neither Bulgaria nor Roumania has made any move as yet.

The Union defense force continues to round up the rebels in South Africa.

Would Destroy Russian Army.

London, Nov. 9.—"It is asserted in Berlin that Germany and Austria-Hungary now have concentrated about 3,000,000 soldiers on the line from Thorn to Cracow and this is considered sufficient to crush the Russian forces," says a dispatch from Copenhagen to the Times.

London, via Paris, Nov. 7.—The French government has followed Britain's initiative by declaring that a "state of war exists between France and Turkey," according to the Bordeaux correspondent to the Havas agency. He says that the foreign office issued the following note:

Action Is Explained.

"The hostile acts of the Turkish fleet against a French steamer, causing the death of two Frenchmen and serious damage to the ship, not having been followed by the dismissal of the German naval military missions, the measure whereby Turkey could disclaim responsibility, the government of this republic is obliged to state that as a result of the action of the Ottoman government a state of war exists between France and Turkey."

No Decision in Flanders.

No decision has been reached in the battle in the sand dunes of west Flanders, and the opposing armies now stand virtually as they have stood for many days. While the Germans keep hammering away at the allies around Ypres, which route they chose for their march to the coast after they had found the road along the sea barred to them, and the allies are making an effort to move northward to Ostend, neither side has gone very far.

The Belgians and those supporting them have found that the floods which they created to stop the German advance are a hindrance to their own movements, although they have been able to occupy some villages, including Bixschoete, which had been in the possession of the Germans.

Allies Say Germans Fail.

Around Ypres the German offensive, according to the accounts of the allies, has met with no success. In fact, it seems that along the line there has been merely a repetition of artillery duel and of infantry attacks and counter attacks, which sometimes succeed, but more often do not.

On the frontier in the East more wide sweeping movements are being made by the opposing armies.

The Russians, from all reports, have driven back the German center to the River Warthe in Russian Poland, have held back a German offensive movement from East Prussia, and now are straightening out their line for a more vigorous offensive against the Austrians, who have been trying to beat their left wing in Galicia.

British Look to East.

It is to the battles in these regions that the British military men are looking, for they declare that if the Russians can keep up their successful fighting against the Austrians and Germans relief will come to the allied armies in the West, because of the necessity for a withdrawal of German army corps from France and Belgium to protect Silesia and East Prussia.

Berlin Blames Floods.

London, Nov. 5.—That the German army has abandoned its attempt to push its way along the Belgian coast to Calais is agreed by all the official reports. A combination of inundated country, the remnant of the Belgian army under King Albert and the activity of the British warships seemingly all contributed toward ending the costly struggle.

A Berlin official report states that failure of the German movement is due entirely to the flooded state of the country where the water in places is over a man's head, but it declares that the army of Emperor William withdrew in good order and without losses. After nearly three weeks of desperate fighting the brunt of the attack now has shifted to the Ypres region.

In the Ypres district the British army of Field Marshal Sir John French reinforced by Indians and territorials apparently must meet another onslaught. To the scene of this contemplated battle, according to reports, Emperor William has gone to give encouragement to his men by his presence.

British Smash Turk Base.

The British cruiser Minerva has smashed the Turkish base of operations against Egypt at the head of the Gulf of Akabah. The Turkish ambassador in London has as yet made no arrangements to leave and the embassy still maintains a conciliatory attitude.

The closing of the North Sea to all shipping except that which places itself under the protection of the British fleet, is recognized as the first stroke of Admiral Baron Fisher, the new first sea lord of the admiralty, and as one of the most important events of the war.

All cargoes destined for German or Austrian consumption must now run the gauntlet of British inspection in the English channel, the Straits of Gibraltar or the Suez Canal.

The making of the North Sea a military sea already has brought adverse comments from Germany. The Cologne Gazette claims that Great Britain virtually has proclaimed a blockade of the North Sea which its fleets will be unable to enforce.

U. S. INTERNS GERMAN SHIP

Washington, Nov. 9.—The little German cruiser Geier, which has been undergoing repairs at Honolulu while a Japanese squadron waited outside the harbor for her to reappear on the high seas has been interned for the war at Honolulu as the time set by the American government for her to intern or leave port had expired.

A small supply ship which accompanied the Geier also was interned. The case of the Geier, a craft of 1,600 tons, aroused much interest. Soon after she dropped anchor in the harbor of Honolulu, about three weeks ago, after a voyage from the Far East, a big and powerful Japanese cruiser, the Hizen, appeared off the Hawaiian coast and anchored outside the three-mile limit. Later another Japanese cruiser joined the Hizen and they seemed determined to wait as long as necessary for the enemy.

Kaiser Decorates Seamen.

London, Nov. 9.—A wireless dispatch here by the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company from Berlin says: "Admiral Craddock's fleet has been annihilated in the Pacific by the Germans. The losses on our side amounted to only a few wounded and the material damage to our ships was insignificant. On the recommendation of the commander of the cruiser Karlsruhe, Emperor William has conferred the Order of the Iron Cross upon the commanders and all officers, warrant officers and 50 non-commissioned officers and members of the crew of that cruiser."

No Proof of Second Battle.

Valparaiso, Chile, Nov. 9.—No confirmation has been received here of the reports that have been prevalent for the last few days that naval battles have taken place off the coast of Peru and off Coquimbo, Chile. Both reports are considered baseless.

Turkish Fleet Is Active.

Berlin, via Amsterdam, Nov. 7.—An official dispatch from Constantinople states that the Turkish fleet has bombarded the Russian port of Batoum on the Black Sea and caused damage. Batoum is the chief Russian port of Trans-Caucasia. It was ceded by Turkey to Russia in 1878. Turkish naval authorities have seized in the harbor of Constantinople thirty-six French vessels, eight Russian vessels and one Belgian steamer.

Idaho Generous; Aids Belgians.

New York, Nov. 7.—Officials of the Rockefeller foundation say that they will in a few days announce a plan for receiving contributions of food supplies for relief of Belgian war victims. The decision of the foundation to accept contributions followed the receipt of the following telegram from the Idaho Falls, Idaho, Club of Commerce: "Would you receive 3 to 10 carloads of noted Idaho potatoes gratis for Belgian relief? Upper Snake valley towns would gladly load them."

DEFENDS POPULAR REMEDIES

Speaker Says Newspapers Should Investigate Merits of Medicines Before Barring Advertisements.

That an organized attempt has been made to blacken the reputation of the popular family remedies of this country, and to mislead the newspaper publishers into rejecting the advertising of such medicines, was the charge made by Carl J. Balliett, of Buffalo, N. Y., at the convention of the Advertising Affiliation at Detroit.

Mr. Balliett is a director of the Proprietary Association of America, which includes in its membership two hundred firms which make the popular prepared medicines of America.

Mr. Balliett pointed out that it is the duty of the newspaper publisher to refuse the advertising of any fake or fraudulent medicine, just as it is his duty to refuse any fake or fraudulent advertising, but it is not right to shut down on all medical advertising because there have been some fakers, any more than it would be right to refuse to publish all department store advertising because certain stores have made a practice of lying about bargain sales.

Disease and death are mysteries. People who are perfectly well are skeptical. They laugh at the time-worn patent medicine joke, just as they laugh again and again over the many variations of the operation joke—"The operation was a success but the patient died." This so-called humor has perhaps hurt the medicine business with well people, but when the hitherto healthy man feels a severe pain or illness, he immediately wants medicine, and will bless the cure whether it be at the hands of a regular doctor, a homeopath, an osteopath, a Christian Scientist or patent medicine. There is nothing more deadly than disease; nothing more honorable than to cure it.

Mr. Balliett refuted the idea sought to be spread about that patent medicines are unpopular by showing that from 1900 to 1912 the amount of prepared medicines consumed in America increased from $100,000,000 to $160,000,000 annually. He showed that, although the American Medical Association is trying as an organization to exterminate so-called patent medicines, the family doctor, individually, is not fighting them but prescribing them. He estimated that 40% of the prescriptions written by doctors today include proprietary medicines.

The writings of Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, he said, have also aimed to destroy confidence in proprietary medicines; but that Dr. Wiley's ideas are not infallible is shown by cases where his analyses were entirely wrong. Mr. Balliett mentioned a case where, with all the power of the Government, he fought a preparation as being dangerous to health, and was ingloriously walloped.

There has been spread the idea that a clever faker can mix a few useless ingredients and, by smart advertising, sell tons of it and win sudden wealth; whereas, as a matter of fact, the medicine business is notoriously difficult, and, where there has been one success at it, there have been a hundred failures. Any medicine which has no merit cannot live, because persons who are duped into buying it once will not buy it again, and the profit from advertising a medicine can only come from repeat sales to the same, satisfied people. Therefore, any medicine which has been on the market for a number of years, and is still advertised, must have merit behind it to account for its success.

In conclusion Mr. Balliett declared that no newspaper is doing justice to its readers in the matter of medical or other advertising, unless it investigates, not only the wording of the advertisement offered for publication, but the merits of the article advertised. He pointed out that the few newspapers who have been deluded into the policy of barring out medical advertising have adopted this general policy, rather than to form an investigation bureau of this kind which could, in a constructive and useful effort, investigate and decide what is a good product and what is a fraud, in not only the medicine business, but in every other business which advertises its wares to the public.

The audience seemed to agree with Mr. Balliett's ideas on the subject and the chairman decided the question at issue in his favor.

CASHIER MURDERED; MYSTERY BAFFLES

ROBBERY BELIEVED OBJECT

Dassel.—O. M. Palmquist, cashier of the Citizens' State bank of Dassel, was murdered in the private room of the bank.

32-Caliber Revolver.

A bullet fired from a 32-caliber revolver entered the back of his neck under the left ear and lodged over the right eye. No weapon was found on the premises. Theories of suicide have been discounted from the first.

The sheriff, county attorney and coroner were summoned from Litchfield and an autopsy was held. The bullet was removed.

While officials were blocked at every turn in trying to solve the mystery of the murder, the search for a suspect, who is believed to have deliberately murdered the banker in an attempt to get $1,500 from the bank's vaults, led to Minneapolis.

Body Half Standing.

Palmquist was found dead, his body, with a bullet hole in the head, was half standing, half crouching, against a steel wicket between the directors' room and the bank proper. No weapon could be found and Coroner A. W. Robertson of Litchfield declared positively that the man was murdered.

After two farmers had told a story of seeing a man leave the directors' room of the bank and hurry for the train, and after Coroner Robertson had told a story of the tragedy that he believed must have been enacted in the room, the search was begun.

Theory of Coroner.

That a man entered the directors' room, where Palmquist was sitting alone, talked of business matters, then demanded $1,500 which was in the vaults and murdered the cashier in determined efforts to get it, was the theory of the crime advanced by Coroner Robertson.

The man could have heard a conversation between Palmquist and F. A. Carlson, vice president of the bank, concerning the money. The murder took place within a few minutes after Carlson left for Litchfield, taking $1,500 and leaving the same amount in the Dassel vaults. The Dassel bank is a branch of the Citizens' State bank of Litchfield.

Stock Salesman Sought.

A man who said he was selling stock called at the Dassel bank and talked with Carlson and Palmquist concerning stocks. He said he had been in Litchfield. He did no business, according to Carlson. This man was about 25 years old, neatly dressed in dark clothes and had a short black mustache.

When two farmers entered the bank after Carlson had left they met just such a man going out of the directors' room into the lobby. One of them asked him if the bank was still open. The man mumbled and went on, they said.

LAKEVILLE P. O. IS ROBBED

Safe Blown and $1,100 Stolen—Believed Work of Professionals—Few Heard Explosion.

St. Paul.—The safe of the postoffice at Lakeville, Dakota county, was blown Thursday night. The thieves got $100, $1,000 worth of stamps, a quantity of money order blanks and some papers and deeds.

Marshal J. A. Betz of Lakeville thinks the robbers knew of the shipment of a registered mail package containing $3,000 to the Dakota County bank. This was delivered before night, fortunately.

The robbery was apparently the work of skilled professionals. Blankets thrown over the safe smothered the explosion so well that the few persons who heard the report were not moved to investigate.

C. M. Sauser's automobile, stolen by the thieves at Lakeville, was discovered by a searching party half a mile from the town. Wheel tracks showed that the robbers had changed to another machine which had been waiting for them, and which apparently was not taken into the town lest it be traced by the license number.

ST. OLAF HAS NEW PRESIDENT

Impressive Ceremonies Mark Installation of Third Head of Institution.

Northfield.—Rev. L. A. Vigness, new president of St. Olaf college, was installed with impressive services in the presence of an audience of alumni and students, pastors, schoolmen and representative men of the United Norwegian Lutheran church, of which St. Olaf is the official college. The exercises were held in Hoyme Memorial chapel. Dr. T. H. Dahl of Minneapolis, president of the church conference, conducted the installation ceremony. Dr. M. O. Bockman of the United church seminary at St. Anthony Park, preached the sermon and President Vigness delivered an address. The services were opened with Scripture reading and prayer by Rev. T. H. Haugan of this city. Dr. J. N. Kildahl, the former president, gave the benediction.

"Foundation day" was also observed as a holiday. The celebration this year was of especial significance because it is the 40th anniversary of the school and the 25th anniversary of the establishment of the college department. Because of this and the installation of President Vigness a two-day's celebration was held.

St. Olaf college has had two presidents since it was founded 40 years ago by Norwegians of Rice and Goodhue counties. Rev. T. N. Mohn was named principal of the school which, during the first four years, was conducted in a two-story frame building on the east side of the river. The first year there were two teachers and 50 pupils. In the fall of 1878 the school moved to its present site on Manitou Heights at the western limits of the city. The "Old Main" building was erected with funds furnished by Norwegian Lutheran congregations in Goodhue and Rice counties and citizens of Northfield. The school grew in scholastic rating and attendance. A college department was established and the institution was adopted by the United church as its official college.

In 1899 Rev. J. N. Kildahl was elected president of St. Olaf college and served until last June.

AIDED SEARCH FOR ARTIST

Winona.—Miss Florence L. Richards, dean of women at Winona normal school, who has returned from Belgium, told of the frantic efforts made by her brother to find Lawrence Sterne Stevens, the American artist who was taken prisoner and sentenced to death by the Germans, and described by him in the Sunday Journal. Mr. Stevens was a guest of Miss Richards' brother, Lewis Richards, in Brussels, at whose home Miss Richards was visiting when the war broke out.

"Mr. Stevens and a party of newspaper correspondents left Brussels Aug. 25," Miss Richards said. "We expected that they would be gone no more than a few hours. They took nothing with them save the clothing they wore and their working tools.

"When Stevens did not return that night we became alarmed. Days passed and we carried on a vigorous search. The consul and the minister were appealed to, the head of the department of the German army in charge of the prisoners was reached by my brother, but still there was no word.

"Finally we gave up. We thought he had been killed. Weeks, which seemed to us like years, passed before finally we received word indirectly from Irvin S. Cobb, the American humorist, that Stevens was a prisoner at Aix-La-Chapelle, Germany.

"I left Brussels, finally, on a troop train, on which were wounded soldiers and refugees. When we reached Aix-La-Chapelle I went to Stevens and found him well, in spite of his terrifying and harrowing experiences."

QUARREL; BROTHER IS SLAIN

Walter Protz, 12 Years Old, Shot Through Heart Near Thief River Falls.

Thief River Falls.—Walter Protz, 12 years old, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Protz, was killed instantly when he was shot through the heart by his 18-year-old brother, Rudolph.

The tragedy occurred about one mile south of the city where the brothers, in company with Leland Knight, were hunting. A quarrel arose between the brothers, it is alleged, resulting in young Protz being struck over the head with a rifle. He turned to run, when his brother, in a fit of passion, fired his rifle.

WILL IS RECORD FOR BREVITY

DISPOSES OF ESTATE WORTH MILLIONS IN 122 WORDS.

Richard W. Sears Bequeaths $17,500,000—Began Mail Order Business in Minneapolis.

Chicago, Nov. 4.—The will of Richard W. Sears, founder of a big mercantile concern, filed in Waukegan, bequeathed an estate valued at $17,500,000, to Mrs. Anna L. Sears, his widow. The will was a record for brevity, disposing of the huge estate in a total of 122 words. The will gave all property without qualification, stipulating only that no surety be required of Mrs. Sears, who was named executrix.

It was stated in court that the will comprised $14,000,000 in personal property and $3,500,000 in real estate. According to law the executrix must sign a bond for twice the amount of the personal property, so Mrs. Sears signed a bond for $28,000,000, for which, according to the will, she was not required to give surety.

Mr. Sears was born in Redwood, Minn., in 1862, and began his career at Redwood Falls, as a telegraph operator. He organized a mail order business in Minneapolis in 1890, and later transferred it to Chicago. Retiring in 1909 at 45 years of age, when his personal fortune was estimated at $25,000,000.

DOCTORS ARRANGE PROGRAM

DAIRYMEN LOSE MILLIONS

State Association Speaker Explains How to Make $6,000,000 More Annually.

St. Paul.—How Minnesota farmers could make $6,000,000 more annually was explained at the twenty-first convention of the Minnesota State Butter and Cheese Makers in the Merchants hotel, St. Paul, by E. J. Holmes, state dairy inspector from Braham. He said:

"The butter maker who buys his cream from the dairy farmer," said the speaker, "has to sell his products by standard grades. This is to his advantage and it would also be to the advantage of the farmer if he would go to the little extra trouble necessary to sell his cream in the same way. There are indications that the buying of cream will soon be put on a basis of quality instead of quantity alone.

"For example, there is one co-operative creamery which sells butter to a railroad dining car service and it has proved the great value of buying the best and selling the best. Its cream comes from inspected cattle, it is handled by men who are inspected and it grades high. The result is that this creamery gets 6 cents a pound for its butter above the market price.

"Milk and cream should be graded for sale just as barley and wheat are."

Marshall and Roseau Sanatorium.

Middle River.—The commissioners of Marshall and Roseau counties, at the urgent request of citizens, have decided to erect a modern sanatorium for the cure of tubercular patients within the two counties. Provision has been made for the funds needed and it is expected that building operations will commence early next year. A site two miles northeast of Middle River, a high and airy point, in a pine and spruce grove, has been chosen as the most conveniently located for the two counties.

Put That Pain to Use

The network of nerves in your body, like the network of wires in a burglar alarm system, gives quick warning when anything is going wrong inside. Looking at it in this way a pain is a useful alarm. Now, kidney weakness is a dangerous thing—a condition not to be neglected—and it is wise to know and pay attention to the early alarm signals of sick kidneys.

Backache is a common warning of congestion or inflammation in the kidneys. It may be dull, nagging pain, or a sharp twinge when stooping or lifting. There are likely to be disorders of urination, dizziness, headaches, and drowsy, despondent, tired feelings.

It is very hard to strengthen weak kidneys at first, but neglect invites rheumatic or neuralgic attacks, gravel, dropsy, and fatal Bright's disease.

As a special medicine for weak kidneys Doan's Kidney Pills have been used for years all over the civilized world, and surely are considered reliable. The patient can always help the medicine immensely, however, by dieting lightly, using little or no liquor, tea or coffee, keeping regular hours and drinking lots of pure water.

As to Doan's Kidney Pills, read the following enthusiastic endorsement by one who has tested them.

ALMOST BLIND

A Physical Wreck From Kidney Trouble

Anthony P. Kern, R. R. No. 7, Faribault, Minn., says: "From childhood I suffered from kidney trouble and I was so miserable that my life was a burden. Black specks flitted before my eyes and at times I was almost blind. I even passed my friends without knowing them. I frequently had dizzy spells so bad that I didn't know where I was or what I was doing. My heart was badly affected and I was so run down that after sitting for a few minutes I fell asleep. After a hard day's work my back was terribly lame. My friends said that I would outgrow the trouble, but I kept getting worse all the time until I was a wreck, unfit for any kind of work. When in that critical condition I heard about Doan's Kidney Pills and decided to give them a trial. I noticed a change for the better after the first box and one after one the ailments left me until I was cured. Doan's Kidney Pills gave me a new lease on life and I have since felt like a different person. I have always given them my heartiest praise."

OBJECTION PLACED ON AGE

But Young Lady's Idea Was Altogether Different From What Corporal Had Feared.

"What pensions, what millions and billions in pensions, this horrible war is going to entail," said Major Fitzgerald of Boston. He added:

"And some of these pensions will go on longer than they should, because some of the pensioners in their old age will marry young girls—for an old pensioner makes a good parti, since his pension, you know, falls on his death to his widow.

"I heard the other day about an old Civil war pensioner who proposed to the hired girl next door, a very pretty girl of twenty or so. But she refused him.

"'Perhaps,' he stammered then, stroking in his embarrassment his long and snow-white beard, 'perhaps I am too old.'

"'No,' said the pretty hired girl calmly; 'no, corporal, you're too young.'"

Cub's Faux Pas.

This may be a base libel on an honored profession, but it is told by the man who perpetrated the faux pas. He was a reported for a Baltimore paper—or had been one for about an hour, this being his first experience in newspaper work—when the city editor send him out to see Cardinal Gibbons. The "cub" rushed down to the modest white house where the venerable prelate lives, says the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, and rang the bell. A man servant opened the door.

"Is the cardinal at home?" asked the reporter.

"No, sir."

"Oh, Mrs. Gibbons will do," ejaculated the "cub."

His Better Half.

"Here, my dear," said the husband, producing his purse, "here is $50 I won playing cards over at Brown's last night. You may have it to buy that dress you wanted."

Reluctantly the conscientious wife took the money; then said, with an expression of rigid recititude:

"I simply shudder at the thought of using money gained in such a way. Henry, promise me that after you have won enough for me to buy the hat to go with the dress you will never again touch those awful cards. I don't want my husband to become a gambler."

A REBELLION

Food Demanded.

The human body will stand a lot of abuse, but sometime it will surely rebel and demand proper food in place of the pasty, starchy, greasy stuffs on which it has been made sick.

Then is the time to try Grape-Nuts, the most scientific and perfect food in the world.

A lady of Washington says: "Three years ago I was very ill with catarrh of the stomach and was given up to die by one doctor. I laid in bed four months and my stomach was so weak that I could not keep down medicine or hardly any kind of food and was so weak and emaciated after four months of this starvation that my daughter could easily lift me from bed and put me in my chair.

"But weak as my stomach was, it accepted, relished and digested Grape-Nuts without any difficulty the first time that wonderful food was tried.

"I am now strong and in better health than for a great many years and am gradually growing still stronger. I rely on Grape-Nuts for much of the nourishment that I get. The results have certainly been wonderful in my case and prove that no stomach is so weak it will not digest Grape-Nuts.

"My baby got fat from feeding on Grape-Nuts. I was afraid I would have to stop giving the food to him, but I guess it is a healthy fat, for his health is just perfect." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

A Fine Night.

Maude Marie was a sentimental miss of twenty summers, who seemed to look on the world with a gentle sigh, relates the Kansas City Star. John Henry, who thought her some sweetness was almost crudely practical. One evening they were leisurely rambling along the country road when John Henry noticed that Maude Marie's thoughts seemed afar off.

"You look like somnambulism, Marie," remarked the young man. "Where are your thoughts?"

"I was thinking of the night, John, dear," tenderly replied the fair one. "Isn't it sublime? Isn't it glorious? Isn't it the most wonderful night you ever saw?"

"Yes," was the startling rejoinder of the practical John. "It is just the kind of a night to shoot cats."

A Reformer.

"Twobble is noted for his passionate striving after perfection."

"I must say that's a commendable trait."

"In some cases, yes, but Twobble spends all his time trying to achieve it in other people."

Occasionally a man's sense of humor may head off the doctor.

Leper Asylum.

The Kwnanju asylum, Korea, has grown from an old tile-kiln where the first leper patient was housed five years ago. She had been found on the roadside, almost dead, with worn and bleeding feet, and was taken into the warm tile-kiln and fed and taught. Then followed a little wooden building of three rooms which the missionaries paid for from their own pockets. This has been displaced now by a suitable asylum, the gift of the Mission to Lepers. It will care for 100 patients. Doctor Wilson writes: "I am taking them out of the snow every day now, and we shall soon reach the 100 limit."

Too Good.

Reggy—Sweet Arline, will you be mine?

Sweet Arline—Before I answer your question let me ask you one. Do you swear when you lose your collar stud?

Reggy—Never!

Sweet Arline—Then it cannot be. I cannot marry a man who has no spirit.

Unnerved Completely.

"I've always thought so, until fear of a Zeppelin raid doused the lights of London."

Weak Heart

Many people suffer from weak hearts. They may experience shortness of breath on exertion, pain over the heart, or dizzy feelings, oppressed breathing after meals or their eyes become blurred, the heart is not sufficiently strong to pump blood to the extremities, and they have cold hands and feet, or poor appetite because of weakened blood supply to the stomach. A heart tonic and alterative should be taken which has no bad after-effect. Such is which contains no dangerous narcotics or alcohol.

It helps the human system in the constant manufacture of rich, red blood. It helps the stomach to assimilate or take up the proper elements from the food, thereby helping digestion and curing dyspepsia, heart-burn and many uncomfortable symptoms, stops excessive tissue waste in convalescence from fevers; for the run-down, anæmic, thin-blooded people, the "Discovery" is refreshing and vitalizing.

In liquid or tablet form at most drug stores or send 50 one-cent stamps for trial box to Dr. Pierce's Invalids' Hotel, Buffalo, N. Y.

Revelations of the Kaiser's Personal Spy

The Making of a German Secret Agent.

The average man or woman has only a hazy idea of what European secret service and espionage really means and accomplishes. Short stories and novels, written in a background of diplomacy and secret agents, have given the public vague impressions about the world of spies. But this is the first real, unvarnished account of the system; the class of men and women employed; the means used to obtain the desired results, and the risks run by those connected with this service. And before continuing with the narration of my own mission as the kaiser's personal spy, I think it well to give my readers this general insight of the spy system of Europe, and particularly of the German empire.

Since the days of Moses, who employed spies in Canaan, to Napoleon Bonaparte, who inaugurated the first thorough system of political espionage, potentates, powerful ministers and heads of departments have found it necessary to obtain early and correct information other than through the usual official channels. To gain this knowledge they have to employ persons unknown and unrecognized in official circles. A recognized official, such as an ambassador or a secretary of legation, an envoy plenipotentiary or a consul, would not be able to gain the information sought, as naturally everybody is on their guard against him. Moreover, official etiquette prevents an ambassador or consul from acting in such a capacity. But European governments must keep a stringent watch on one another's movements, and this is possible only by an efficient system of espionage, by trained men and women, willing to run the risk attached to this sort of work.

For risks there are. I have been imprisoned twice, once in the Balkans at Belgrade, once in England. I have been attacked five times and bear the marks of the wounds to this day. Escapes I have had by the dozens. All my missions were not successes, more often, failures, and the failures are often serious, verging on the fatal. For instance:

Into a Hornet's Nest.

Early in the morning of June 11, 1903, the political plot which had been brewing in Servia ended with the assassination of the king, queen, ministers and members of the royal household of Servia. I shall not go into the undercurrent political significance of these atrocities, as I had no active part in them, but I was sent down by my government later to ascertain as far as possible the prime movers in the intrigue which pointed to Colonel Mashin and a gang of officers of the Sixth regiment. All these regicides received Russian pay, for the Karageorgevich had become dangerous to Russia because of his flirting with Austria. Besides, his own idiotic behavior and the flagrant indiscretions of Queen Draga had by no means endeared him to his people.

I stuck my nose into a regular hornets' nest and soon found myself in a most dangerous position. I was arrested by the provisional government on the order of Lieutenant Colonel Niglitsch on a most flimsy charge of traveling with false passports. In those times arrests and executions were the order of the day. The old Servian proverb of "Od Roba Ikad Iz Groba Nikad" (Out of prison, yes; out of the grave, never) was fully acted upon. There were really no incriminating papers of any description upon me, but my being seen and associating with persons opposed to the provisional government was quite enough to place me before a drumhead court-martial.

I was sitting in the Cafe Petite Parisian with Lieutenant Nikolevitch and M. Krastov, a merchant of Belgrade, when a file of soldiers in charge of an officer pulled us out of our chairs and without any further ado marched us to the citadel. The next morning we were taken separately into a small room where three men in the uniform of colonels were seated at a small iron table. No questions were asked.

"You are found guilty of associating with revolutionary persons. You were found possessing a passport, not your own. You are sentenced to be shot at sundown."

The whole thing appeared to me first as a joke, then as a bluff, but looking closely into those high-cheekboned, narrow-eyed faces with the characteristically close-cropped brutal heads, the humorous aspect dwindled rapidly and I thought it about time to make a counter-move. Without betraying any of my inward qualms—and believe me, I began to have some—I said quietly:

"I think you will find it advisable to inform M. Zolarevitch" (then minister of war) "that Count Weringrode sends his regards."

I saw them looking rather curiously at one another and then the center inquisitor fired a lot of questions at me, in answer to which I only shrugged my shoulders.

"That's all I have to say, monsieur."

I was shoved back in my cell. About four that afternoon one of the officers came to see me.

"Your message has not been sent. My comrades were against sending it, but I am related to Zolarevitch. So if you can show me some reason, I shall take your message."

I gave him some reason, so much so that he did not lose any time getting under way. In fact, it was a very pale, perturbed officer who rushed out of my cell.

Face to Face With a Firing Squad.

I didn't worry much, but when at about 7:30 the cell door opened and two sentries with fixed bayonets and cartridge pouches entered, placed me in the center and marched me into the courtyard, where ten more similarly equipped soldiers in charge of an officer awaited me, I felt somewhat green. I know a firing squad when I see one. I knew that if my message ever reached responsible quarters nothing could happen to me; but these were motley times and all sorts of delays might have happened to the officer.

"Right about wheel," and myself in the center, we marched out of the courtyard to a little hill to the west of the citadel.

An old stone building—probably a decayed monastery, for I noticed several crumbled tombstones—had evidently been selected for the place of execution. On a little rough, four-foot stone wall we halted and the officer, pulling out a document, began reading to me a rather lengthy preamble in Servian.

Up to then not a word had been spoken. I let him finish and then politely requested him, as I was not a Serb and consequently did not understand his lingo, to translate it into a civilized language, preferably German or French. He seemed somewhat startled and gave me to understand that he was led to believe I was a Serb. I used some very forcible German and French, both of which he was able to understand, pointing out to him that some one, somewhere, had made a thundering big blunder, which somehow would have to be paid for. He was clearly ill at ease, but said, "I have to obey my instructions." I had told him of my message to the minister of war, and, although it was quite obvious that I was sparring for time, he seemed in no way inclined to rush the execution. Five minutes went; ten minutes went, and, looking at his watch, which showed five minutes to eight (although it was fast getting dusk I could see that watch dial distinctly), shrugging his shoulders and saying, "I can delay no longer," he called a sergeant, who placed me with my shoulders to the wall and offered me a handkerchief. I didn't want a handkerchief. A few sharp orders and twelve Mauser tubes pointed their ugly black snouts directly at me.

I hate to tell my sensations just then. Frankly, I felt nothing clearly. The only thing I remember distinctly was that the third man in the second file held his gun in rather a slipshod manner, aiming it first at my midriff, next pointing it at my nose—which, strangely enough, caused me intense annoyance. How long we stood thus I don't know. The next thing I remember was a rattle of grounding arms and the sight of two other officers, excitedly gesticulating with the one in charge of the firing squad. All three presently came towards me and one, pulling out a flask of cognac, with a polite bow offered me a drink. I needed it, but didn't take it. All this time I had been standing motionless with my arms folded across my breast. I heard one say to the other, "Nitchka curacha" (no coward). If he had only known!

Indeed, had I anticipated such an experience, had I known the things I know now, I doubt if I would have ever been persuaded to enter the German secret service; I doubt if I would have been so pleased with the results of my visit to Koenigergratzerstrasse 70, where the intelligence department of the admiralty is quartered. For it was in the admiralty that I began my career as a German secret service agent.

The Rules of the Service.

I did not enter the service out of pure adventure or for monetary reasons alone. Money has never appealed to me as the all-powerful thing in life. I have always had enough for creature comforts, and as for adventure I had had my fill during the Boer war and my world wanderings. No, I joined the German secret service for quite a different reason. I was thinking of the influences that had pressed me out of my destined groove, by every human right my own. I remember how sanguine I was that through the service I ought to gain the power I had lost. But had occult powers been given me I never would have taken up secret service work. But one is not quite as wise at twenty-four as at thirty-nine.

I shall never forget the initial instructions I received from Herr von Stammer, private secretary of Captain Tappken, then head of this department of the secret service. A very astute and calculating gentleman is Herr von Stammer. Suave, genial, talkative, he has the plausible and unstudied art of extracting information without committing himself in turn. A marvelous encyclopedia of devious secret service facts, an ideal tutor.

When we were alone in his office, Von Stammer began by saying abruptly:

"From now on, you must be entirely and absolutely at our service. You will report daily at twelve noon by telephoning a certain number. At all times you must be accessible. You will pay close attention to the following rules:

"Absolute silence in regard to your missions. No conversation with minor officials, but only with the respective heads of departments or to whomever you are sent. You will make no memoranda nor carry written documents. You will never discuss your affairs with any employee in the service whom you may meet. You are not likely to meet many. It is strictly against the rules to become friendly or intimate with any agent. You must abstain from intoxicating liquors. You are not permitted to have any women associates. You will be known to us by a number. You will sign all your reports by that number. Always avoid telephoning, telegraphing and cabling as much as possible. In urgent cases do so, but use the cipher that will be supplied to you."

The German School for Spies.

I was in Herr von Stammer's office all the forenoon, and when he ushered me out I half expected to be called into Captain von Tappken's presence to be sent on my first mission. Instead of that, I had to wait five months before I was given my first work and an exceedingly unimportant thing it was. During those five months I was kept at a steady grind of schooling in subjects that were essential to efficient secret service work.

Broadly, they could be divided into four classes—topography, trigonometry, naval construction and drawing. My tutors were all experts in the imperial service. A secret service agent sent out to investigate and report on the condition, situation, and armament of a fort like Verdun in France must be able to make correct estimates of distances, height, angles, conditions of the ground, etc. This can only be done by a man of the correct scientific training. He must have the science of topography at his finger tips; he must be able to make quick and accurate calculations, using trigonometry, as well as possessing skill as a draftsman. In a mission to Port Arthur (before the Russian-Japanese war), where I had to report on the defenses, I found this training invaluable.

The same applies to the subject of naval construction. Before entering the German secret service, I certainly knew the difference between a torpedo and a torpedo boat destroyer, but naturally could not give an accurate description of the various types of destroyers and torpedoes. My instructor in this subject was Lieut. Capt. Kurt Steffens, torpedo expert of the intelligence department of the imperial navy. After a month of tutelage under him, I was able to tell the various types of torpedoes, submarines, and mines, etc., in use by the principal powers. I could even tell by the peculiar whistle it made whether the torpedo that was being discharged was a Whitehead or a Brennan.

I was also drilled in the construction of every known kind of naval gun. Dozens of model warcraft were shown to me and explained. I saw the model of every warship in the world. For days at a time I was made to sit before charts that hung from the walls of certain rooms in the intelligence department and study the silhouettes of every known varying type of war craft. I was schooled in this until I could tell at a glance what type of a battleship, cruiser or destroyer it was, whether it was peculiar to the English, French, Russian or United States navy.

More Things I Had to Learn.

The different ranking officers of the navies of the world, their uniforms, the personnel of battleships, the systems of flag signals, and codes, were explained to me in detail. I was given large books in which were colored plates of the uniforms and the signal flags of every navy in the world. I had to study these until at a glance I could tell the rank and station of the officers and men of the principal navies. The same with the signal flags. I pored over those books night after night into the early hours of the morning.

My study was not all in Berlin. I spent most of my time there at Koenigergratzerstrasse 70 and at the Zeughaus, the great museum of the German general staff. But there were side trips to the big government works at Kiel and Wilhelmshafen. There I was taught every detail of the mechanics of naval construction and I was not pronounced equipped until I could talk intelligently about every unassembled part of a gun, torpedo tube, or mine. In the course of my five months' instruction under the various experts of the Prussian service I had many opportunities to observe the exhaustive thoroughness and the minuteness of detail which the German general staff possesses.

Naturally, I soon began to consider the whole proposition of secret service, and right here I shall tell you some of the general secrets of the system.

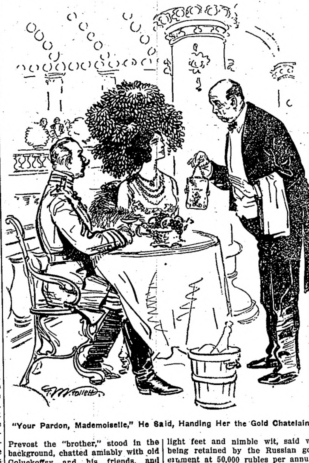
There are five systems of secret service in Europe, the four leading powers each possessing one. First in the systematic efficiency is the German, next comes the Russian, then the French, and then English. England has a very efficient service in India and her Asiatic possession, but has only lately entered the European field. Last, but not least, comes the International Secret Service bureau with headquarters in Belgium, a semiprivate concern which procures reliable information for anyone who will pay for it. This service is generally entrusted with the procuring of technical details, such as the plans of a new kind of gun or data on a new and minor fortification. But sometimes Brussels undertakes other commissions. For example:

The Fiancee Who Was a Spy.

Not often does the chance come to leave the regular channels of espionage and go forth upon a mission out of the ordinary. That chance came a few years ago to the Russian agents in Brussels. In St. Petersburg the chiefs were desirous of knowing the identity and names of a group of revolutionists who had formed a sort of colony in Montreux, Switzerland. A French woman, known sometimes as Theresa Prevost (the last I heard of her she was in prison), was detailed to the mission. Young and clever was Theresa; likewise the man who was ordered to accompany her, posing as a "brother," Charles Prevost.

The chief of these Russian fugitives, who were down around the lake of Geneva brewing their dark plans, was known. He was Goluckoffsky, and he had a son twenty-two years of age—an impressionable Russion son. Hence, the young and pretty Theresa.

It was decided by her Brussels chiefs that she should assume the role of an heiress from Canada. Five thousand francs for preliminary expenses were handed over to her and with Charles, the "brother," she descended upon Montreux. If you were there at the time you will recall the social triumph made by the young Canadian heiress. You may even remember that she seemed to be infatuated with the young impressionable son of old Goluckoffsky. They were going to be married, and Charles Prevost the "brother," stood in the background, chatted amiably with old Goluckoffsy and his friends, and smiled.



"Your Pardon, Mademoiselle," He Said, Handing Her the Gold Chatelaine.

Then, as an heiress should, Theresa and her "brother" invited Goluckoffsky, his family and friends, to a prenuptial luncheon. No expense was spared, for the wires had moaned with requests sent to Brussels for money. Young Goluckoffsky was delighted with his fiancee. She was insistent that all his friends should be there, all the revolutionaries—although, of course, his dear Theresa did not know that. How the spelling of their names puzzled her. With gay heart young Goluckoffsky wrote out all their names on a slip of paper so that she could send their invitations properly—the names St. Petersburg wanted to know.

Came the day of the luncheon, a gala affair in the banquet room of the hotel. Theresa looked charming—even the grimmest of the old revolutionists were taken with her. Old Goluckoffsky beamed upon this sparkling febrile woman, rich, too, who was to marry his son.

Ice had been served when Theresa, her pretty face in smiles, declared that she had a surprise for her guests. To her it was the day of days. What better than a group photograph of her dear and new friends? How she would treasure it! Strangely enough, this did not please the guests. Photographs were dangerous. Suppose, in some way, the Okrana got hold of them. They breathed easier, though, when Theresa, calling in the photographer—the best in Lausanne, she assured them—instructed him to deliver all copies to Mr. Goluckoffsky, her dear father-in-law to be. So the revolutionists grouped themselves on the hotel lawn; the photographer pressed the bulb; and everybody laughed.

As quickly as the photographer could print his proofs they were delivered to Theresa; that night she and her "brother" left Montreux. In two days the name of all the revolutionists in young Goluckoffsky's handwriting and their pictures were delivered to the chief in Brussels.

The Three Branches of the German Spy System.

So much for an example of the clever work done by Brussels. The German service, in which I served for twelve years, has three distinct branches—the army, navy and personal, each branch having its own chief and its own corps of men and women agents. The army and navy division is controlled by the general staff of Berlin (Grosser General Stabe), the most marvelous organization in the world. The political and personal branch is controlled from the Wilhelmstrasse, the German Foreign office, the emperor in person, or his immediate privy councilor. The army and navy divisions confine themselves to the procuring of hidden and secret information as regards armaments, plans, discoveries, etc. The political branch concerns itself with the supervision of meetings between potentates, cabinet ministers and so forth. The personal branch under the direct control of the privy councilor, is used by the emperor for his own special purposes and service in this branch is the sine qua non of the service.

The personal consists of all classes of men and women. Princes and counts, lawyers and doctors, actors and actresses, mondaines of the great world, demi-mondaines of the half world, waiters and porters, all are made use of as occasion arises. It may well happen that your interesting acquaintance in the salon of an express steamer or your charming companion in the tea-room of the Ritz is the paid servant of some government.

The Great Artiste Who Spies on Germany.

Great singers, dancers and artists especially of Russian and Austrian origin, are often spies, notably one artiste, famous the world over for light feet and nimble wit, said wit being retained by the Russian government at 50,000 rubles per annum. When mademoiselle travels in Germany she has the honor of a very unostentatious bodyguard, the government being anxious that nothing should happen to them. Perhaps mademoiselle may remember a little incident at the Palais de Dance in Berlin—Anna vs. He of Lichtenstein.

Or perhaps Mademoiselle will recall a little episode in the Eis Arena in Berlin during a certain New Year's eve carnival, when the restoration—not the loss—of her magnificent gold chatelaine bag caused her much embarrassment, the chatelaine in question being dexterously commandeered by an expert in such matters of the secret service squad.

It happened that the personal branch of the German secret service was exceedingly interested in that gold bag. Mademoiselle had been carrying on an affair with a young ordnance officer of the Potsdam garrison. Now the service does not like officers, especially those of the ordnance, becoming involved with ladies like mademoiselle. On this particular night he had presented her with the new bag and she had been injudicious enough to let remain in the golden receptacle a dangerously compromising letter that he had enclosed. Injudicious, dear lady! Corsage or stockings, mademoiselle; but vanity bags—never!

Celebrating the coming of the New Year, mademoiselle and her party were feasting in the Ice Orena. I happened to be at a nearby table, and saw everything, as well as later hearing the inside of it.

The gold chatelaine lay on the table at her elbow. Upon observing its position, the waiter—a secret agent on the case—deliberately tipped over a champagne glass that stood within a few inches of the bag. Of course, mademoiselle was worried lest the wine run over on her gown, and while thus preoccupied, the waiter, stammering apologies, mopped up the table cloth with his serviette—mopped up the wine and cleverly covering the bag, folded it in the napkin and hurried away. In two minutes he had opened it, abstracted the letter from the young ordnance officer, and was back, all apologies.

"Your pardon, mademoiselle," he said, handing her the gold chatelaine. "In my haste I picked up this bag by mistake. I suppose it is yours."

With a slight start she said "yes," took the bag and, hurriedly opening it, felt for the letter. To her dismay it was gone. I saw her eyes narrow a little and then I marveled at the cleverness of the woman.

"No," she suddenly said, "that is not my bag. I never saw it before. I advise you to find the owner."

Clever lady! You sacrificed the costly gift, but you went over the frontier just the same, thereby costing you a rather remunerative engagement in Berlin.

Great Rewards—If Successful.

The necessary qualifications of an agent vary, of course, with the class of work to be done. We can dismiss the waiter and porter class, as they never receive independent commands and work only under direct supervision on minor details without knowing why. The trusted agent handling important matters and documents, must needs be a person of intelligence, tact and address. He must be a linguist, and, above all, a man of resource and a close student of his fellow men. In the woman agent charm and tact beauty and manners, au grand dame knowledge of the world and men are essential.

The pay varies, but is always good. Expenses are never questioned, money being no object. For instance, I spent on a mission through the Riviera 20,000 marks in 14 days. My fixed salary towards the end was 10,000 marks a year, besides 20 marks a day living expenses when not at work, which was automatically tripled irrespective of expenses when out on work. Besides, there is a bonus set out for each piece of work, the amount of which varies with the importance of the case in hand.

The risks are great, so are the rewards—if successful. If not, then one pays the usual price of failures, in this case only more so. For in the event of disaster no official help or protection could or would be granted and quarter is neither asked nor given. The work is interesting and fascinating to those of an adventurous turn of mind and not overly nervous about their health or squeamish in regard to established ethics. I would not suggest the secret service as a means of livelihood for a nervous person. At times it is arduous and strenuous work and mostly undertaken by men and women who fear neither man nor devil. It is not compatible to longevity. As a rule, the constant strain of being on the qui vive, playing a lone hand against the most powerful influences often unknown, having one's plans upset at the last moment and continually pitting one's own brain against some of the acutest and shrewdest minds in the world, the knowledge that the slightest blunder means loss of liberty, often of life, is wearing, to say the least.

I have known men and women, courageous to a degree, who have broken down under the strain; sooner or later one is bound to succumb. I have known of a dozen men and women who have mysteriously disappeared, "dropped out of sight," caught or killed—not always by their opponents.

The Case of Olga Bruder.

To cite but two cases, one of a woman, the other of a man:

Olga Bruder was a spy. She worked for Germany and for the service bureau in Brussels. A few years ago it was announced in the European newspapers that a woman known as Olga Bruder had committed suicide in a hotel at Memel, on the Russian border. Fraulein Bruder had been sent after the plans of a Russian fort. In Berlin they learned that she had obtained them, but becoming involved in a love affair with a Russian officer, was holding them out, planning to restore them to him. Also, contrary to the service regulations, she knew four foreign agents well. Later reports from Danzig revealed the fact that she had become enamored with a sectional chief of the Russian service and that she was about to give up everything to him. So Olga Bruder committed suicide. She was poisoned.

As for Lieutenant von Zastrov, an ex-army officer in the German secret service, he was killed in a duel. Zastrov was suspected of flirting with Russian agents—only suspected. He knew too much to be imprisoned. He was a civilian and under the German law entitled to a public hearing. Had he still been a military man, a secret tribunal would have been possible, but being the scion of an old aristocratic house and knowing official secrets, it was not wise to put him in against the regular machinery of elimination. So Zastrov was challenged to a duel. He killed the first man the service chiefs sent against him, yet no sooner was that duel over than he was challenged again. In half an hour Zastrov was dead.

Yes, your own employers often think it advisable at times to eliminate a too clever or knowing member of their service, unless that same member has procured for himself a solid, good "life insurance" in the nature of documentary evidence of such character that to meddle with him brings danger of disclosure. Of late there have been no attempts on my life.

INTERESTING ITEMS FROM THE CITIES

Most Exclusive Eating House in Houston, Texas

HOUSTON, TEX.—Hunger has a new destroyer in an institution opened in Houston. It is the Police cafe. Although located in the automobile shed at the jail, this is one of the most exclusive eating houses in the city, since none but officers can eat therein. The initial feed was served at six o'clock Sunday evening. Sixteen uniformed men answered the call.

In some mysterious way it became known among the friends of the officers that they sometimes found it difficult to get away from the station for their meals. Straightway contributions of cooking utensils and provisions began arriving. When a sufficient quantity of both had been received, preparations for the initial spread were started. This was served, as stated above, Sunday evening.

Fortunately for those who dined, an expert cook is numbered among the men at the station. Albert Granger, chauffeur for Chief Davison, is the accomplished one. That he is no slouch was evidenced at the close of the repast, when he was voted chief cook.

When the bluecoats were invited into the shed, Granger waved them to their places at a goods box, with a flourish of a frying pan, from which he was emptying brown pork chops. Another pan contained eggs. With these were served coffee in tin cups, with real cream. Cookies came last.

"Bill" Whips Handsomest Policeman of Los Angeles

LOS ANGELES, CAL.—A fine figure of a man indeed is Patrolman John Albright, tall, erect and dapper. His shoes are always shined, his uniform always pressed, and never a wrinkle does it show. The other day he had his beat changed. For several months he has been patrolling along Alameda street, not a prominent place for a handsome officer. An ornament to the city, that was Patrolman Albright until the night he asked to have his beat changed, and that was because of a goat.

The goat is named "Bill" and reigns in the five-story stable of Charles Fuller, ex-police commissioner, at Jackson and Alameda streets. A few days ago Patrolman Albright was proudly strolling along Alameda street near Jackson in the dusk of the evening, head up, and airily and skillfully he twirled his club.

Behind him there came a scurry of hoofs, a terrific blow, and Mr. Albright thought a switch engine had gone wild through the street and struck him. He touched the ground 12 feet away, and "Bill" was upon him. He drew his club, "Bill" withdrew, set himself and charged again.

About forty feet from where the battle was in progress there was a fence, and near the fence was a bench. The officer made for them, but as he gathered himself for the jump, "Bill" gathered in. He caught a very solid portion of the officer's body with his horns, and instead of alighting on the bench and safety, the patrolman went right on over the fence.

Muddied, ragged and limping, Policeman Albright went to the station "Sergeant," he said, "I want my beat changed."

Always Carries Fresh Eggs to Give Away as Tips

NEW YORK.—A man who attracted attention by reason of the generous size of the checks on his suit, and carrying a rosewood case, entered the barber shop of the Vanderbilt, and, after selecting an operator, carefully deposited his box near a hatrack. Having been released from the chair, he strolled about the room, putting on his collar and necktie the while, and finally said to Miss Mae Lewis, the head artist of the manicure department, that he would like his nails treated.

I ALWAYS GIVE FRESH EGGS AS TIPS

"But," he said, "I must warn you that I do not give cash tips; I give only fresh eggs."

"Eggs!" gasped Miss Lewis.

"Surely," repeated the visitor, "real, fresh, newly laid eggs. You do not know what a treasure such a thing is in New York. I always bring a case of them when I come in from the country. Look!"

He brought over the rosewood case and opened it. On top, sure enough, was a layer of eggs.

"I never travel without them," went on the stranger. "This case I have had made especially for carrying them. Now, having seen how highly I value these eggs, would you consider an egg a substitute for a tip?"

"You don't have to tip," replied the manicurist scornfully. "I'll be willing to fix your hands for the regular price."

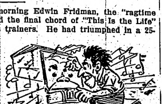
"And what is that?"

He was told.

"Fifty cents!" he echoed. "Why, I should never think of having my nails done where they charge less than a dollar. Good-day."

Ragtime Player Conquers Piano in a Long Battle

CHICAGO.—At one o'clock in the morning Edwin Fridman, the "ragtime slugger," put all his weight behind the final chord of "This Is the Life" and toppled back into the arms of his trainers. He had triumphed in a 25-hour battle against a ferocious piano. William Singer, the referee, tapped Edwin on the shoulder as he fell and announced him the winner. Then 300 music "fans" who crowded the Royal theater on Milwaukee avenue jumped into the orchestra pit and crowded about the victor.



Fridman had sustained a few injuries. His hands were badly twisted and his wrists were swollen. His eyes wore a far-away look as though focused on a distant feather bed. And his only answer to the shouts of the fans was a whistling obligato snore.

Stanley Busse and Philip Katz, the music slugger's seconds, were the first into the pit. They bathed his arms with alcohol and fanned him with towels, just like regular seconds.

Meanwhile attaches of the theater were administering to the defeated piano. During the battle it lost its top and front covers and its wires were knocked out of tune. Its condition is said to be critical.

The battler was not permitted to take both hands from the keys at any time during the struggle, and on two occasions the piano had him groggy.

The long-distance piano fight started when "Clem" Johnson of 6120 Calumet avenue bet Edgar Schorr $400 (it may have been stage money) that Fridman could play 25 hours without stopping.

HEAD OF NOVEL SOCIAL SERVICE

Bellevue, the famous old hospital of New York city, has been led to perceive that to care for a man or woman physically is not the end of its responsibility. Caring for nearly eighty thousand persons a year in hospital and dispensary is today but one side of the great work accomplished by that institution. This change has been brought about by a woman—Miss Mary E. Wadley. As an employee of the hospital she saw patients leaving Bellevue discharged as cured who had not regained sufficient strength to take up their work. She saw families broken up because the breadwinner lay ill in the hospital and the smaller and weaker members were unable to shift for themselves. Often a discharged patient fortunate enough to have a home to which he could return could not get the care there necessary to insure complete recovery.

Once the great hospital understood that something more must be done than it had been doing for its patients it empowered Miss Wadley to find ways and means of developing a social service. And in a broad sense this social service means the hospital is not only prepared to give a patient physical relief but mental as well. By taking care of the family while the father or mother is ill, by relieving the patient of anxiety regarding the possibility of securing employment on leaving the hospital and providing means to insure convalescence the social service provides hope as well as health.

RISES HIGH FROM THE RANKS

Most encouraging to the many young Englishmen who have enlisted in the ranks to fight for their country in the European war is the promotion of Sir William Robertson to be lieutenant general of the British army in France. His career has been decidedly romantic and shows how one who begins at the bottom of the ladder may in time climb to the upper rungs. In the past several enlisted men have risen to the grade of colonel and even of major general, one of the latter being the late Sir Hector Macdonald, but Sir William Robertson is the first "ranker" to attain to a lieutenant generalship. For ten years he served as a trooper in the Sixteenth lancers, and then, at the age of twenty-nine, he was commissioned a lieutenant of the Third dragoon guards. In the Black Mountain and Miranzai expeditions and the Chitral relief expedition, on the Indian frontier, he so distinguished himself that he was permitted to marry the daughter of the late Lieutenant General Palin of the Bombay staff corps.

After that his promotion was swift and he has been commandant of the staff college, director of military training of the British army and chief of the general staff at Aldershot. During the army maneuvers last year he was the escort of King George, and soon thereafter he was knighted.

Soon after President Wilson came into office he began hunting for a man. He kept three essentials in mind during the progress of the search. The man, he said, had to be physically and mentally robust, and a Democrat, of course, and he ought to have been a Union soldier in the war between the North and South. If such a man could be found, the president promised to appoint him commissioner of pensions. There were plenty of veterans, he agreed, but they were old and infirm and not competent to manage one of the greatest bureaus in Washington.
